The U.S. State Department last week announced a study panel to look at Iraq refugee issues and report back on how to better focus U.S. assistance. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also authorized the top U.S. diplomat in Syria to discuss the refugee problem with the Syrian government, apparently in an effort to provide help.

But a handful of U.S. lawmakers have pressed for more urgent action. They note that since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, the U.S. has permanently resettled only 466 Iraqi refugees, including 202 last year.

Sectarian Tensions Boil Over Into Syria (CSM)

By Rania Abouzeid

The Christian Science Monitor, February 13, 2007

DARRAYA, SYRIA

In a town that lies about five miles southwest of Damascus, the twin minarets of a partially constructed Shiite mosque pierce the sky and its drab cinder blocks blend in with the surrounding winter dreariness.

But apart from its dull facade, the Iranian-funded Tomb of Sukaina stands out. Although the mosque contains what is believed to be the remains of a descendant of the prophet Muhammad revered by Shiites, it is located in an area that is home to ultraconservative Sunnis.

"They say it's the grave of Sukaina, but she's got about three in Syria," says Radwan, a bespectacled resident, in hushed tones. "It's for them, not for us," he says, referring to the Iranians. "There are no Shiites here, but maybe they want to create some."

For more than four decades, Syria has been a fiercely secular state. Its majority-Sunni population is ruled by a minority Shiite sect, the Alawites, and governed by the Baathist Party. Until recently, modest public displays of faith were tolerated but not encouraged. Unlike most other Arab countries, for example, the state does not televise Muslim Friday prayers.

But Syria has seen a growing religiosity over the past few years. Spurred in large part by the civil war in Iraq to the east and rising Sunni-Shiite tensions in Lebanon to the west, Syrians are increasingly aware of their sectarian identities. In a region roiled by religious tensions, the country's majority Sunni population now views Syria's deepening relationship to Shiite Iran with creeping suspicion.

"Syrians are speaking of Shiitization," says Redwan Ziade, a political analyst and human rights activist in Damascus. "It's a very sensitive issue. There has been an increase in internal problems between Syrians based on sectarianism, but it won't come to the surface because there's no means for it to."

Whisperings of new Iranian-funded Shiite religious institutions abound, as do rumors that Iran is offering cash and other incentives to persuade Sunnis to convert.

In Syria, an officially secular, one-party state that doesn't tolerate political dissension, religious statistics are hard to come by. According to the CIA World Factbook, Sunnis constitute about 75 percent of the population, with Alawites, Druze, and Christians making up the bulk of the rest. It is commonly understood that Shiites make up 1 or 2 percent of Syrians.

"We hear there are some areas on the outskirts of Damascus, Aleppo ... where there have been conversions, but we can't be sure," says Ammar Qurabi, chairman of the Arab Organization for Human Rights in Syria. "There is no public opinion; there is public fear."

The Syrian regime is adept at quieting social disturbances, but it has opted instead to assuage Sunni worries. Regardless of whether the rumors are true, the Syrian state is working to allay concerns among Sunnis.

In the past year, the regime has loosened restrictions on everything from religious weddings, which once needed state security clearances, to allowing the first public celebration of the prophet Muhammad's birthday in decades – an event that earned even more fanfare than the normally extravagant Baath Party founding anniversaries.

Just a few months ago, the country's highest-ranking Sunni cleric, Grand Mufti Ahmad Hassoun, publicly downplayed concerns about Shiitization in a widely seen interview with Al Arabiya. While Mr. Hassoun said that the number of conversions was trivial, the fact that he even acknowledged Sunni concerns was significant.

The Syrian government is "trying to settle down these tensions between Sunni and Shiite that have spilled over from Iraq," says Andrew Tabler, a fellow at the Damascus-based Institute for Current World Affairs and a consulting editor for Syria Today magazine.

Many Sunnis here appear to connect recent regional events with a broader anti-Sunni campaign. Some blame Shiites for former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's humiliating hanging amid sectarian taunts. There is also a popular perception that the months-long push led by Lebanon's Shiite Hizbullah Party to oust the government there was motivated by anti-Sunni sentiments.

Yet during the 34-day war between Israel and the Iranian and Syrian-backed Hizbullah last summer, many Syrians proudly plastered posters of the group's leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah.

"When they killed Saddam Hussein, who wasn't a practicing Sunni for a day in his life, suddenly the feeling in Syria shifted," says Mr. Qurabi. "They tore down Hassan Nasrallah's posters."

For many, the question now is whether the US can exploit Sunni misgivings to pry Syria away from Iran's influence, as recommended by the Baker-Hamilton report last year.

According to Mohammad Habash, an independent Sunni member of parliament and director of the Damascus Center for Islamic Studies, the Syrian regime's newfound religious tolerance was partly designed to offset possible internal divisions that could make Syria vulnerable to US manipulation.

"The gap between religion and state policies has become narrower because of the policy of the US administration that believes it has a chance, under the banner of democracy, to make changes," he says.

Indeed, Sunni Arab leaders like Jordan's King Abdullah have warned that Iran is establishing a "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iraq through Lebanon to Syria. Saudi Arabia's monarch, in a rare move, recently lashed out against attempts to convert Sunnis to Shiites. He didn't name Tehran, but the conservative kingdom has been trying to counter Iran's growing influence in the region.

"The area is like a tug of war," says Mr. Ziade, the political activist. "Ahmadinejad, who speaks like a demagogue about exporting the [Islamic] revolution, increases sectarian tensions everywhere, including here."

Gates Says Pakistan To Help In Offensive Against The Taliban (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, February 13, 2007

MANAMA, Bahrain — Pakistan supports U.S. efforts to stop the Taliban's movements across the Pakistani-Afghan border, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Monday.

Gates had an hour-long meeting in Islamabad, Pakistan, with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf in which they discussed preparations for a NATO-led spring offensive against the Taliban.

The Taliban was a group of hard-line rulers of Afghanistan until it was toppled by a U.S.-led coalition in 2001. The Taliban regrouped along the Pakistani border and mounts annual attacks against Afghanistan's government and U.S. and allied forces.

Gates traveled to the Pakistani capital after meeting with NATO defense ministers in Europe. There, he sought to cement support for a major military, economic and counternarcotic offensive in Afghanistan this spring. He stopped briefly to change planes in Bahrain before flying back to the USA.

Gates said artillery attacks Sunday by U.S. troops on Taliban positions in Pakistan were coordinated with the Pakistanis.

Heavy fighting was reported in southern Afghanistan on Monday. At least six Taliban fighters and five Afghan police officers were killed in two separate firefights, according to U.S. Central Command.

The United States erred in neglecting Afghanistan after troops from the Soviet Union were chased out, Gates said. The Taliban took charge, al-Qaeda set up terrorist training camps there, and the Sept. 11 attacks were the result.

"We will not make that mistake again," Gates said.

There are about 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan; 13,000 of them work with NATO forces in the International Security Assistance Force, and the other 8,000 train Afghan troops and mount counterterrorism operations.

DOJ_NMG_0131553

In advance of the offensive, the U.S. Air Force increased its airstrikes in the first five weeks of this year by more than 70% compared with last year. Gates told NATO allies they need to hit the Taliban hard. He stressed the need to combine the offensive with economic aid, improving the Afghan government and building the country's infrastructure.

NATO needs to ensure it has enough troops for an adequate, long-term presence in rural areas where the Taliban intimidates residents, said Anthony Cordesman, an analyst with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

That has to be combined with an aggressive effort to defeat the illegal trade in opium and heroin derived from poppy cultivation, he said.

If there are too few NATO troops, Afghan security forces and development teams, the Taliban will exploit the gaps, Cordesman said.

"This is a war of attrition," he said, "and the Taliban are going to be there a long time."

Cordesman is skeptical that NATO can defeat the Taliban. Last week at a NATO conference in Spain, some smaller member countries agreed to send more troops to Afghanistan, but others, such as Germany, were reluctant to do so.

"They don't have a strategy, and they don't have an operational plan to make it effective," Cordesman said.

"Throwing clichés at the Taliban won't work."

In Pakistan, U.S. Defense Secretary Seeks Support To Counter Taliban (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Feb. 12 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates made an unannounced trip to Pakistan on Monday for talks with one of America's most complicated partners. He offered strong words of support for the government, even as he urged it to do more to halt the flow of Taliban fighters into Afghanistan.

Mr. Gates volunteered the help of the United States in easing a war of words between Afghanistan and Pakistan over border areas inside Pakistan that are being used as safe havens for fighters for the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

After meeting with President Pervez Musharraf, he told reporters that he was flying back to Washington reassured that Pakistan would work more strenuously to halt insurgents from crossing the border to attack American, NATO and Afghan troops.

"If we weren't concerned about what was happening along the border, I wouldn't be here," Mr. Gates said.

He had flown to Islamabad for a one-hour meeting with General Musharraf, nearby in Rawalpindi. Mr. Gates had spent the weekend in Munich at a security conference.

Senior American officials said the effort emphasized American support for an often criticized ally who assists the Bush administration's counterterrorism efforts but has been unable to prevent Islamic militants from using the country as a base.

Mr. Gates and General Musharraf discussed plans by NATO and Afghan forces for a spring offensive against the Taliban, who were ousted from power in Afghanistan by American-led forces in late 2001 and who normally carry out a fresh round of attacks with the first thaw.

Asked about reports that American troops in Afghanistan had been shelling Taliban positions across the border in Pakistan, Mr. Gates did not respond specifically, but said, "Our operations are coordinated with the Pakistanis."

A former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Gates said he first visited Pakistan 20 years ago in an effort to support anti-Soviet guerrillas in Afghanistan. After the Soviets were routed, Mr. Gates said, the United States erred by neglecting the region, allowing militants to take over. One result, he said, was the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, planned by leaders of Al Qaeda under Taliban protection in Afghanistan.

"We will not make that mistake again," he said. "We are here for the long haul."

Mr. Gates said the Pakistani president had acknowledged difficulties in enforcing a peace deal reached late last year with tribal militias in North Waziristan, a semiautonomous area on the border with Afghanistan.

General Musharraf has said that the pact has been a partial success, and that it is being enforced more successfully now, but critics say the truce allowed the Taliban to consolidate forces, rest and retrain.

Pakistani officials have said the responsibility for securing the border should be shared with the United States, NATO and Afghan forces across the frontier. But the cross-border movements by insurgent fighters have prompted accusations back and forth over who bears culpability for allowing the Taliban to reassemble their forces.

The discussions between American and Pakistani officials are expected to continue in the coming weeks, as a number of senior Bush administration and military officials are expected to make quiet trips to Pakistan.

Gates Thanks Pakistan For Border Crackdown (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131554

MANAMA, BAHRAIN — U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates thanked Pakistan on Monday for what he said were stepped-up efforts to crack down on the flow of fighters from its border regions into Afghanistan.

Gates expressed his appreciation in an hourlong meeting with President Pervez Musharraf during a stop in Islamabad, the capital, telling reporters that he felt the Pakistani government was taking the issue seriously.

"It's incurring significant costs in lives and, I might add, in treasure in fighting this battle on the border," Gates said during a short news conference before departing after less than five hours on the ground.

The Pakistani government came under intense criticism from U.S. and European officials after signing a peace deal last year with Taliban-linked tribal leaders in the Waziristan border regions. Western allies believe the deal has enabled insurgents to regenerate and launch an increasing number of attacks in neighboring Afghanistan.

American commanders in Afghanistan have reported a surge in attacks since the agreement was signed, and similar claims by Afghan President Hamid Karzai have led to a war of words between the neighboring leaders, with each accusing the other of failing to crack down on the extremist groups.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Mian Khursheed Mehmood Kasuri repeated those accusations Saturday at an international security conference in Munich, saying that shortcomings in Afghanistan's national reconciliation process and long delays in building the Kabul government's infrastructure were largely responsible for allowing the Taliban to flourish.

"The government and people of Pakistan are hurt at insensitive criticism toward Pakistan," Kasuri said. "To blame Pakistan for Afghanistan's problems would be counterproductive and indeed dangerous because it will take away from the real challenges facing Afghanistan, which lie within that country."

Gates did not repeat such criticisms of Pakistan on Monday and instead said he had thanked Musharraf for his country's efforts to enforce the Waziristan agreement, in which tribal leaders promised not to harbor Taliban fighters in return for a withdrawal of Pakistani troops.

"If we weren't concerned about what was happening along the border, I wouldn't be here," Gates said. "I think the president [Musharraf] himself has acknowledged there were problems initially with the enforcement of the agreement, but it is improving."

The meeting with Musharraf was the last in a five-day, three-country trip for Gates where, at every opportunity, he pressed American allies to increase their efforts in Afghanistan ahead of an expected Taliban offensive this spring. In two European stops last week, he called on members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to contribute more forces to the alliance's mission in Afghanistan, which stands at about 32,000 troops.

On Monday, Gates noted that his last trip to Pakistan was 20 years ago as a CIA official working with Pakistani intelligence to arm Afghanistan's anti-Soviet mujahedin. He said the U.S. was wrong to abandon Afghanistan after the Soviets withdrew.

"We neglected Afghanistan and extremism took control of that country," Gates said. "The United States paid the price for that on Sept. 11, 2001. We won't make that mistake again. We are here for the long haul."

Members' Skirting Military Duty Irks NATO Leadership (WT)

By Gareth Harding

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

BRUSSELS -- NATO officials yesterday put a brave face on renewed splits within the alliance over troop levels in Afghanistan, where more than 35,000 American and European soldiers are fighting Taliban forces.

Alliance spokesman James Appathurai said NATO has added 5,000 troops to the Afghan force since a November summit in Latvia, "with more trainers, transport planes and fighter aircraft."

But not all those troops have yet arrived on the ground, creating jitters within NATO ahead of an expected spring push by a resurgent Taliban.

"Nations should fulfill all of the commitments they have made, and I hope they will do so promptly so that they can have some impact on the spring offensive in the next few months," said Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates at a meeting of NATO defense ministers in Seville, Spain, last week.

Even if all the troops arrive on time, NATO will need another 2,500 soldiers to serve in the south and east of the country, where the fighting is most intense, according to Gen. John Craddock, who took over as the alliance's supreme commander in December.

Gen. Craddock has said he wants to deploy some of those troops along the porous Pakistani border to prevent Taliban forces from crossing back and forth.

U.S. forces helped then-rebel Northern Alliance forces to oust the Taliban in 2001. But the hard-line Islamist outfit has since regrouped and stepped up attacks against NATO and government forces.

Ahead of the Seville meeting, NATO chief Jaap de Hoop Scheffer pleaded with European allies to send more troops to the Central Asian state, where al Qaeda plotted its September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks against the United States.

"It is important that all nations participate because of course there is an element of solidarity in NATO," he said. "You can't send a few and [have] a number of allies do less."

The Dutch diplomat's words were echoed by Denmark's Defense Minister Soeren Gade, who was quoted by the Associated Press as saying: "More countries should take responsibility. ... If we do not send more soldiers to Afghanistan there is a risk that we may fail."

The finger-wagging reflects the frustration felt by a handful of countries that contribute the majority of troops to NATO's International Security and Assistance Force in Afghanistan.

Out of the 35,460 soldiers serving in the country, 14,000 are from the United States, 5,200 from Britain, 3,000 from Germany, 2,500 from Canada, 2,200 from the Netherlands and 1,950 from Italy.

Thirty-one countries, including France with 1,000, Turkey with 800 and Spain with 550 soldiers, provide the remaining 7,000 troops.

There is also some resentment inside NATO over "caveats" placed by some countries restricting their soldiers from places where they are most likely to come into harm's way.

Soldiers from the United States, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands, Romania, Estonia, Denmark and non-alliance member Australia are stationed in the dangerous south and east of the country, while most German and Italian forces are in the relatively peaceful north.

"We have got to be careful we don't create two alliances in one, where some nations are doing the fighting and others are doing the reconstruction," said a diplomat based at NATO's Brussels headquarters, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

In Riga, all alliance leaders agreed to make their troops available for NATO commanders in the event of an emergency, but other national restrictions remain on how troops operate in the field. "There are still caveats and we'd like them removed," Mr. Appathurai said.

DOJ:

Judiciary Panel Senators To Be Briefed On Firings (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 13, 2007

Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty is slated to brief members of the Senate Judiciary Committee at a closed-door meeting Wednesday on the personnel records of a handful of U.S. attorneys around the country who recently were fired from their posts.

When pressed by Senators at a hearing last week, McNulty declined to discuss the specific reasons for the Justice Department's dismissal of up to seven U.S. attorneys from California to Arkansas. Instead, he assented to a request from Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), who serves as Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee chairman and Democratic Caucus vice chairman, to privately share such information with the Senators.

The decision heads off a battle with Schumer, who has pledged increased oversight of the Justice Department. Schumer had threatened to subpoena the personnel records if they were not provided.

But it is unclear whether Democratic Senators — who charge the Justice Department has politicized U.S. attorney appointments — will be satisfied with Wednesday's briefing.

At last week's hearing, Senators pressed the deputy attorney general for copies of job performance evaluations. It was unclear at press time whether McNulty simply will brief the Senators on the evaluations without actually providing the paperwork. The Justice Department did not return a call for comment.

"It'll be a briefing," said one Senate Democratic aide. "We're not exactly sure what documents they're going to show."

Judiciary Committee spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler said the closed-door briefing would be open to all members of the committee.

Meanwhile, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is trying to bring legislation to the floor this week that would reverse a provision in the USA PATRIOT Act that allowed the Justice Department to indefinitely install interim U.S. attorneys. Though the Justice Department fiercely denies it, Democratic Senators charge that the department is trying to circumvent the Senate confirmation process.

Last week, the Judiciary Committee approved legislation by Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), ranking member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would strip the Justice Department of that power. Under their legislation, the attorney general could nominate an interim prosecutor for 120 days. After that, a district court judge would appoint a successor until a permanent prosecutor would be named.

Committee Republicans Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) and Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) voted for the legislation, but all other Republicans opposed it.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) has vowed to block the bill if it gets to the floor.

One Republican Senate aide said GOP Senators were not yet heavily engaged in the issue, but "robust opposition" could be expected when they focus in on it. Another GOP aide expressed skepticism that there was enough time to bring the issue to the floor before the Presidents Day recess begins at the end of the week.

Last week's hearing was controversial because McNulty admitted that Bud Cummins III, the former U.S. attorney for Eastern Arkansas, was let go without cause to install Timothy Griffin, a former aide to White House adviser Karl Rove.

McNulty also revealed that six other prosecutors, including U.S. Attorney Carol Lam in San Diego, were dismissed in December for "performance-related" reasons, but he declined to elaborate publicly on the details. Expected to leave office Feb. 15, Lam won the guilty plea of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and the investigation into his illegal activities continues.

At the hearing, Schumer asked McNulty, a former House Judiciary Committee counsel, to answer a plethora of questions, including whether President Bush personally approved the firings, how the White House was involved and whether there was any dissent within Justice regarding the dismissals.

Specter tried to elicit a reason why Lam was fired but was rebuffed because McNulty said it was "unfair" to air personnel records publicly. Furthermore, McNulty argued that the written evaluations were "subjective" and a reason for a particular dismissal may not be readily apparent.

Congressional Republicans have argued that Lam was not aggressive enough in prosecuting smuggling and other crimes on the California border. Even Feinstein raised concerns about the weak prosecution of immigration-related cases in a June 15, 2006, letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Feinstein lists seven U.S. attorneys recently asked to step aside by Justice: Lam, Cummins, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, David Iglesias of New Mexico, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, John McKay of Washington and Paul Charlton of Arizona. Besides Lam, none of the prosecutors is involved in identified Congressional cases.

In Wake Of Seven Firings, Branches Clash Over Interim U.S. Attorney Nominees (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 13, 2007

The old way of appointing interim U.S. Attorneys was constitutionally sound, many legal experts agree. And the new way of appointing interim U.S. Attorneys is constitutionally sound, they add. The only real question now for the U.S. Senate is what is the best way of appointing those officers -- constitutionally and otherwise.

Recent fallout from the firing of seven U.S. Attorneys revealed that senators last year -- some knowingly and others unknowingly -- waived their advise and consent power by giving the attorney general the sole authority to appoint interim U.S. Attorneys to serve indefinitely when vacancies occurred.

The change in the process came at the request of the U.S. Department of Justice and was inserted into the renewal of the USA Patriot Act that was subsequently adopted by both chambers of Congress. The proverbial "sleeping giant" awakened in the ensuing controversy surrounding the unexplained requests for the resignations of U.S. Attorneys in Arizona, Arkansas, Nevada, New Mexico, San Diego, San Francisco and Seattle.

Last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing not just on whether those resignation demands were purely political and not performance-based, but also on whether to change the appointment process again.

At the end of the week, some consensus had emerged that perhaps the old way was the best way. The Judiciary Committee on Feb. 8, voting 13-6, approved a bill returning the law to its pre-Patriot Act form. Under prior law, for almost two decades, the attorney general could appoint someone to fill the vacancy for 120 days. If no permanent replacement was nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate at the end of 120 days, the chief judge of the federal district in which the vacancy occurred would appoint an interim prosecutor to serve until the president acted.

But the Justice Department last week did not endorse a return to prior law.

"We supported what was done in the Patriot Act," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. "It solved a problem that comes up occasionally. We support the law as it currently stands."

And the department is defending the current law right now in Arkansas where, McNulty candidly told the Senate committee, well-respected U.S. Attorney H.E. Bud Cummins had been replaced, not for cause, but to give the office a "fresh start" with J. Timothy Griffin, former aide to White House senior political adviser Karl Rove and a former spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Little Rock, Ark., criminal defense attorney John Wesley Hall has challenged the constitutionality of Griffin's appointment in a client's criminal case.

"I'm challenging the fact that this guy is sitting in this office and he never has to go before the Senate for confirmation," Hall said. "To me, this cuts right to the heart of the appointments clause."

The occasional "problem" that the department most often offers as justification for the change in the law last year occurs when judges do not defer to the department's choice for the interim position.

That happened in South Dakota when the department reportedly asked U.S. District Judge Lawrence Piersol to reappoint Michelle Tapken as acting U.S. Attorney when her initial appointment was expiring. Piersol, instead, appointed former Republican state Attorney General Mark Meierhenry, with the concurrence of the other two active district court judges. Tapken resigned and the department asked a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma to swear in Steven Mullins, a Deputy U.S. Attorney there, as South Dakota's interim U.S. Attorney. The conflict was resolved when Mullins was named U.S. Attorney in a recess appointment.

Those conflicts, as well as separation-of-powers concerns, are avoided when judges are removed from the appointing process, according to McNulty.

"It is possible that what may be behind the department's arguments is its concern about the unitary theory of the executive," said constitutional law scholar Michael Gerhardt of the University of North Carolina School of Law. "They may feel these are really executive officers and therefore only the president or someone under his control should have the authority to exercise executive power. I'm going to surmise that may be why the department doesn't want to uphold a court's power here."

But as long as U.S. Attorneys are considered "inferior officers" under the Constitution, as they are now, the Constitution allows Congress to forgo its advise and consent power and to give the appointing authority to the president alone, heads of departments or to courts, said separation-of-powers scholar Peter Shane of Ohio State University Michael E. Moritz College of Law.

"What's interesting about all of this, in part, is: This is a potential constitutional-theory nightmare for the Bush administration," he said. "On the one hand, of course they would want to defend the legality of the interim appointments by the attorney general and that defense depends on the characterization of U.S. Attorneys as inferior officers. On the other hand, I'm guessing they wouldn't be too happy about judicial appointment of these folks."

There are only two ways around the problem, added Shane. One: to argue there is something constitutionally incongruous about vesting the appointment in a court of law. But the Supreme Court in Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654 (1988), appears to have answered that by finding nothing incongruous about judicial appointment of an independent counsel, he said. Or, two: to argue that U.S. Attorneys are not inferior officers.

"Of course if they're not inferior officers, the attorney general can't appoint them either. Only the president can."

The recent controversy ultimately is about the department's desire to consolidate and centralize power, said former federal prosecutor Laurie Levenson of Loyola Law School, Los Angeles, who also testified last week.

"There's nothing unconstitutional here" in the old or current process, she later said, adding, "It's a question of how does Congress want to exercise its power. Does it want to give power to the executive branch to bypass the confirmation process? I'm not sure they intended to do that last year. Now they're paying attention and they care."

Ousted U.S. Attorneys Received Positive Job Evaluations (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - Although the Bush administration has said that six U.S. attorneys were fired recently in part because of "performance related" issues, at least five of them received positive job evaluations before they were ordered to step down.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, using authority he gained in March from a little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act, has appointed interim U.S. attorneys from the Bush administration's inner circle. The firings and appointments have raised concerns that Gonzales is politicizing the process.

Supporters of the U.S. attorneys and Justice Department officials familiar with the job evaluations suggested in interviews that top Justice Department officials may have exaggerated the role job performance played in the firings.

A Justice Department official who spoke on behalf of the administration said the dispute might simply be a matter of "semantics."

"Performance-related can mean many things," said the official, who asked to remain anonymous because the Privacy Act bars officials from discussing personnel decisions. "Policy is set at a national level. Individual U.S. attorneys around the country can't just make up their policy agenda."

Performance reviews of U.S. attorneys are conducted every three to four years by a team of experienced Justice Department officials, who interview judges, staff members, community leaders and federal agents. In some of the five cases, the reviewers made recommendations for improvements, but overall their assessments were positive, Justice Department officials said.

For instance, Daniel Bogden, the U.S. attorney in Nevada, was described in his last job performance evaluation in 2003 as being a "capable" leader who was highly regarded by the federal judiciary and investigators.

"He didn't get any dings," said a Justice Department official with knowledge of the review. "The overall evaluation was very positive."

David Iglesias, the U.S. attorney in New Mexico, also received a positive evaluation last year, according to another Justice Department official.

Both officials asked not to be identified because they weren't authorized by the Justice Department to release the information.

The other U.S. attorneys who received good reviews were John McKay, the former U.S. attorney in Seattle; Paul Charlton, the former U.S. attorney in Arizona; and Carol Lam, the current U.S. attorney in San Diego.

McKay, who stepped down recently, said in an interview that his positive review in May 2006 didn't explain his ouster, nor did the phone call he received in December from a Justice Department official who ordered him to resign.

"I was not told that it was related to my performance," he said.

Lam was described in her 2005 evaluation as "well respected" by law enforcement officials, judges and her staff. Overall the review was positive.

"We're not aware of any significant issues," said another Justice Department official, who also asked not to be identified. Lam is leaving office Feb. 15.

Officials with the U.S. attorney's office in Arizona said Charlton received his last review in December 2005. He was described as being respected by his staff, federal investigators, judges and Native American leaders for "his integrity, professionalism and competence."

On Wednesday, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty is scheduled to brief senators privately on the reasons for the firings.

Tasia Scolinos, a chief spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the removals were the result of a "careful, thoughtful" decision-making process.

"This issue really boils down to the department's reasons for making internal management changes," she said.

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys came under scrutiny late last month after Senate Democrats discovered a change in the Patriot Act that allowed Gonzales to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms without Senate approval.

In testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week, McNulty conceded that H.E. "Bud" Cummins, the former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, wasn't fired because of how he handled his job. Rather, McNulty said, administration officials wanted to make room for Timothy Griffin, a former aide of presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Pressed to explain the other firings, McNulty said they were motivated by a "range of reasons" and were "performance-related."

He also emphasized that the Justice Department had wide latitude because U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president.

"We don't believe that we have an obligation to set forth a certain standard or reason or a cause when it comes to removal," he said.

McNulty cautioned the senators that the evaluations might not explain the firings.

"That's just one way of measuring someone's performance," he said. "And much of this is subjective and won't be apparent in the form of some report that was done two or three years ago."

In an interview for the Arizona Republic's Saturday edition, Charlton said he was fired for "principled reasons, not performance issues."

Charlton declined to comment on the matter, but his supporters said he clashed with the administration over the handling of death penalty cases. Charlton objected to automatically recommending the death penalty for certain crimes, said Grant Woods, a former attorney general in Arizona.

"Paul felt it was one of the main reasons" he was fired, Woods, a Republican, told McClatchy.

Woods said it was "misleading" for the administration to describe Charlton's firing as performance-related. "A conflict over policy is different than poor performance," he said.

Justice Department officials are now completing the evaluation of Kevin Ryan, who's being forced to step down as San Francisco U.S. attorney.

Douglas Turner Column: Gonzales Is Imperiling Nation's Justice System (BUFFNEWS)

By Douglas Turner

Buffalo News, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - The words of one of the greatest lawyers to work in Western New York were invoked last week in a Senate rebuke to the Bush administration's latest manipulation of the justice system.

The man was Robert H. Jackson, who went to school in the Jamestown area and practiced there in the early 1900s. Jackson became attorney general, a justice of the Supreme Court and, famously, the architect and first prosecutor at the war crimes trials in Nuremberg, Germany.

It would be a stretch to find much in common between today's Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Attorney General Jackson of 1940.

Gonzales supports bypassing the Geneva Conventions on treatment of war prisoners, and warrantless eavesdropping on Americans. Most recently, Gonzales took steps to tighten the grip the White House holds on the corps of federal prosecutors nationwide.

A hearing chaired by Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., showed the Gonzales moves on U.S. attorneys had nothing to do with national security. They are designed to transform an elite group of lawyers into a political hackdom in Bush's last two years.

Schumer noted that in 1940 Jackson had lectured an assembly of U.S. attorneys on the necessity of their being absolutely nonpolitical. The reason, Jackson warned, was their great power.

"The prosecutor has more power over life, liberty and reputation than any person in America," Jackson said. "Because of this power to strike at citizens, not with mere individual strength, but with all the force of the government itself, the post has been safeguarded by presidential appointment requiring confirmation of the Senate."

Gonzales is using the amended Patriot Act to strip Senate confirmation and judicial safeguards from the selection process.

Without warning or apparent cause, Gonzales has fired seven prosecutors. Replacements could serve only 120 days without confirmation. Under the old law, a federal judge could name an interim prosecutor.

Now, replacements named by Gonzales can serve indefinitely without Senate action - at least through the end of Bush's term.

Many of the fired prosecutors were working on high-profile cases. The ousted San Francisco prosecutor, Kevin Ryan, was investigating stock options at Apple computer.

Most troubling was the sudden ouster of U.S. Attorney Susan Lam of San Diego. She had successfully prosecuted Republican Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking more than a million dollars in bribes from defense contractors.

When Lam was jettisoned, she was weighing indictment of a Cunningham friend, defense contractor Brent Wilkes. Wilkes, people close to that case say, might lead prosecutors to other GOP House members for investigation.

Schumer asked Gonzales whether presidential adviser Karl Rove is involved in the process. The Justice Department admitted to Schumer in the hearing that the prosecutor for eastern Arkansas was removed to make way for J. Timothy Griffin, a former legal aide to Rove who also worked at digging up dirt on Democrats for the Republican National Committee.

Former prosecutors who testified at Schumer's hearing said Gonzales' actions could politicize operations in U.S. attorney offices all over the country.

"It is having a devastating effect on the morale of assistant U.S. attorneys," said Laurie Levinson, now a professor at Loyola Law School.

"Sudden replacement without apparent good cause can send the wrong message to other U.S. attorneys," said Mary Jo White, who headed federal prosecutions in Manhattan.

Schumer and congressional Democrats are pressing for a repeal of the suspect clause of the new Patriot Act.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

J&J Reports Improper Payments (WSJ)

By Ery Johnson, Kara Scannell And Jon Kamp

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

Johnson & Johnson said it alerted federal officials to improper overseas payments and that one of its senior executives is resigning over the probe.

The New Brunswick, N.J., health-care conglomerate voluntarily told the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission that it believes its subsidiaries made improper payments in two countries regarding the sale of medical devices. (See J&J statement1.) Michael J. Dormer, world-wide chairman for Medical Devices & Diagnostics, stepped down as a result of the revelations. Mr. Dormer had been in charge of several medical-device divisions, including Ethicon, Ethicon Endo-Surgery and DePuy.

The company didn't name the countries involved. A J&J spokesman declined to comment beyond the press release, which said that Mr. Dormer told the company in a letter that he has "ultimate responsibility by virtue of my position" for the subsidiaries involved in the disclosure. The J&J spokesman said Mr. Dormer was not available. An SEC spokesman declined to comment.

The disclosures are a bitter pill for a company that prides itself on its clean corporate image. It was not immediately clear whether the probe extended beyond the countries, which J&J described as "small" markets, or what specific allegations or subsidiaries it involves. But J&J said that the payments in question may fall within the jurisdiction of the federal Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which prohibit improper payments to foreign officials in order to win or keep business.

The Justice Department and SEC have stepped up their pursuit of foreign-bribery cases in recent years, including a record $28.5 million collection against Titan Corp. in 2005. Titan pleaded guilty to settle allegations involving improper payments to Titan's agent in Benin, Africa, some of which were passed on to the re-election campaign of the country's then-president, according to government papers. The government alleged that Titan paid the money in an effort to win higher fees for a telecommunications project.

Other companies have reached settlements, which generally involve deferred-prosecution agreements with federal prosecutors where the company or its subsidiary agrees to settle the allegation instead of facing an indictment. In a deferred-prosecution agreement, an indictment is usually filed but is dismissed if the company adheres to the terms of its settlement. As part of a joint settlement, most companies also agree to have a corporate monitor in place to inspect internal controls and book-and-record keeping. The SEC and Justice Department have several open joint investigations.

Johnson & Johnson has a huge medical-devices business, with products ranging from replacement hips and knees to blood glucose meters and drug-coated heart devices. The company's Medical Devices & Diagnostics division registered $20.28 billion in sales last year, about 38% of total corporate sales. Device sales were split about evenly between the U.S. and international markets.

All world-wide medical devices and diagnostics businesses now report to Nicholas J. Valeriani, who has the title of world-wide chairman for that division. Mr. Valeriani, who has nearly 30 years of experience, now will be responsible for businesses that had been under Mr. Dormer's oversight.

The medical products and diagnostics division went through a reshuffling late last year that saw Messrs. Valeriani and Dormer elevated to equal positions.

Mr. Dormer began his career at J&J in 1976 and left briefly for senior positions at DePuy from 1992 to 1998. He rejoined J&J in 1998 when the conglomerate bought DePuy, which makes products for joint reconstruction and skeletal injuries.

Shares of J&J were recently up at $65.51 in after-hours trading, after slipping 14 cents to $65.46 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

J&J: Overseas Subsidiaries May Have Made Improper Payments (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 13, 2007

NEW BRUNSWICK N.J. (AP) _ Some Johnson & Johnson subsidiaries outside the U.S. may have made improper payments in connection with the sale of medical devices in two small-market countries, the company said Monday.

The New Brunswick-based health care giant said it was voluntarily disclosing the information to the U.S. Justice Department and the U.S. also was leaving the company.

The subsidiaries' actions broke J&J's own corporate policies and fell within the jurisdiction of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, the company said in a statement.

J&J did not disclose any additional information on Monday, including the identities of the exact subsidiaries and countries involved, said company spokesman Jeffrey J. Leebaw.

J&J said it would provide additional information to the Justice Department and SEC, and would cooperate with the agencies' reviews.

Michael J. Dormer, worldwide chairman of the company's Medical Devices and Diagnostics segment, retired from the company, effective Monday.

In a letter to the company, Dormer acknowledged he had "ultimate responsibility by virtue of my position" for the subsidiaries that were the subject of the disclosure, according to the J&J statement.

Nicholas J. Valeriani, previously worldwide chairman of the Cardiovascular Devices & Diagnostics segment, was to assume Dormer's job and title, which now included Valeriani's previous responsibilities.

J.& J. Says Improper Payments Were Made (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

Johnson & Johnson, the drug and consumer products company, said last night that some of its foreign units might have made improper payments related to the sale of medical devices in two "small-market countries."

The company also said that the executive responsible for the units, Michael J. Dormer, 55, worldwide chairman of medical devices and diagnostics, had retired.

Johnson & Johnson, of New Brunswick, N.J., said that it had conducted a review of the matter and had voluntarily disclosed the information to the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Certain subsidiaries, which Johnson & Johnson did not name, "are believed to have made improper payments in connection with the sale of medical devices in two small-market countries," the statement said.

It also did not name the countries and did not offer details of the payments but said they were "contrary to the company's policies" and "may fall within the jurisdiction of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act."

A company spokesman, Jeffrey J. Leebaw, declined to comment beyond the news release. "Given the nature of the situation, we have nothing further to add," he said.

But the disclosures were unusual for a company that emphasizes its longstanding credo of ethical conduct and responsible behavior.

The company said it would cooperate with any investigation that the agencies might undertake.

Representatives of the Justice Department and the S.E.C. could not be reached for comment.

The foreign corruption law, enacted in 1977, forbids American companies from paying foreign government officials to win or influence business deals outside the United States.

An analyst for Morgan Stanley, Glenn Reicin, said in a research note last night that the company's actions might help it avoid federal enforcement action.

In a resignation letter to the company, Mr. Dormer cited the internal review of questionable payments made by some subsidiaries. He said that he had "ultimate responsibility by virtue of my position" for the subsidiaries.

Mr. Reicin said that Mr. Dormer's "acceptance of responsibility for improper payments is a very big statement" for the Johnson & Johnson.

"Since a company that is found guilty of a felony can be barred from Medicare programs," Mr. Reicin wrote, "we suspect that J.& J. management probably had to find a way to make it clear to authorities that this matter is being taken seriously."

Mr. Dormer, who was named to his current position in April 2002, had been responsible for several medical units, including DePuy orthopedic, Ethicon wound care, Ethicon-Endo Surgery and Ortho Clinical Diagnostics units.

He began his Johnson & Johnson career in 1976 as a product manager in Britain. In 1992, he left to become president for DePuy International, where he was named chief operating officer, DePuy in 1996. He rejoined Johnson & Johnson in 1998 with the company's acquisition of DePuy.

Johnson & Johnson said that effective immediately, all worldwide businesses within the medical devices and diagnostics division would report to Nicholas J. Valeriani, who is assuming Mr. Dormer's title.

Mr. Valeriani, a longtime company executive, will have responsibility for businesses previously managed by Mr. Dormer as well as those for which he is already responsible, the statement said.

The medical devices and diagnostic section brought in about $20 billion last year, more than a third of Johnson & Johnson's total sales.

The Justice Department and the S.E.C. have stepped up investigations of suspected violations of the corruptions act in the last several years. In 2005, the Titan Corporation, a leading military and intelligence contractor, paid $28.5 million — the largest penalty imposed on a company in the history of the 1977 law — to settle charges that it bribed the president of Benin.

In April 2004, Lucent Technologies fired four executives at its division in China after it was discovered that they might have violated bribery laws. In March 2006, DaimlerChrysler dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal investigation uncovered evidence that its executives had paid bribes in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

In August 2003, the S.E.C. advised Johnson & Johnson of its informal investigation under the act of accusations of payments to Polish governmental officials by American pharmaceutical companies.

In November 2003, the S.E.C. told the company that the investigation had become formal and issued a subpoena for information. The company and its operating units in Poland have responded to these requests.

J&J Says Improper Payments Made (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

Johnson & Johnson has alerted US prosecutors and securities regulators that some of its foreign subsidiaries may have paid officials bribes in connection with the sale of medical devices.

The New Jersey-based health product conglomerate also announced that Michael Dormer, worldwide chairman of its medical devices and diagnostics business, had retired with immediate effect.

In a statement from Mr Dormer to J&J, the executive cited the company's internal review of the potential corruption charges and said he had "ultimate responsibility by virtue of my position" for those subsidiaries that were at the centre of the probe.

The medical devices division generates roughly $20bn for the company per year. On Monday, J&J said Nicholas Valeriani, a veteran in the industry who heads J&J's cardiovascular devices unit, would have responsibility for both businesses.

J&J said the allegedly improper payments were made in two small-market countries. It said the actions were "contrary to the company's policies" and could fall within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice's anti-bribery statute, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. J&J said it was co-operating with both the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

J&J has previously reported in regulatory filings that in August, 2003, the SEC advised the company of an informal probe into allegations that the group made payments to Polish governmental officials by US pharmaceuticals companies.

In November 2003, the SEC told J&J that the investigation was formal and issued subpoenas for more information. It was unclear last night whether the new revelations were tied to the earlier probe.

The group's decision to self report allegations of wrongdoing is not uncommon. But the company's co-operation with prosecutors will not ensure that the group is immune from heavy fines if it is found guilty of committing a crime. Last week, Vetco International, the UK oil and natural gas services provider, was subject to the largest criminal fine in US history under foreign corruption laws after it admitted paying $2.1m in bribes to Nigerian officials to win preferential treatment by customs officials.

The Department of Justice said the guilty plea by the company, which was fined $26m, and resolution of a criminal investigation into the charges resulted from Vetco's co-operation in the case. The guilty plea was announced just weeks after General Electric confirmed it was acquiring Vetco's Vetco Gray subsidiary for $1.9bn.

J&J Tells U.S. Agencies Of Improper Overseas Payments (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Avram Goldstein

Bloomberg, February 13, 2007

Feb. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Johnson & Johnson disclosed that some of its subsidiaries outside the U.S. made improper payments in the marketing of medical devices and the executive in charge left the company.

The payments in ``two small-market countries'' violated company policies, J&J, the world's largest maker of medical products, said it told the U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission. Michael J. Dormer, the worldwide chief of medical devices, retired and took responsibility, Johnson & Johnson said today in a statement.

``I think the company's reputation is tarnished by this,'' said Jan David Wald, a medical-device industry analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in Boston. ``I would bet you that there are people inside the countries involved that were more directly responsible. The issue is whether the company is going to face criminal charges.''

It isn't likely that the incident will inflict much damage on J&J, which has a market value of $189.8 billion, Wald said. Medical devices and diagnostic products, including heart stents and artificial orthopedic joints, accounted for 38 percent of J&J's $53.3 billion in 2006 sales.

J&J, based in New Brunswick, New Jersey, immediately replaced Dormer with Nicholas Valeriani. Valeriani, who joined J&J in 1978 and rose to worldwide chairman of cardiovascular products, added Dormer's duties to his responsibilities, the company said.

Dormer said in a letter to the company that he bore ``ultimate responsibility by virtue of my position'' for the actions of unnamed subsidiaries involved in improper payments, J&J said. Jeffrey J. Leebaw, a J&J spokesman, declined to make any further comment.

Dormer was chief operating officer of DePuy Inc., the maker of artificial hips and knees, when J&J bought the company in 1998 for $535.5 million. He immediately became a group chairman of some of J&J's more than 100 subsidiaries. In 2002 he became worldwide chairman of the medical devices group.

In 2005, Dormer received total compensation of $2.2 million plus $625,000 in stock options, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

Johnson & Johnson shares fell 14 cents to $65.46 at 6:48 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. J&J stock has risen 12 percent in the last 12 months.

Calls after normal business hours to the SEC and Justice Department weren't immediately returned.

J&J last month said profit rose 3.5 percent to $2.2 billion in the fourth quarter on higher sales drugs for schizophrenia and migraines, as well as orthopedic devices used to reconstruct damaged or diseased joints.

Cox: 'Heroes' Armed With Tech Lead Backdating Crackdown (LAW)

By Donna Block And Ron Orol, The Deal

The Deal, February 13, 2007

The head of the Securities and Exchange Commission is crediting the incorporation of interactive data into SEC filings for the discovery of "a pandemic of crooked accounting" linked to stock option backdating.

At the Practicing Law Institute's annual "SEC Speaks" event on Feb. 9, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said XBRL, the Internet programming language newly adopted by the agency, is helping his staff root out fraud by tagging financial data so computers can track it and sift through it quickly.

The chairman even compared his team of enforcers to the characters in the hit TV show "Heroes" -- everyday people with extraordinary abilities they didn't know they had. Cox said his enforcement staff are a group of otherwise ordinary people with extraordinary talent and dedication.

"In other words, 'Save the Cheerleader -- Save the World,'" Cox said, intoning the show's mantra.

He added that while his staff may not possess super powers, "by sheer willpower and hard work they routinely accomplish great deeds. And, to all the Americans who depend on them, they are very real heroes, in every sense."

More than 170 companies have been investigated by the SEC or have conducted internal inquiries into whether option dates were changed to benefit executives.

Cox said the timing of the options backdating scandal coincided with the SEC's decision to begin converting Form 4 submissions -- the form companies use to report stock option exercise transactions -- into interactive documents.

Before 2003, information filed on the SEC's Form 4 was analyzed the old-fashion way -- retyped into SEC databases and spreadsheets before being scrutinized. "Not surprisingly, for all of that time, the backdating phenomenon was never uncovered," Cox said.

More recently, however, the SEC started collecting Form 4 data in an interactive format, which made analyzing the information easier. The SEC also issued new rules around the same time requiring real-time reporting of options awards -- within two days of the grant. "Once real-time disclosure was combined with interactive data ... we began to find clues that had previously gone undetected. That led directly to the discovery of what we now know were billions of dollars of backdated stock option awards," Cox said.

Cox advocates using technology to improve disclosure, and regulation is pressing companies to use the interactive system. The SEC has invested $54 million into its development this year.

But many companies have been slow to adopt XBRL for a variety of reasons, including cost.

Cox said other technology initiatives are also in development at the agency. He said the SEC is using new technology to "help accurately track, collect and distribute billions of dollars of penalties and disgorgements."

The agency is also introducing new software tools to manage its enforcement cases and be prepared to operate in a disaster or emergency.

Separately, agency officials said at the conference that regulation should have a global perspective in which authorities engage with each other on international standards.

"Market convergence and innovation will challenge us even more to be responsive and thoughtful in adjusting market regulation to market needs and realities," SEC Commissioner Kathleen Casey said at the conference.

The pending $14 billion merger of NYSE Group Inc., parent of the New York Stock Exchange, with Euronext NV, which operates the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon exchanges, will result in the first trans-Atlantic exchange and has the SEC collaborating with European regulators to oversee the merger and coordinate their supervisory efforts.

In January the exchanges signed a memorandum of understanding with respect to their regulation whereby the SEC and the College of Euronext Regulators pledged to cooperate "to promote investor protection, foster market integrity, and maintain investor confidence and systemic stability in connection with the regulation of the combined group."

The memorandum confirmed that the deal will not result in foreign companies being subject to the domestic laws of any of the countries where the exchanges are based. Some foreign investors worried that companies traded on the European exchange would be subject to provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance law.

Nevertheless, SEC Commissioner Annette Nazareth, a Democrat, said at the conference she is seeing other markets adopt similarly tough rules over financial reporting even though Sarbanes-Oxley, most notably its internal control requirement contained in §404, has been greatly criticized.

"It is interesting that several jurisdictions are adopting regulations similar to SOX in an effort to improve investor protections, encourage private investment and as a result increase the depth of their markets," she said.

However, Casey, the newest commissioner and a Republican, said the SEC needs to continue reaching out to regulators both at home and abroad, and regulators "need to fix 404."

"The commission needs to continue in its efforts to engage cooperatively with other regulators both domestically and internationally," she said.

Questions about new rules for investing in hedge funds were also raised at the conference. SEC staffers were grilled on the agency's proposal to raise the requirements investors must meet to invest in hedge funds. Existing regulations call for an individual hedge fund investor to have $1 million in assets or an annual income of $200,000 for at least two years prior to making the investment. In December the commission introduced a draft rule that would change the net worth threshold to $2.5 million in invested assets, excluding a primary residence, with the SEC adjusting the new investment minimum every five years for inflation.

Steven Wallman, CEO of Vienna, Va.-based brokerage and consulting business Foliofn Inc., said the SEC sought to prohibit investors with lesser means from investing in hedge funds but hasn't produced concrete evidence that the strategy is more risky than investing in mutual funds.

But Doug Scheidt, SEC associate director and chief counsel for the Division of Investment Management, defended the proposal. He argued that many hedge funds lack sufficient disclosure and aren't required to open up their books to commission examiners for periodic inspections. "Hedge funds are notoriously un-transparent," Scheidt said.

Scheidt conceded, however, that he couldn't say definitively that investing in hedge funds is riskier than mutual funds. After Wallman pressed him on the subject, Scheidt declined to comment on whether the agency would produce a study examining the risks associated with each type of investment.

Laura Unger, a former SEC commissioner, pointed out that critics of the measure argue that the new prohibition would reduce the numbers of people investing in hedge funds, reducing the diversification of the funds, thus increasing the risks for those remaining.

"A smaller pool of investors has the perverse effect of making it riskier to invest in hedge funds, because the funds are spread out among fewer investors," Unger said.

Scheidt said the new limits made sense, in part, because hedge fund managers aren't seeking to raise investment capital from the people that the measure will exclude.

Interested investors and managers have until March 6 to comment on the proposal. So far, the SEC has received about 200 comments, most of which have been from investors and managers deriding the agency's proposal on grounds that it will have a chilling effect on competition in the industry and prohibit sophisticated investors with fewer assets.

Jailed Fund Manager Fined $20m For Fraud (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

A federal judge in Georgia on Monday ordered Kirk Wright, a hedge fund manager who allegedly defrauded hundreds of investors including several prominent National Football League players, to pay $20m in disgorgement, interest and penalties.

The ruling came in a federal civil suit filed against Mr Wright last year by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr Wright still faces a criminal trial this spring over allegations that he stole over $100m in investors' money.

In its lawsuit, the SEC alleged that Mr Wright raised as much as $185m from over more than 500 investors for seven hedge funds he controlled. Mr Wright then allegedly provided investors with false statements about the performance of the funds and the amount of securities the funds controlled.

It is not clear if Mr Wright has the assets to comply with the order that he pay the $20m. An attorney for Mr Wright could not be reached for comment on Monday.

Among the investors allegedly defrauded were a group of players in the NFL who claim they lost millions investing with Mr Wright. The alleged losses by the athletes have been widely cited as examples of the potential dangers inherent in investing in the lightly regulated hedge fund industry.

Six of the players, including Denver Broncos wide receiver Rod Smith, New York Giants linebacker Carlos Emmons and former Broncos safety Steve Atwater, have filed a civil lawsuit against the NFL and the NFL Players Association, the union that represents players, for allegedly endorsing Mr Wright as a legitimate investment professional.

The players, who are seeking around $20m, claim the NFL and the NFLPA endorsed Mr Wright despite evidence of problems in his past. The NFL and the NFLPA have rejected the suit as baseless, saying the players are responsible for their own financial decisions.

The NFL and the NFLPA have requested the suit be thrown out. The request for dismissal is still pending. Jim Evangelista, an attorney for the players, said the ruling in the SEC case would have no impact on the players' lawsuit.

Ex-Westar Executive Released From Prison Pending Appeal (AP)

AP, February 13, 2007

LEAVENWORTH, Kan., Feb. 12 (AP) — David Wittig, the former top executive of Westar Energy, was released from prison on bond Monday pending the appeal of his sentence in a bank fraud case.

Mr. Wittig was released from the federal detention center in Leavenworth about 2 p.m. and was greeted by his wife, Beth, and Jeff Morris, one of his attorneys. He had served nearly 13 months in prison.

Mr. Wittig, the former chairman, president and chief executive of Westar, was convicted in July 2003 of engaging in a loan transaction with a Topeka banker and helping to conceal the loan from banking regulators.

Mr. Wittig had been incarcerated in a minimum-security prison in Sandstone, Minn., until last month, when he was taken to Topeka for his third sentencing in the bank fraud case. Federal District Judge Julie A. Robinson sentenced him to two years.

On Thursday, Judge Robinson granted Mr. Wittig's request to be released on bond pending his appeal of that sentence.

Although Judge Robinson granted Mr. Wittig bond last week, he could not be released until the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver ruled on his request for bond in another case, in which Mr. Wittig was convicted in September 2005 of looting Westar. Judge Robinson sentenced him to 18 years in prison in that case.

The 10th Circuit granted that motion.

Mr. Wittig's release may be only temporary if the appeals court affirms the two-year sentence in the bank case, or if prosecutors decide to put him on trial again for some of the crimes in the Westar case.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Officials Volunteered Leaks, Reporters Testify (NSDY/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

Long Island Newsday, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Three prominent journalists testified today that Bush administration officials volunteered leaks about a CIA operative, as I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's attorneys sought to suggest he was not responsible for exposing her.

The jury in Libby's perjury trial heard a 66-second snippet of one of the deep background interviews given to Washington Post editor Bob Woodward for use in one of his books. They also saw a parade of Pulitzer-prize winning journalists discuss who did and did not leak the information that set off a scandal and ultimately brought Libby to trial.

Woodward, who never wrote about Plame, and columnist Robert Novak, who first identified her in print, testified that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage first told them in the summer of 2003 that the wife of prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, Valerie Plame, worked at the CIA.

Another Post reporter, Walter Pincus, testified that then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer "suddenly swerved off" topic during an interview to tell him of her employment.

This contradicted a point in Fleischer's testimony last week.

A major government witness, Fleischer testified Libby told him about Plame -- earlier than Libby has told investigators he thought he first learned about her from NBC reporter Tim Russert.

On cross-examination, Fleischer also testified that he did not recall telling Pincus about Plame. The reporter's testimony today was the most direct hit the defense made on the prosecution's evidence that Libby lied to FBI agents and a grand jury about his talks with reporters about Plame and obstructed an investigation into how her name leaked.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is not charged with the actual leak.

The defense did show Libby had numerous opportunities to leak Plame's identity to reporters and did not. But none of today's testimony went directly to the precise charges that he lied about his conversations with three other reporters about her.

The day's highlight was the tape of Woodward's June 13, 2003, interview with Armitage about how Bush decided to go to war. Armitage's name was never supposed to be connected publicly to what he said, but the scandal prompted him to release Woodward from his pledge of confidentiality. Armitage has said he revealed the name accidentally off-the-cuff and didn't realize that Plame's employment was classified information.

With Armitage's frequent profanities deleted, the jurors heard him tell Woodward no less than four times where she worked.

Woodward asked about Wilson's 2002 fact-finding mission to Africa for the CIA that the ex-ambassador says helped him debunk prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Why would they send him?" Woodward asked.

"Because his wife's a [expletive] analyst at the agency," Armitage replied.

"It's still weird," Woodward said.

"It's perfect. That's what she does. She is a WMD analyst," Armitage said.

Later Woodward asked if she was the WMD chief at CIA. Armitage said she wasn't but was in a position there to suggest that her husband had contacts in Africa.

Finally, Armitage said: "His wife is at the agency and is a WMD analyst. How about that [expletive]."

Novak described trying to get an interview with Armitage in 2001 and being told the deputy secretary was "not too busy. He just didn't want to talk to me." Novak said he was rebuffed again after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Then in the last week of June 2003, Armitage's office called to set up an interview. "I had not pressed my request for one in two years," Novak said. Once he asked about the Wilson trip, Armitage said "it was suggested by his wife, Valerie, who is employed in the counterproliferation division at CIA," Novak testified.

Novak testified he got confirmation from White House political adviser Karl Rove, who replied to him: "Oh, you've heard that, too."

Defense attorneys got Woodward, Novak, Pincus, New York Times reporter David Sanger, Washington Post reporter Glenn Kessler and Newsweek reporter Evan Thomas all to say they had talked to Libby about Wilson's allegations during the summer of 2003, but Libby had not disclosed Plame's identity or employment to them.

But Sanger, Kessler and Thomas said they didn't ask Libby about Wilson's wife. Woodward and Novak testified they didn't recall asking about her but said Libby didn't talk about her if they did. Pincus said Libby said he didn't know how the trip was arranged but their conversation occurred before June 12, when Libby now recalls he first learned the information from Cheney.

Defense attorneys brought out that Woodward, Pincus, Sanger and Kessler had all shared in Pulitzer Prizes.

"I believe you're the third Pulitzer prize winner to testify this morning," Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald quipped when he began questioning Sanger. He used the moment to bring out that an earlier prosecution witness, Judith Miller, also had shared a Pulitzer Prize while working at the Times.

Reporters Deny Official Leaked Name To Them (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 — Lawyers for I. Lewis Libby Jr. opened their case Monday with a parade of prominent Washington reporters who testified that Mr. Libby never mentioned the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative when they interviewed him during the period the officer's identity was leaked to the news media.

One by one, the reporters from The Washington Post, The New York Times and Newsweek took the stand and recounted their conversations with Mr. Libby in the summer of 2003 about unconventional weapons and Iraq. They briskly and unhesitatingly said Mr. Libby, then the chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, did not speak about the C.I.A. employee, Valerie Wilson.

The jury also heard from Robert Novak, the syndicated columnist who first disclosed Ms. Wilson's identity to the public on July 14, 2003, and set off the investigation that resulted in the five felony charges on which Mr. Libby is being tried. Mr. Novak told the jury that he learned about Ms. Wilson from Richard L. Armitage, the deputy secretary of state, and had her identity confirmed by Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political adviser.

But as to whether the subject of Ms. Wilson came up in his conversation with Mr. Libby on July 8, 2003, he said, "I got no help from Mr. Libby on that issue."

Ms. Wilson is the wife of Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had asserted only days before the Novak column that the Bush White House willfully distorted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons in order to justify going to war. Administration critics suggested that her identity was leaked to punish Mr. Wilson for his criticism.

Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents about when and how he learned of Ms. Wilson's role at the C.I.A. Prosecutors say he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from fellow administration officials and shared that information with two reporters, Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time magazine. Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper testified earlier in the trial for the prosecution that Mr. Libby discussed Ms. Wilson with them.

In a sense, the defense opened its case Monday with an indirect approach — appealing to the jurors to believe Mr. Libby's account that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson with Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper because he did not discuss her with the six other reporters who testified Monday. In addition to Mr. Novak, the other reporters were Bob Woodward, Walter Pincus and Glenn Kessler of The Washington Post, David E. Sanger of The New York Times and Evan Thomas of Newsweek.

It was unclear if or how the cumulative impact of those reporters saying Mr. Libby had not discussed Ms. Wilson with them would lead jurors to discount the testimony of the two reporters who said earlier that he had, in fact, discussed her with them.

Mr. Libby's lawyers also made clear on Monday what they had only suggested in the past — that they do not want to put him on the witness stand. But it also seemed likely that if they kept Mr. Libby off the stand, they might be hampered in using one of the pillars of their planned defense: that any misstatements he made were the result of a faulty memory.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have said they want to tell the jury that Mr. Libby was not paying close attention to the issue of Ms. Wilson because he was preoccupied with far weightier policy matters like terrorism and the Iraq war.

Judge Reggie B. Walton suggested he might have been misled into believing that Mr. Libby would testify when he and lawyers for both sides spent more than two months arguing over how to put before the jury nonclassified accounts of the issues Mr. Libby had worked on.

"I didn't think that was the landscape in which we were operating," Judge Walton said in an annoyed tone.

He said that unless Mr. Libby testified, he did not think he would allow the defense to argue in its closing that the issue of Ms. Wilson was less important to him than the other matters.

Only Mr. Libby could say how important the issues were to him, Judge Walton said.

Mr. Libby's lawyers do not, however, want to expose him to cross-examination by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor.

John D. Cline, one of the defense lawyers, said he hoped to introduce evidence of Mr. Libby's busy schedule through testimony of his former top aide, John Hannah.

Mr. Cline did not mention the testimony of Mr. Cheney, casting uncertainty about whether the vice president will take the stand.

A surprise revelation came when Mr. Pincus, who writes about national security and intelligence, disclosed that he was first told on July 12, 2003, about Ms. Wilson by Ari Fleischer, then the White House spokesman, and not Mr. Libby. Mr. Fleischer testified late last month that he learned about Ms. Wilson from Mr. Libby, who passed on the information about her at a lunch on July 7, 2003, in the White House mess.

The testimony of the six journalists, with more than 200 years of combined reporting experience, added new strokes to the trial's portrait of close, confidential relations between Washington officials and the people who cover them. Interviews are routinely conducted "on background," in which officials demand anonymity in return for information.

"Almost every single conversation I have in Washington is on background," Mr. Kessler, who covers foreign affairs for The Post, told the jury.

The most vivid instance of a reporter at work came in a brief excerpt of a telephone interview by Mr. Woodward of Mr. Armitage.

Though only one minute of tape was played, the tone of their exchange — gossipy, confiding, sprinkled with expletives on Mr. Armitage's part — demonstrated vividly their close relationship.

Mr. Novak suggested how a columnist's politics could affect access. He said he spoke with Mr. Rove two or three times a week. But it took him two years to get an interview with Mr. Armitage, who was seen as not in tune with Mr. Novak's generally conservative views.

Journalists Testify That Libby Never Mentioned CIA Officer (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Six journalists testified yesterday that Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, never mentioned an undercover CIA officer to them -- and some said they learned about her identity from other administration sources.

As Libby's attorneys opened their defense in his perjury trial, they argued for a second time that Libby need not take the stand for them to present elements of a defense that his misstatements to investigators were the product of a faulty memory. An irritated U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he felt misled and believed Libby would testify.

Testifying as the first defense witness, Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus revealed that then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer was the first person to tell him, on July 12, 2003, that war critic Joseph C. Wilson IV was married to undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame. His remarks contradicted Fleischer's testimony as a prosecution witness last month.

Pincus was the first of six reporters to say they spoke to Libby, or were called by him, during a crucial period in June 2003 and early July 2003 but did not learn Plame's identity from him.

It is during this time that the prosecution says Libby was engaged in a fervent effort to discredit Wilson, who had publicly accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it justified the invasion of Iraq. Prosecutors contend that Plame's identity and CIA post were leaked to leave the impression that Wilson was chosen for a CIA-sponsored mission to Niger because of nepotism. Plame's name was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003.

Libby, 56, is not charged with the leak itself but with lying to investigators about conversations he had with reporters about Plame in the summer of 2003. The defense contends that Libby, who has pleaded not guilty, inaccurately remembered conversations with journalists because they were insignificant amid his pressing work on national security matters.

The journalists' testimony was designed to help Libby's defense by showing that the defendant did not mention Plame to every reporter with whom he spoke around the time of the leak and that other officials were discussing Plame at about the same time.

Bob Woodward, a best-selling author and an assistant managing editor of The Washington Post, told jurors that he learned about Plame during a mid-June 2003 interview with then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage for a book Woodward was researching on the Bush administration's decision to go to war in Iraq. He said he interviewed Libby later that month, and his notes indicate that Libby said nothing to him about Plame but that Woodward might have mentioned her to Libby.

Novak testified that he also learned of Plame's position at the CIA from Armitage on July 8, 2003, and confirmed the information with senior White House adviser Karl Rove, probably the next day.

In brief testimony that lasted less than 20 minutes each, reporters Glenn Kessler of the Post, David Sanger of the New York Times and Evan Thomas of Newsweek also told jurors that they spoke with Libby or were called by him during the key week before Novak disclosed Plame's identity. But none heard of Plame from Libby.

Pincus, who covers national security and intelligence issues for The Post, told jurors that he was in the office, talking to a source one Saturday in July about a story he was preparing about Wilson's mission to Niger.

"The person I was calling suddenly swerved off and said . . . 'Don't you know, in effect, his wife works at the CIA, is an analyst on weapons of mass destruction?' " Pincus testified. He told the court that the source said "that's why people aren't paying attention" to Wilson's conclusions that reports of Iraq trying to obtain nuclear material in Niger were unfounded -- because he had been sent on the mission by his wife.

Pincus's account conflicted with Fleischer's testimony last month. As a prosecution witness, Fleischer said he mentioned Plame only to two reporters -- John Dickerson, then of Time magazine, and David Gregory of NBC News -- during a July 2003 trip that President Bush took to Africa. Dickerson has said Fleischer never mentioned Plame to him.

A spokesman for Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald declined to comment on the conflicting testimony.

When Pincus gave a deposition to investigators during the federal probe of the CIA leak, he did not identify his source. He told jurors that he was naming Fleischer now because the former press secretary gave him permission to do so last week.

Woodward's testimony would make him the first journalist known to have been told about Plame by a Bush administration official. At the time of his interview with Armitage, Woodward said, he had learned through reporting that Wilson was the former ambassador who was sent to Africa by the CIA, and he was surprised Wilson's name had not yet surfaced publicly.

In a tape recording of the interview played for the jury, Armitage explains that the CIA took the Niger claim out of a presidential speech in October 2002 but it somehow found its way into Bush's State of the Union address months later. Woodward is heard asking about Wilson and how he happened to make the Niger trip. Some expletives in the conversation were redacted for the jury.

Armitage explains that "his wife works at the agency" on "WMD" issues.

"High enough that wife can say, 'Oh, yeah, hubby will go?' " Woodward asks.

Armitage responds that Wilson "knows Africa," and he ends the conversation with "How about that [expletive]?"

Novak said part of the reason he wrote about Wilson and his wife was that he found Wilson unpleasant and a "questionable choice" to look into the Niger claims after he met him while both were waiting to go onto a television interview program.

"He was saying that things had been done in a superior way in the National Security Council before in the Clinton administration," Novak recalled. "I thought it was sort of an obnoxious performance."

Defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. pressed Novak to say that hundreds of reporters and others could have known what was going to appear in his July 14 column in the days preceding its publication, because the material was sent over the Associated Press wire on July 11 or July 12. Novak said he discussed the information about Wilson's wife with a close friend, conservative lobbyist Richard Hohlt, on July 11.

Star Character Witnesses At Libby Trial (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

A familiar-looking man in his early 60s took the stand at the Scooter Libby trial yesterday morning. "I need to ask you to spell your last name," said defense attorney Bill Jeffress.

"W-O-O-D-W-A-R-D," the man replied.

This was not sufficient for Judge Reggie Walton. "We need your first name, too," he said.

"Oh," said the witness. "Bob. B-O-B."

Spectators laughed. Jurors ogled.

Jeffress continued this line of questioning. "What do you do for a living?"

"Assistant managing editor of The Washington Post and book author."

It was a rare moment at the federal courthouse yesterday, and not only because Washington's most famous journalist was answering questions from somebody other than Larry King. Woodward, columnist Robert Novak and a quartet of prominent journalists were called to the stand for the first day of Libby's defense.

Libby must believe himself to be in desperate legal straits to have six journalists serve as his character witnesses. And, indeed, the reporters' testimony appeared to do little to dent the prosecution's case that the former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney eagerly shared CIA officer Valerie Plame's name with reporters and then said otherwise under oath. But Libby's team did establish that the defendant wasn't the only administration official dishing about Plame.

The leadoff witness, The Post's Walter Pincus, testified that then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer told him about Plame's identity -- directly contradicting Fleischer's sworn testimony. Next, Woodward testified that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage told him about Plame. Novak fingered top Bush strategist Karl Rove as well as Armitage. Combine that with earlier testimony that Fleischer and Libby each leaked to two other reporters, and it seems possible prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald would have had an easier time finding out who in the administration didn't leak Plame's identity.

Defense lawyers, perhaps realizing that relying on reporters was a dicey proposition, sought to build up their credentials. First, Jeffress established that Pincus had shared in a Pulitzer Prize in 2002. Then he got it on the record that Woodward shared in two Pulitzers. David Sanger, who identified himself as "chief Washington correspondent for the New York Times," testified that "I've been fortunate enough to be on a few [Pulitzer-winning] teams."

"A few?" Jeffress asked.

"Two," Sanger amended.

"I believe you're the third Pulitzer Prize winner this morning," Fitzgerald observed dryly.

By the time it got to The Post's Glenn Kessler, the defense lawyer was sheepish. "I pretty much have to ask you this question: Have you won any awards?"

Pincus, wearing his reporter's dog tag around his collar and his tie loose, had the day's biggest revelation: Fleischer "swerved off" from the topic of a conversation in 2003 and told him about Plame's identity. As recently as two weeks ago, Fleischer testified otherwise, saying it's "absolutely correct" that he did not tell Pincus about the CIA worker.

"You've not been prosecuted for perjury?" Jeffress asked at the time.

"Absolutely correct," Fleischer answered.

Novak, whose column identifying Plame started the whole scandal, explained that while Rove and Armitage spoke to him about Plame, he didn't remember whether Libby did, because "I kind of discard unhelpful conversations in my memory bank." His memory bank did, however, retain the information that Plame's husband, Joe Wilson, was "obnoxious."

Novak reminded the jury that as a CNN contributor in 2003, he "was on about four different shows, 'Crossfire' included." But even in a crowded field, Woodward easily qualified as the star witness; the jurors were rapt as he gave them a pro bono journalism course.

"You're familiar with a term called 'off the record'?" Jeffress asked.

Woodward was. "It's confirmation for you and your editors but should not be in the story," he explained. He further explained how "it is my habit to bring a list of questions from one interview to the next because they reflect information I'm getting." And he admitted that this backfired in the case of Cheney, who balked at the 17-page list of questions titled "Q Cheney" and called off the interview. "I overplayed my hand," Woodward said.

Defense lawyers won permission to play for the jury a tape of his interview with Armitage. It showed a Woodward interview style that, in contrast to his broad narratives, is equal parts staccato, gossipy and profane.

Armitage: "His wife's a [expletive] analyst at the agency."
Woodward: "It's still weird."
Armitage: It's perfect . . . she is a WMD analyst out there."
Woodward: "Oh, she is."
Armitage: "Yeah.
Woodward: "Oh, I see."
Armitage: "[Expletive] look at it."
Woodward: "Oh I see. I didn't [expletive] . . ."
Armitage: "His wife is in the agency and is a WMD analyst. How about that [expletive]?"
The jurors chuckled as they listened to the scrubbed transcript.
"You redacted some words that were offensive," Woodward observed.
"Expletives? Yes," Jeffress answered.
Woodward seemed disappointed. "In the raw," he said, "it has a little more fire."

Journalists Take Stand In Libby's Defense (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Greg Miller
The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON — In the middle of June 2003, when Washington Post editor Bob Woodward sat down with a top source at the State Department, he had a question.

The capital was buzzing over a public attack by a former U.S. diplomat on one of the claims President Bush had made to justify the Iraq war. For support, the diplomat was citing a fact-finding trip he'd made to Africa on orders from CIA officials.

"Why would they send him?" a puzzled Woodward asked, referring to the ex-envoy, Joseph C. Wilson IV, who had been dispatched to Niger to assess the nuclear intentions of Saddam Hussein.

"Because his wife's a [expletive] analyst at the agency," Richard L. Armitage, then the deputy secretary of State, replied.

Woodward — and his taperecorded, expletive-laden exchange with Armitage — became a focus Monday at the trial of a top White House aide accused of lying to investigators about how the name of a CIA agent became public.

Woodward and a parade of other prominent Washington journalists have been called to testify about how they learned of the agent, Valerie Plame, married to Wilson. All said they had been told about Plame and her CIA role by government officials other than the defendant, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Monday's testimony came as Libby's lawyers launched a defense portraying their client as a scapegoat in a three-year federal probe into who leaked the identity of Plame, an agency analyst specializing in arms proliferation.

Whatever its value to the defense may prove to be, the journalists' testimony made one thing clear: At a time when the Bush administration's rationale for going to war was coming under increasing attack, officials in the White House and beyond were doing a lot of talking to reporters about Plame — even though it can be against the law to divulge the identity of covert intelligence agents.

In addition to Woodward, syndicated newspaper columnist Robert Novak testified Monday. Novak — whose disclosure of Plame's name and CIA connection in a July 14, 2003, piece kicked off the original leak furor — said he had heard about Plame from White House political guru Karl Rove, as well as from Armitage.

Reporter Walter Pincus of the Washington Post also took the stand, saying then-White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer had given him the information.

The government has not alleged that Libby was the first person to divulge Plame's identity nor that he was the first to leak information that was published about her.

Rather, he is charged with essentially orchestrating a cover-up of his involvement.

Rove, Fleischer and Armitage have acknowledged speaking to reporters about Wilson's wife. Libby is the only person charged with a crime.

Novak and Pincus said they had spoken with Libby in summer 2003 about the controversy surrounding Wilson's claim that the Bush administration had twisted prewar intelligence in Iraq.

But both men said Libby did not provide them information about Plame. Their comments were echoed by three other prominent Washington journalists in the witness box Monday: David Sanger, chief Washington correspondent for the New York Times; Evan Thomas, editor at large of Newsweek; and Glenn Kessler, another Post reporter.

Woodward, famous for helping break open the Watergate scandal, has been a provocative figure in the story about Plame and Wilson.

Though he apparently was the first journalist to learn her identity in the scandal, he did not disclose the fact until after Libby was indicted in October 2005.

Woodward testified that he spoke with Armitage on June 13, 2003, while preparing a book on the administration's decision to go to war in Iraq.

He turned a copy of the interview over to prosecutors in the investigation.

The excerpt played for the jury, about a minute long, provided an unusual window into the reporting process — edited for profanities.

"Joe Wilson's been calling everybody," Armitage said on the recording. "He's pissed off because he was designated as a low-level guy." Armitage proceeded to tell Woodward about Wilson's wife's CIA connection.

"It's still weird," Woodward responded.

"It — it's perfect. This is what she does," Armitage said. "She is a WMD analyst out there." (WMD stands for weapons of mass destruction.)

Woodward: "Oh, she is?"

Armitage: "Yeah."

Woodward: "Oh, I see."

In testimony, Woodward was deliberate and poised. When the tape was played for the court — a scene that might have been expected to make him wince, since he had promised confidentiality — he cracked a joke about gaps in the recording where Armitage uttered an obscenity.

"In the raw, it has a little more fire," Woodward said.

But Woodward, like others, was clearly uncomfortable with describing conversations that were supposed to be confidential, and he repeatedly mentioned that he had obtained permission from his sources to discuss those conversations.

With the journalists' testimony, the defense aimed to make the case not only that Libby wasn't the source of the leak, but that he repeatedly passed up opportunities to whisper Plame's name to the press.

As usual in this trial, the testimony was often more interesting in its revelations about the workings of Washington.

The controversy began when Wilson wrote in a newspaper opinion piece that there was no credible support for administration claims that Hussein had tried to obtain nuclear weapons material from Niger.

On assignment for the CIA, Wilson had made a trip to Africa to look into the question, which had arisen in the intelligence community before it became a subject of public dispute. Wilson wrote that his investigation had found no proof of the claim, and he accused the administration of misrepresenting intelligence on the subject.

The White House, especially Vice President Dick Cheney, was furious about Wilson's article, which also suggested that Cheney had a role in arranging the fact-finding mission to Africa. Libby was then Cheney's chief of staff.

Pincus, who was among the first to write about Wilson's allegations, testified Monday about an early effort by the White House to contain the controversy.

Pincus said he got a call at the Post on a Saturday from Fleischer, who sought to portray Wilson's trip to Niger as a "boondoggle."

Fleischer "suddenly swerved" off other topics and argued that the uranium story was being overplayed, Pincus said.

He said Fleischer challenged him to explain: "Why do you keep writing about Joseph Wilson and Joseph Wilson's trip? Don't you know his wife works at the CIA? … She's the one who sent him on this trip. That's why no one is paying attention."

At Libby Trial, A Boondoggle Of A Time (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 13, 2007

He said he had nothing against Joseph Wilson. That he didn't know Valerie Plame was Wilson's wife.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. said a lot of things in eight hours of grand-jury testimony. But somewhere in the lengthy recordings, it was revealed for the first time in Libby's perjury trial, that he actively contributed to a smear campaign against Wilson in an effort to destroy his credibility as a Bush administration critic.

And that naturally involved Plame, the former CIA agent whose identity was a casualty of the dustup between Wilson and the White House.

That March 2004 testimony, played before the jury last week in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, is a linchpin of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's case against Libby, the former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney.

In it, Libby admitted that he spoke to at least one reporter in July 2003 during which he called Wilson's excursion to Niger -- investigating what later proved to be a bogus claim over Iraq's purchase of uranium -- nothing more than a "boondoggle."

And befitting a case in which words play the prominent role, much of the back-and-forth between the prosecutor and Libby about that conversation involved whether the term "boondoggle" was ever used -- and, indeed, whether Plame and Wilson were ever even mentioned.

WHAT BOONDOGGLE?

Libby, 56, is not charged with leaking classified information, but he is the only person charged as a result of Fitzgerald's 2 1/2-year investigation.

Prosecutors say Libby began asking questions about Wilson in May 2003 after the former ambassador was an unnamed source in a New York Times column that questioned the credibility of Cheney's role in developing the administration's rationale for invading Iraq. Libby first learned Wilson's wife was employed at the CIA in early June 2003 from Cheney. Six current and former government officials have testified in the trial that they discussed Plame's CIA employment with Libby in the following days and month before his conversation with reporters.

Libby says he found a note that says Cheney told him about Plame in June. But he says he had no recollection of this when he spoke with NBC's Tim Russert a month later, who Libby says told him about Plame. Last week on the witness stand, Russert called Libby's version of events "impossible."

But buried in the grand-jury testimony was the account of yet another reporter, The Washington Post's Glenn Kessler. Kessler was one of four reporters Libby tried to reach that Saturday, July 12, 2003, after returning from the christening of the USS Ronald Reagan in Norfolk, Va.

Throughout his testimony, Libby was fairly certain that he spoke with Kessler about Plame -- something Kessler, who is expected to testify when the defense begins its case this week, has stated he never discussed with Libby.

By the account of Cathie Martin, the former press secretary for Cheney who sat in on the call, the July 12 Kessler conversation was brief. Kessler was on his cell phone and at the zoo and asked Libby to call back later.

But during Libby's first appearance before the grand jury on March 5, 2004, Libby did not recall Kessler cutting off the conversation. Instead, Libby said he probably told Kessler that other reporters were saying the same things about Plame as he told then-Time reporter Matthew Cooper.

"What I recall about this conversation was that Glenn Kessler was at the zoo with his kids, and yet he was able to have this lucid conversation," Libby told the grand jury, "something I could never do with my kids at the zoo on a sunny day with, you know, hundreds of people milling around. And then he was able to have this conversation, which I thought was pretty impressive, actually, and we talked about this stuff."

Fitzgerald thought otherwise. During Libby's second grand-jury appearance, just 19 days later, Fitzgerald handed Libby a copy of an October 2003 newspaper article, pulled from Libby's files, indicating that a Washington Post reporter had been told by a White House official on July 12 of that year that the administration was not putting much credence in Wilson because he had been sent on a "boondoggle" by his wife.

Reading this, Fitzgerald asked, did Libby ever wonder if the coincidence of the date and the attribution could mean that Libby was, in fact, this White House source?

"I did not," Libby said. "I had a conversation with a Washington Post reporter on July 12 and that dawned on me, but what this described was not my conversation."

Well, did you tell him it was a boondoggle? Fitzgerald quizzed.

"Quite to the contrary," Libby said flatly. He said he had merely emphasized then-CIA Director George Tenet's statement that Cheney had never been told about the Wilson mission.

Fitzgerald interjected, "And you didn't relay a concern that this wasn't taken seriously by the administration, even though your boss had expressed that?"

Libby didn't budge.

Well, Fitzgerald pushed, was it possible that anything you said could have led Kessler to such a characterization?

"No, sir, I don't think so," Libby answered. "Kessler said to me, 'Was this a boondoggle?'" Libby quickly tried to downplay this statement. "I said, 'What I think is important about this is how he may have gotten the wrong information, not that it was a boondoggle.'"

Now the prosecutor was confused: Was it a boondoggle or not?

"No, I mean it was a boondoggle in the sense that the guy got a trip," Libby said. "I've never thought that boondoggle was what was the important point here."

So, then, it was a boondoggle? Fitzgerald asked.

"Not in bad sense, but a boondoggle," Libby replied.

There was still the problem of timing. Libby still couldn't place the date of this conversation. But he didn't think it was July 12 because he had made those press calls in the car, and he had a memory that when Kessler raised the question of a "boondoggle," he was standing.

"Standing where?" Fitzgerald asked.

"I remember sort of either sitting or leaning down after he said it," Libby said, quickly adding that the "boondoggle" was not what was important, it was how Wilson could have gotten the wrong information.

"Did you ever indicate to him that Wilson's trip was not a boondoggle?"

"No," Libby replied.

Fitzgerald continued in his matter-of-fact tone, "Is this the first time you've described a boondoggle?"

Libby paused. "I don't recall. It might be."

Bill Would Make ISPs Keep Data On Users (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Questions Are Raised On Privacy, Practicality

A House Republican is pushing a measure that echoes a long-sought Bush administration goal: to require all Internet service providers to keep records on their subscribers.

The measure, introduced by Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Tex.) last week as part of the larger SAFETY Act, would give the attorney general broad discretion to write the rules on what information companies have to retain and for how long.

It is aimed at protecting children from predators, but privacy advocates say its privacy and civil-liberties implications are huge, and industry is concerned about the costs of compliance. News of the measure has spread around the blogosphere, as critics seek to mobilize opposition to the SAFETY Act.

The provision would require Internet service companies to provide at a minimum the Internet subscriber's name and address, which can be linked to an Internet protocol address -- an identification number associated with a particular computer at a given time. Law enforcement officials would have to obtain a subpoena to have access to the records and could not use the tool to track law-abiding citizens on the Internet, Smith said.

Smith, the ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee, said law enforcement has identified mandatory data retention as "the number one tool" it needs to identify and prosecute Internet sexual predators. Last year, the European Union adopted a two-year data-retention requirement for all Internet service providers, and Smith said Congress should adopt a similar law that balances the cost of retaining data with the benefits to law enforcement.

But Lauren Weinstein, co-founder of People for Internet Responsibility, an advocacy group, said Smith's proposal is far too vague. "This bill is so incredibly bad that it opens up a whole array of things that can go wrong, because there's nothing in this legislation to prevent the attorney general from simply saying, 'Save everything forever,' " he said.

He called data retention the "single most important issue" relating to privacy, free speech and technology.

Under mandatory data retention, the chances of targeting innocent people would go up, opponents say. In Arlington County last summer, detectives thought they had tracked an Internet child predator to an apartment, only to find that their target was an innocent elderly woman whose computer's wireless router sent a signal throughout her 10-story building that could be easily hijacked.

Last fall, a child-porn squad in central Virginia led by sheriffs armed with semiautomatic pistols scared a farmer who was mistakenly targeted when his Internet provider gave authorities the incorrect IP address.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who began pushing for mandatory data retention about a year ago, told the Senate Judiciary Committee last month that child exploitation investigations have hit dead ends because Internet service providers were not required to keep subscriber data.

A Justice Department spokeswoman said the department had not taken a position on Smith's proposal but was looking at data retention. "We do believe that there is a need for it," spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

What concerns both privacy advocates and industry is the bill's open-endedness.

"The Smith proposal would give the attorney general carte blanche to require service providers to keep all information imaginable on every one of their users," said Kate Dean, executive director of the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, which represents the nine major providers, including AOL, AT&T, Microsoft, Yahoo and Comcast.

Dean also said the measure could affect a wide range of service providers. "Does this cover wi-fi providers and coffee shops and hotels? Schools and libraries? And, most importantly, the government itself, because that remains unclear."

John Morris, policy director for the Center for Technology and Democracy, said the risks for civil liberties would be enormous if a bill that extends to content of e-mails, computer instant messaging and Web surfing habits. "I would expect that the Justice Department would impose an extremely broad data-retention mandate," he said.

The sheer volume of data could be overwhelming. The amount of data in a week's worth of short instant messages alone would fill two Libraries of Congress, Morris said. Dean said the data retention could impose new costs on innovation. "Any blanket data-retention requirement would dramatically affect new services that companies bring to the market," she said, referring to potential new storage requirements.

The issues proliferate, she said: What if there's a technical failure? Would the data need to be kept "live" for quicker law enforcement access or stored on tapes? Would the data be kept for one year, 20 years or indefinitely?

Weinstein, a computer scientist who focuses on technology's impact, said people interested in child porn could easily use computer viruses to direct innocent people's machines to download the images and then shoot the images back to the perpetrators through obscure channels that are difficult to trace.

Justice Defends Death Penalty (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department is defending the practice of seeking the death penalty in jurisdictions such as the District where local law bars capital punishment, including in the ongoing trial of a D.C. man accused of being an enforcer for a violent drug gang.

"The Department of Justice has a protocol that ensures that the federal death penalty is applied uniformly throughout the country, regardless of the local laws," acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling wrote in a letter to Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting member of Congress.

Mrs. Norton, a Democrat, wrote a letter last month to the office of U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor criticizing its pursuit of the death penalty in the trial of Larry Gooch.

Mr. Gooch is on trial in federal court in the District on murder, racketeering and drug trafficking charges. He is accused of killing four persons, assisting in another slaying and shooting at a police officer while acting as enforcer for the M Street Crew, a PCP ring in Northeast.

D.C. law bars capital punishment, but prosecutors can seek the death penalty in federal cases.

"Repeatedly seeking the death penalty in the face of jury and court verdicts to the contrary risks the appearance of an office seeking to show it can get death penalty convictions even in the District of Columbia," Mrs. Norton wrote in her letter to Mr. Taylor.

She expressed concern about "the apparent emergence of a new and troubling pattern" of death penalty cases in the District, "despite consistent failure with juries and the federal courts."

Mr. Hertling said federal prosecutors in the District have not increased their pursuit of the death penalty under the Bush administration.

As attorney general in the Clinton administration, Janet Reno authorized the death penalty in four cases, including those of so-called Murder Inc. drug kingpins Kevin Gray and Rodney Moore, convicted of 19 and 10 murders, respectively.

The Justice Department authorized the death penalty in three D.C. cases during the Bush administration, Mr. Hertling said.

In two of the cases, federal court rulings on various legal points ultimately prevented authorities from seeking capital punishment. The other case involves Gooch, whose trial is expected to last several months.

The D.C.-based Death Penalty Information Center records 47 federal death-row prisoners in the United States, including four from Virginia and two from Maryland.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the center, said the federal government has been seeking the death penalty even in jurisdictions where local laws prohibit capital punishment.

In 2000, he said, federal death row held no inmates convicted of crimes in states that outlaw the death penalty. Today, the number is six. Mr. Dieter said that does not include a recent case in New York, where a state court ruled the death penalty unconstitutional but capital punishment remains on the books.

"There are some signals of a more aggressive use of the federal death penalty," he said. "I don't think anybody would deny that when you seek it in Massachusetts or North Dakota or Puerto Rico or any of these places, then you're going to have a broader use of the death penalty than you would have had if you mostly restricted it to places where voters have agreed to support the death penalty."

Mr. Gooch's federal racketeering case makes him eligible for the death penalty.

Prosecutors were prohibited from seeking the death penalty against Antwuan Ball and David Wilson, accused of running another drug gang known as Congress Park Crew, because of a missed filing deadline.

Mr. Hertling told Mrs. Norton in his letter that the filing delay was caused by "the intensive and meticulous deliberations of the U.S. Attorney's Office ... and the Department of Justice's capital case review committee."

Court Defines Official Bribery Narrowly (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 13, 2007

Members of Congress or any other public officials under FBI investigation for corruption owe a former D.C. police officer a debt of gratitude.

Investigations into the activities of convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), as well as reviews of numerous questionable land deals, recently have expanded and may well ensnare other members of Congress and their aides in lengthy legal battles. But an appeals court decision involving a sting operation on a police detective could undermine efforts to prosecute the cases.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit Court Friday confirmed a previous ruling by an appeals panel allowing Nelson Valdes, a former Metropolitan Police Department detective, to walk free.

A sting operation caught Valdes taking several hundred dollars in cash for running license plates through a law enforcement database and handing over the information he collected on the vehicles' owners to an FBI informant.

The jury thought the bribery charges were too harsh and so convicted Valdes on three counts of accepting illegal gratuities, a lesser crime in 2002. But Friday's decision would affect bribery cases as well.

In a 7-to-5 opinion Friday, the court determined that Valdes's activities were not part of his official duties and thus fell outside the federal bribery statute.

"It is the corruption of officials' decisions through the misuse of influence in governmental decision-making which the bribery statute makes criminal," wrote senior Circuit Judge Stephen Williams, referring to an earlier opinion issued by the same court.

In that 1979 decision, the court found that an assistant secretary for labor relations at the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) had not accepted illegal gratuities for an official act when taking money from people outside the government for selling private auto-insurance plans to labor unions with whose leaders he also dealt on official HUD business.

"Thus, both our precedent and the language of the statute make clear that [the bribery statute] is not about officials' moonlighting, or their misuse of government resources, or the two in combination," Williams wrote.

But other circuit judges vehemently disagreed. "… This is a simple - but far from inconsequential - case," wrote Circuit Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson. "The man on the street grasps what my colleagues in the majority so inexplicably resist: you cannot lawfully give money to a law enforcement officer for performing a function of his office."

The Campaign Legal Center, a D.C. watchdog group, filed an amicus brief arguing to let the conviction stand. Gerry Hebert, a lawyer for the Center and one of the authors of the brief, said the decision was so split that the Supreme Court will probably have to step in and decide the matter.

Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said government lawyers are still evaluating the opinion, so it's too early to say whether they will seek Supreme Court review.

But there is no doubt in Hebert's mind that the Justice Department should do everything it can to reverse the appellate court decision. He also wants Congress to step in and make the bribery statute clearer.

"Lawyers in criminal cases prosecuted for bribery will attempt to use this very narrow definition of official duty for what should be criminalized conduct," he said. "… You'll have a difficult time prosecuting public officials who are using their office for their own financial gain."

Plea-bargaining Complaint Fails (KNOXNS)

Moncier's client gets 12-year prison term despite protest

GREENEVILLE - His attorney may have put plea bargaining on trial, but longtime Cocke County criminal Michael Vassar is the one who racked up a 12-year prison term Monday.

"Plea bargaining is a fact of life," U.S. District Judge Ronnie Greer said late Monday night after defense attorney Herbert S. Moncier spent hours mounting an attack on the way federal prosecutors mete out deals. "As distasteful as it may be at times, it's an everyday factor in law enforcement."

Vassar was convicted last year in a cocaine conspiracy case involving fellow Cocke Countians, including bus driver Dewey Lynn Phillips. It was part of the Rose Thorn corruption probe mounted in Cocke County by the FBI, with help from the Tennessee Highway Patrol.

The conviction came after Vassar won acquittals in at least two other cases. But the battle has been costly for both sides. Moncier has bombarded Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith with hundreds, maybe even more than a thousand, motions, exhibits and documents. His arguments had grown so intense that Greer late last year accused Moncier of contempt and ordered him briefly jailed.

Since then, however, Greer has allowed the contempt charge to linger, with no hearing date set. And, although he had removed Moncier from Vassar's case, he later entered an order allowing Moncier to take back the defense reins.

Neither Greer nor Moncier mentioned the contempt charge during Monday's hours-long hearing. In fact, Greer seemed to ignore his own order limiting arguments to 30 minutes per side, allowing Moncier to argue, at one point, for more than an hour during one phase of the multitiered sentencing process.

Moncier spent most of that time airing a complaint he has long made that federal prosecutors are "manipulating" the system via the plea-bargaining process. Moncier contends that Smith cut a slew of deals in Vassar's case, allowing, for instance, a guy pushing dozens of pounds of cocaine to walk away with 76 months in prison, while Vassar, convicted of peddling far less of the drug, was staring at a minimum 168-month prison term.

"What the government has done is manipulate the guideline sentences," Moncier said. "If the government is manipulating the guidelines then the guidelines become meaningless and that completely destroys what Congress intended."

The way Moncier sees it, prosecutors cut deals with drug dealers in which they are sentenced based on far less drugs than they actually peddled to get them to snitch on others. Then, they offer up breaks for that snitch work, Moncier argued.

Folks like Vassar, who refuse to plead guilty or cooperate, wind up facing much heftier prison terms because no such deals are offered, the attorney said.

Smith need not respond, however. Judge Greer was quick to counter that there was nothing illegal or improper with the deal-making process. He also pointed out that Vassar, with more than a dozen felony convictions under his belt, earned the 12-year prison term Greer wound up doling out.

"Here you are again," Greer said to Vassar. "Two prior (federal) prison terms did not deter you. Your attorney is asking me to compare apples to oranges to the extent the government's plea bargaining decisions result in (sentencing) disparities, it seems to me, that's up to Congress and the public to address."

DA, Police Chief Discuss Stemming Violent Crime (AP)

By Mary Foster, The Associated Press

AP, February 13, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — A month after an estimated 5,000 people marched on City Hall to protest violent crime, several hundred turned out to hear police Superintendent Warren Riley and District Attorney Eddie Jordan answer questions by the City Council.

A standing-room crowd, that included more than a dozen police officers in uniform, listened as the city's top law enforcement duo detailed progress in stemming violent crime.

The commitment to stop violent crime is strong, Riley said. But when asked to predict the future, he refused.

"I can't tell you what's going to happen in 90 days," Riley said. "The entire system has to work to say what happens in 90 days."

The extra 25 officers federal agencies have lent the city are making a difference, Riley said. They currently are working with departments ranging from the SWAT team to Crime Abatement and narcotics, he said.

FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said just getting the word out that federal agents are working the streets has been a deterrent.

There have been 21 murders in the city this year.

Police and federal officers also have targeted three areas in the city where violent crime is most prevalent, Riley said.

Federal officers are committed for 90 days, and began on Jan. 3, Riley said. The city also is being patrolled by 800 National Guardsmen and 60 State Police.

Attrition remains a problem for the police department, Riley said. He has lost over 420 officers in the last two years, and more than 20 this year, he said.

The hot-button issue for the crowd was the so-called 701 Releases. That refers to Article 701 of the Louisiana Code of Criminal Procedure, which states that no one can be held longer than 60 days on a felony arrest without an indictment.

In New Orleans that occurs mostly in drug arrests, Jordan said. He blamed problems with getting lab results. New Orleans' crime lab was lost to Hurricane Katrina and the city has been getting needed work done by other parishes, which causes delays.

"A field test is sufficient for probable cause," Jordan said. "But is not admissible in court. In order to prosecute we must have lab tests."

The city is expected to sign a contract for a new lab with the University of New Orleans on Tuesday, director of Homeland Security Terry Ebbert said. The lab should be at least partially functional within 45 days, he said.

Council members stressed the need for greater cooperation between the district attorney's office and the police department, something both Riley and Jordan pledged to do.

The district attorney's office is implementing software that will track cases in danger of being dismissed, he said. He and Riley also said they would hold joint training sessions to prepare police investigations and district attorney cases for trial.

Council Grills DA, Police Chief Over Rampant Crime (NOTP)

By Brendan McCarthy, Staff writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 13, 2007

Members of City Council grilled the city's police chief and the district attorney in an a tense, four-hour committee hearing Monday on the problems that plague the city's criminal justice system.

Both New Orleans Police Superintendent Warren Riley and District Attorney Eddie Jordan said they were eager to work together to squash surging city crime. But the meeting ended with its fair share of fingerpointing and few resolutions.

The pair's fractured working relationship was on full display as councilmembers pressed them on the state of their departments, the high release rate and the low conviction of arrested individuals, tying those problems to a lack of cooperation among their offices.

The hearing before the criminal justice committee, and a standing room crowd of more than 200 people, became at-times an exercise in political theater that more closely resembled a trip to the principal's office.

"The relationship has to improve," said councilman Arnie Fielkow, in dressing down the pair.

Throughout the meeting, councilmembers demanded results, along with measurable outcomes and benchmarks to grade their top law enforcement officers in the future.

"What is it that you are trying to accomplish? What should those results be, and when are we going to see them? And if they don't work by what date, how are we going to try something else?" councilwoman Shelley Midura asked.

Riley shied away from setting hard goals or timelines.

"All I can tell you is that we are doing all we can," Riley said. "I can't tell you what is going to happen in 90 days. The entire system has to work to say what happens in 90 days."

Riley did make one concrete commitment: to ask for more help from the federal government. The chief said he would petition to extend the stay of 25 loaned officers from the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

But for the most part, the meeting devolved into a blame game, with the council acting as referee. Remarking on the reluctance of Riley and Jordan to set a date for interoffice training, councilman Oliver Thomas joked, "Whatever it takes, move next door to each other."

Following the meeting, Midura said she was left dissatisfied and even more concerned.

"Not just lip service, people want results," she said. "I would have rather heard them acknowledge the problem. All I heard was that this is someone else's fault, that we don't have this, we don't have that. There are no assessment tools and no long term strategic plan to address the reforms that must occur."

A large part of the day was spent discussing how the two offices could better coordinate their efforts.

Jordan suggested joint training for prosecutors and police officers, saying there has been none. Riley struck back, saying Jordan "may not remember" a program within the last 7 months that had officers in 8- to 16-hour sessions on writing police reports that will stand up in court.

"We need more than joint training," Jordan added. "I'm talking about access across the board."

Jordan suggested embedding prosecutors in police districts so they can better track cases from the start. Riley said he would "welcome" assistant district attorney's at crime scenes.

Councilmembers were particularly interested in "701s", shorthand for Article 701 of the Louisiana Code of Criminal Procedure. It states that no one can be held longer than 60 days on a felony arrest without an indictment. Prosecutors may refile charges against 701'd suspects if they get complete police reports, but often a 701 release amounts to the writing on the wall, and cases fall by the wayside.

In the eight months before the hurricane, the city released 187 people on a 701, including eight murder suspects, prosecutors' records show. In 2006, the number of releases soared to about 3,000. And last month alone, 580 people escaped legal custody of either jail or a bond obligation only because prosecutors couldn't pull together a case ahead of the deadline imposed by law.

Jordan put the blame for some 701 releases on a lack of lab-tested evidence and incomplete police reports. He said police use probable cause to make an arrest, a lesser standard than the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard required for a conviction.

Riley responded that the officers handling homicide and violent crime cases were experienced in writing police reports.

"They do provide excellent police reports and excellent investigations," he said.

The standing room crowd reacted; some laughed, some clapped, many shook their heads.

"This is the kind of stuff that drives the people crazy," Midura said to Riley, as they briefly talked over each other.

Then it was Jordan's turn to address the hot-button issue.

"I'm not going to say anything other than the fact that we need good police reports," he said.

The thinly veiled finger-pointing went back and forth. Uneasily, and after public criticism from Fielkow, the men agreed to continue with ongoing training and meet at a later date. During the hearing, attendees learned that Riley and Jordan do not meet regularly.

Both Riley and Jordan agreed that the lack of a NOPD crime lab has hindered the prosecution process.

The council asked Jordan why his office didn't accept the results of field testing kits, used by officers to test drugs. He said the field test was not admissable in court.

Riley said the federal government has used the field tests for nearly 20 years.

"We have tried and want to encourage Mr. Jordan to use the field testing kits on these narcotics cases," he said.

The impasse appeared to be somewhat solved when Jordan agreed to use the tests on "selected" cases.

However, Col. Terry Ebbert, director of homeland security under New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, said that a lease for a crime lab site at the University of New Orleans would be finalized Tuesday. It could be up and running within 60 days, he said.

The police currently ship out evidence to neighboring parish labs and private firms. Jordan said the lack of a lab has hurt cases. He said post-Katrina evidence is stored in a NOPD property room, and it takes 5 days written notice to retrieve any item. Pre-Katrina evidence is kept in a basement with a rodent problem, which made items "not available all the time," Jordan said.

"Apparently the rodent problem is very serious at this time," he added.

New Orleans' Legal System Still Feeling Pain Of Hurricane Katrina (LAW)

By Vesna Jaksic, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 13, 2007

As chairwoman of the board overseeing New Orleans' public defender office, Denise "Denny" LeBoeuf knows the city's legal system is struggling, but talks about it as if it were a miracle waiting to happen.

"I think this is going to be a destination office for young lawyers who want to do public defense in the years to come," said LeBoeuf, a veteran criminal defense attorney. "And no one would have said that before Katrina."

But New Orleans has a way to go before LeBoeuf's "miracle" sees the light of day.

Only about half of the needed 70 public defenders have been hired. Judges' patience sometimes wears thin, leading one to recently jail a public defender because no one from his office showed up in court. And Hurricane Katrina's impact lingers everywhere, whether it's residents' stress levels, businesses' limited hours or the city's damaged roads.

A year and a half after Katrina flooded New Orleans, the city's legal system continues to limp along with understaffed courts, a poorly funded public defense system and temporary prison accommodations.

While lawyers said civil courts are functioning more or less the way they were before Katrina, they used words such as "mess" and "nightmare" to describe the post-Katrina criminal justice system. But many New Orleans lawyers note that Katrina damaged an already ailing system -- creating a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to rebuild it from scratch.

"We're in the midst of a revolutionary process," said Pamela Metzger, associate professor of law and director of the criminal law clinic at Tulane University Law School, one of nine board members appointed in April to oversee Orleans Public Defenders.

"I do believe that at the end of the day -- 10, 20 years down the line -- at least in the area of public defense we're creating a model for what public defense can become," Metzger said.

PROGRESS AND PITFALLS

In Orleans Parish, where about 85 percent of defendants are indigent, the public defense system employed 42 lawyers before Katrina, most of whom were part-time employees earning a starting annual salary of $29,000, LeBoeuf said. Because

Louisiana's public defense system primarily runs on revenues from traffic tickets and other fines -- the only such system in the country -- most of them were laid off when the office went broke after Katrina.

While some lawyers never left, more than 30 lawyers have been hired since April and their jobs are now full time, with a starting annual salary of $40,000, LeBoeuf said. Only six lawyers have not returned because they wanted to keep their private practices, said Phil Wittmann, the board's secretary.

Public defenders now have offices across from the courthouse for the first time. Also for the first time, a computerized organizational system has been implemented, LeBoeuf said. In order to improve attorney-client relationships, the system has moved toward "vertical representation," meaning lawyers are assigned to clients, not courtrooms.

Some judges have criticized the new public defense system, saying there is no money to keep it going. Judges also question the new vertical representation meth-od because it leads to less familiarity with lawyers who show up in their courtrooms, the lawyers said.

"A part of the criticism we're seeing from the judges that are speaking publicly about this is, 'What you guys are doing is not going to be sustainable in the long haul because you don't have a sustainable pipeline of funding,'" said Carmelite Bertaut, past president of the New Orleans Bar Association who works at New Orleans' Stone Pigman Walther Wittmann.

Orleans Parish Criminal District Court Chief Judge Raymond Bigelow did not return calls seeking comment.

'PROCESSED' NOT REPRESENTED

Many lawyers said the changes are for the better -- but not nearly enough.

"Money is the hugest obstacle," said Stephen Singer, professor at Loyola University New Orleans School of Law, who is chief of trials for the public defender's office.

"We simply have insufficient funds to hire the people we need, not just lawyers, but also support personnel," Singer said. "The lawyers don't have the time to do the work they need to do on their cases and the court is currently like a meat-processing plant -- cases get processed, but they don't get represented."

The budget for the Orleans Parish public defender system is seriously underfunded at only about $2.5 million, so the system continues to struggle, Singer said. In an incident that several lawyers said exemplified the level of frustration, Singer was jailed by a judge for several hours in January after a public defender did not show up for a hearing, something Singer said was the result of a staffing shortage due to a lawyer's honeymoon.

A U.S. Department of Justice report recently found the public defender's office needs 70 full-time lawyers and additional support staff. The report estimated that with salary, equipment, furniture and other costs, it will cost $10.7 million to operate the office in its first year and $8.2 million annually after that.

The federal government has delivered some relief. The Justice Department has made nearly $30 million in grants available to New Orleans and Orleans Parish to help rebuild the state and city criminal justice systems.

In total, the Justice Department gave Louisiana more than $61 million in justice-assistance grants and Katrina-related law enforcement infrastructure funds. The department also said it was providing assistance in other areas, such as hiring additional Assistant U.S. Attorneys.

A Justice Department official said the department does not release how many Assistant U.S. Attorneys it has in various offices around the country. But in New Orleans, the office now has two more full-time U.S. Attorneys than it did pre-Katrina, as well as 10 "detailees," who will work in the office until they are no longer needed.

The federal courts in and around New Orleans have fared better, but are also having problems.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals temporarily moved to Houston and reopened in January 2006. But the 5th Circuit clerk's office in New Orleans was reduced from 93 employees before Katrina to 83 after, and more employees may leave, said Michelle Meyers, the personnel specialist.

"We're still in post-Katrina mode," she said. "We just got notification from one of our employees who's been out a lot that she's taking an extended medical leave because of post-traumatic stress. ... We have many employees that are not in their homes; many employees that don't know what they are doing yet, waiting to see if they can rebuild."

After Katrina, employees of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana in New Orleans were divided between Lafayette and Baton Rouge until the office officially reopened in November 2005.

Only one of about 200 employees of the U.S. district court in New Orleans has not returned to work since Katrina, said Julie Harrison, the docket supervisor.

BEYOND CRIMINAL DEFENSE

Such issues and frustrations stretch well beyond the Big Easy's criminal defense system.

The police department's crime lab is not functioning yet, leaving some prosecutors worried about an overload of cases they will get once it becomes fully operational.

Only about 2,000 of the 6,000 prisoners have been able to return to the parish prison and the rest are scattered throughout the state, said Wittmann, a partner at Stone Pigman Walther Wittmann.

The tunnel that was used before Katrina to get the parish prison's inmates to court is still closed, adding to the logistical difficulties, said Brian Privor, who is mostly handling adult felonies while his Washington office of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius is lending him to the New Orleans' public defender's office for six months.

"Because of the logistical realities of the post-Katrina world, it's certainly more difficult for both the prosecution and the defense to work their way through the court system," Privor said. "It's slower, there are fewer personnel and sheriffs to oversee the inmates, fewer lawyers to go around and talk to them, the accommodations are not as accommodating, copies of police reports don't show up like they used to -- everything is just more challenging with the very first appearance in the court system."

The Orleans Parish District Attorney's Office relocated to a former nightclub after Katrina and has been temporarily housed in an office building for the last six months, said Gaynell Williams, first assistant district attorney.

It was not until about a month ago that all of the 88 lawyers returned to work, Williams said. And with many people gone from the state, cases now take longer to prosecute, she said.

"We are still encountering problems dealing with witnesses," she said. "We are unable to locate them and evidence has been destroyed."

THE CIVIL SIDE

New Orleans native William Rittenberg has been practicing law in Louisiana for more than 30 years, but he is suddenly doing administrative work that his assistants used to handle.

With only about 40 percent of New Orleans' pre-Katrina population of 455,000 back in the city, business has declined and some employees have not returned, Rittenberg said. His practice area used to have three support staff for seven attorneys, and now has only one secretary, whom they share with another division.

"I'm doing things that I haven't done in over 20 years -- writing checks and dealing with bookkeeping and stuffing envelopes," said Rittenberg, a partner at New Orleans' Rittenberg, Samuel & Phillips.

Rittenberg said a court clerk recently told him to search for a document in a large pile because the staff was down to the minimum and did not have time to retrieve paperwork.

Gary Bezet, managing partner in the Baton Rouge office of the 120-attorney Kean Miller Hawthorne D'Armond McCow-an & Jarman, said that in one pending case involving an oil company, it took him several months to track down a witness because he had left Louisiana after Katrina.

Meanwhile, Katrina-related lawsuits, mostly claims against insurance companies, have piled up in the U.S. District Court for Eastern Louisiana in New Orleans. Nearly 12,000 cases were filed in 2006, about three times the number in a typical year, Harrison said.

"We have other courts in other parts of the country helping us because we can't keep up," she said, explaining that they have been assisting with electronic filing of paperwork into the court system.

Brent Barriere, a partner with Phelps Dunbar, a 260-lawyer firm based in New Orleans, said the civil courts are dealing with an avalanche of paperwork just as things are starting to get back to normal.

"I think it's going to take years for the system to fully flush out all these cases," he said.

In Philadelphia, A 'Disturbing' Black Murder Rate (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, February 13, 2007

PHILADELPHIA

The three teens are in good schools, college bound, and full of adolescent bravado. Each also knows someone who was shot and killed on the streets of Philadelphia.

That kind of up-close encounter with violence and murder is not the norm for teenage America. But this is Philly, which has the highest homicide rate for African-Americans among the nation's biggest cities – and a place where the risk of being killed is especially high for blacks under age 18.

The possibility of a short life and a violent death weighs on African-American teens like Andrea Williams, Sierra Daniels, and Christopher Fuller, though they seem to shoulder the burden as if it's just an extra load of books. Andrea worries most about her younger brother and sister, afraid one of them will get hit by a misguided bullet fired by someone bent on revenge or protecting turf or just venting anger.

"Sometimes I hate to walk down the street with them, because I couldn't live without my little brother and sister," she says.

Nationally, the murder rate for African-Americans is more than three times the average: 19 black murder victims per 100,000 people versus five for the general population.

In Pennsylvania, the disparity for black homicide is even more pronounced: 30 per 100,000, or six times the national average, according to a study released last month by the Violence Policy Center (VPC), a gun-control research group in Washington.

Those numbers are "disproportionate, disturbing, and undeniable," says the VPC report, which analyzed crime data from 2004 in its study. Moreover, almost 80 percent of black murder victims in the US were shot and killed with guns, the study found.

Philadelphia follows the pattern. The vast majority of black murders in the city – 3 in 4 – are from gunfire, according to police.

Overall, murders have been on the rise – 406 last year. Of those, 317 were gun-related, compared with 233 four years ago. And it's the city's black residents and neighborhoods that feel the effects most acutely.

"We all want it to change, but how is the hard part," says Margo Davidson of the Caring People Alliance in North Philadelphia, where Andrea, Sierra, Christopher, and other teens can spend their afternoons after school. "We do the thing that we know how to do: We have a safe place for kids to come after school. We do family therapy and counseling, help people with [finding] jobs. But it's not enough. There are too many guns on the street and not enough jobs for young people."

Too many young people, says Ms. Davidson, are milling around after school with nothing to do except what the streets offer: guns and drugs.

That's one thing everyone – residents, police, and social workers – agree on. Another is that there's a subculture in "the 'hood" in which guns play a major role. They're used for protection, to generate income, to give a sense of power, and, all too often, to settle slights and disputes. As Andrea and others attest, their prevalence also infuses fear into a community.

"If you're in the 'hood, as long as you have a gun you can get some money," says Joselynne Jones, who helps run the Caring People Alliance. "You can stick someone up, sell the gun ... protect somebody for money. It's a vicious cycle that starts with a gun."

In the face of these grim statistics, the funerals, and the mourning, there are signs of a fresh determination to break that cycle and protect Philly's youths from stepping down that violent, gun-riddled path. The people, joining with police and city leaders, are pushing back.

A nighttime oasis

At 10 o'clock on a bitterly cold night, a bundled-up Carolyn Walton unlocks the Dixon House Community Center in South Philadelphia. "I hope we don't get any kids tonight because it's too cold for any child to be out," she says.

Ms. Walton works for what's known as the Curfew Center. Along with other initiatives to combat youth violence, the center was set up at Dixon House by city and community members last July in this neighborhood of row houses.

The number of homicide victims between the ages of 10 and 17 had been growing steadily in recent years. By 2006, citywide, about 10 percent of the 406 homicide victims were younger than 18, according to the police department. In South Philly, 24 percent of homicide victims were under 18.

"Last summer, every night all night, you could hear gunfire," says Jean Gillen, the receptionist at the Curfew Center who lives on the next block. "These kids can get a gun faster than they can a pencil or a book."

After meetings with city officials, the community asked the police to start enforcing a curfew that had been ignored for decades. Mayor John Street agreed to enforce it, but only on one condition: that the community step up to help the police deal with violators. And so the idea of the Curfew Center was born.

"It has a twofold purpose: first, to get the kids off the streets and stop the mayhem, and then provide the kids and/or their families with supportive services," says Cheryl Weiss, executive director of Diversified Community Services, which runs Dixon House.

It's here that police bring curfew violators, and staff like Kareem Davis talk with them about why they're on the streets.

"A lot of the kids who come here are juniors and seniors in high school, and a lot of them want to go to college," says Mr. Davis. "But people in the schools don't know that, the parents may not, and the kids don't know to take the right courses to prepare for college."

The staff at the Curfew Center call parents to bring their kids home. If the parents come, they're interviewed in case they need services like job training. But when parents can't be contacted – whether they're out working, or partying – the center provides the kids plenty to eat and a room with cots to sleep. In the morning, the staff takes them to the Department of Human Services (DHS), the city's primary social-service agency.

On an average night, police bring in four or five teens. But when it first opened, the staff dealt with as many as 19 in one night. On that bitterly cold night last week, police did bring in two boys, ages 15 and 16, at 4:30 a.m. They were from New Jersey and said they'd missed the train home. Since no one could be reached to pick them up, they were brought to DHS in the morning.

Since the Curfew Center opened, the percentage of murder victims in South Philly under age 18 has dropped from 24 percent to about 15 percent, according to Inspector Stephen Johnson, commanding officer of Philadelphia's South Police Division. "We have made some significant strides," he says. "But we need to do much more."

Inspector Johnson would like to see the legislature impose more limits on who can carry a gun – a move he knows is controversial in a state with many rural areas. A decade ago, the city made it almost impossible to get a permit to carry a gun, he says. But gun advocates brought legal challenges, and in 1996, Philadelphia was required to abide by the same gun-control laws as the rest of the state – adding significantly to the number of guns on the street.

With more curbs on gun ownership, Johnson says, fewer guns would be in the hands of adults, and the trickledown effect to youths would also be lessened.

"You have people living in an intense urban area. You have so many disputes that would normally be resolved by talking or even by a fistfight," he says. "But you don't have that now. People feel omnipotent because they have a gun and they feel as though they don't have to back down in some scenarios."

The teenagers' reality

Sierra, Andrea, and Christopher all say that if they ever needed a gun, they'd know how to get one.

It wouldn't be hard, either. Sierra's older brother already has one, and she worries a little about his "anger issues." She lost a good friend two years ago, she says, to an argument and a gun. Sierra's not even sure what the dispute was about. "It makes me sad 'cause he's not around anymore," she says. "But it really didn't make me change anything."

The three teens are speaking, safe and warm, at the R.W. Brown Community Center in North Philadelphia. They are explaining why guns are so prevalent in their community, but all say they want nothing to do with them.

"I could get one, but it wouldn't feel right," says Andrea. Some kids she hangs out with carry them, though.

"But I don't follow what they do," says the teen, who wants to become a pediatrician. "They try to get me to, but I won't."

For Christopher, guns are a constant worry. He feels protective of his sister, who he says is a beautiful girl. "She knows a lot of guy friends, and sometimes they get too rowdy and I have to put them in their place," says Christopher. "That's when I get scared, because I don't know them. I don't know if they've got a gun."

The three have their own ideas about how to reduce gun violence. They suggest that parents should do more to "crack down" on their kids, and they say kids should do more to control their anger. They also say the legislature should do more to make guns harder to get.

"I don't think people understand how much guns affect our community," says Christopher, who wants to be a teacher. "There's a lot of guns and a lot of stray bullets flying around every day."

"Yeah, it needs to stop," says Sierra. "If it doesn't ... it's going to get worse. People need to learn how to work together again."

A gun as 'my friend'

Many of the staff here also know the gun culture firsthand. Last year, Margo Davidson's brother, who was known as Shorty, was killed. During the trial, she was struck by two things.

First is that the man convicted of killing her brother "kept referring to the gun as 'my friend,' " says Ms. Davidson, one of the top staff at the Caring People Alliance.

The second is that the accomplice in the murder – a young woman who had known "Shorty" and had pointed him out to the shooter as someone who "had money" – had ruined her own life. Her desire for money to buy drugs led to the fatal shooting.

"Knowing that, at 18, her life is over simply because of that poor decision takes the tragedy beyond the death of our loved one," says Davidson. "It also affects the families of the shooters – it has a ripple effect on the whole community."

Next steps

The Caring People Alliance plans to apply to the city to open a Curfew Center for North Philadelphia, like the one at Dixon House in South Philly. It's a big undertaking, relying on volunteers – more than 50 – for staff. The city provides funds to pay a site coordinator, a receptionist, and an intake worker. But most of the people working the overnight shift are local volunteers like Terrence Sealis.

"What makes me come out?" says the soft-spoken maintenance worker who is raising his teen daughter here. "It helps give a chance of a future for some of the teens out here. I try to come three times a week."

CIVIL LAW:

Judging Asbestos (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0131583

Asbestos bankruptcies have become a favorite trial-lawyer scam in part because judges have been reluctant to police fraud in their own courts. So it's a milestone that two more federal judges have issued opinions exposing these shakedowns.

The first comes courtesy of Judge Kathryn Ferguson, who has been overseeing the Congoleum bankruptcy. The maker of floor materials has become a poster child for everything wrong with the trial-lawyer innovation of "prepackaged" asbestos bankruptcies. Prepacks are a legitimate means of getting through bankruptcy, but most asbestos versions have become giant self-enrichment schemes. Our Kimberley Strassel exposed the Congoleum prepack's gory details on these pages last April.

In Congoleum and similar cases, the company and plaintiffs lawyers team up in a cost-shifting alliance. Congoleum rushes through bankruptcy at minimal cost and with a clean slate. The lawyers -- in this case, tort kingpins Joe Rice and Perry Weitz -- make a bundle and get preferential treatment for their clients. Meanwhile, the bills are dumped on Congoleum's insurers, who don't participate in crafting the bankruptcy plan. Convenient, huh?

A little too convenient, said Judge Ferguson, in a groundbreaking opinion last month that threw out the Congoleum plan. The judge scored Congoleum's own meager contribution as well as the special treatment that certain plaintiffs (and lawyers) were getting in this deal -- claiming both violated the bankruptcy code. She also granted Congoleum's insurers standing to object. Her ruling greatly decreases the likelihood that more such scams will be brought to court, especially in the Third Circuit where she presides and which oversees most major asbestos bankruptcies.

The other big news concerns the case of W.R. Grace, which remains one of the most prominent asbestos bankruptcies because of the publicity surrounding its operation of a vermiculite mine in Libby, Montana, that contains asbestos.

W.R. Grace sold something called Zonolite Attic Insulation, or ZAI, which was made with products from the Libby mine. It didn't take long for class-action lawyers to file suits claiming the mere presence of ZAI in an attic created an "unreasonable risk of harm." This was no small claim, given that some three to 30 million homes were estimated to contain ZAI.

Bankruptcy judges have been notoriously reluctant to dig into the science behind such accusations, for fear of dragging out proceedings. But in this case Judge Judith Fitzgerald chose to get to the bottom of the matter and held a trial. This included months of discovery, as well as scientific testing and testimony from experts on both sides.

And in December she ruled that ZAI does not pose an unreasonable risk of harm. She noted it wasn't enough for trial lawyers to say that the insulation contained asbestos, and that this asbestos could contaminate the air. The important point was the level at which asbestos was released, and whether the level could reasonably cause harm.

Trial lawyers have long held that there is "no threshold" at which asbestos is safe, an argument that is the basis for tens of thousands of lawsuits. Judge Fitzgerald noted instead that the best scientific evidence showed that regular homeowner activity in an attic didn't result in unsafe levels of asbestos; that even if attic insulation is disturbed it doesn't elevate asbestos levels throughout a house; and that it is unlikely the average person would be in an attic long enough to breathe asbestos at unhealthy levels. ZAI has been around for 80 years, with no evidence it has caused harm.

The ZAI claims are only a small part of the W.R. Grace bankruptcy, but Judge Fitzgerald has set a standard that other judges would do well to emulate. The No. 1 reason courts are heaving with asbestos claims is because few judges have been willing to challenge the veracity of the claims or the motives of those driving the litigation. With both now getting more scrutiny, the great asbestos legal fraud may finally be contained.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Probe Sought In 1946 Killing Of Black Veteran (AP)

By Elliott Minor

ALBANY, Ga. - Federal officials will be asked to investigate the 60-year-old unsolved killing of a World War II veteran who was shot after becoming the first registered black voter in a rural Georgia county that to this day still recognizes local military veterans as white or "colored" on a list posted in the courthouse.

Relatives say Maceo Snipes, who served most of his two-year Army hitch in the Pacific, was shot in the back by four white men in 1946 - a day after the 37-year-old voted for the first time. He collapsed in the doorway of his farm house in Taylor County, about 90 miles south of Atlanta, and died two days later in a hospital in Butler, the county seat.

Even though his death certificate lists his cause of death as "gunshot wound by homicide," there's no evidence of a criminal investigation into the killing and no one was arrested. The killing was overshadowed by the lynchings five days later of two black couples - also including a WWII veteran - some 90 miles away near Monroe that prompted President Harry Truman to dispatch the FBI to investigate that case, which also remains unsolved.

State NAACP officials and the Prison & Jail Project, a prison advocacy and civil rights group, plan to present their request for a federal probe to the Taylor County Commission on Tuesday and ask the commissioners to support the effort before mailing their written request to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"What better way for the county commission to show their support for justice than by joining this initiative," said NAACP President Edward DuBose of nearby Columbus, himself a 21-year Army veteran.

John Cole Vodicka, head of the Prison & Jail Project, said he has studied the case and interviewed older residents about the crime.

"As far as we know, all the suspects that were involved are dead," he said. "But we want the truth of what happened. That simply means we want those responsible for his murder named, and we want Maceo Snipes' name cleared."

Snipes was shot on July 18, 1946, a day after he voted in the Georgia Democratic Primary. He died two days later on July 20 in the local hospital. Fearful relatives buried him at night in an unmarked grave before some family members fled the county, relocating as far north as Ohio. Survivors say they still don't know the location of Snipes' grave.

"It wrecked our family for a long time," said the dead man's 66-year-old cousin, Felix Snipes, who was 6 at the time. "The older generation still doesn't want to talk about it."

Vodicka said he's convinced that Snipes was killed for simply voting.

"He managed to escape being hurt or killed ... fighting for his country, but when he came home and dared to exercise a right that he had fought to defend, he was killed by citizens of his own country," Vodicka said.

It was rumored that Snipes pulled a knife on his attackers, an allegation his relatives deny.

"One of the real tragedies of this case, in addition to a man being killed because of his skin color, is that the victim is falsely accused of doing something to bring on his demise," Vodicka said.

A coroner's inquest was conducted to determine the cause of Snipes' death, but the case was never presented to a grand jury or a prosecutor, Vodicka said.

Gary Lowe, the county's current coroner, said he had never heard of the Snipes case and that the sheriff and coroner who served at that time had both died.

The current prosecutor, District Attorney Gray Conger of Columbus and Taylor County Sheriff Jeff Watson were away from their offices Monday and not immediately available for comment. A secretary in the sheriff's office said it's unlikely they still have investigative reports from the 1940s.

The county's five commissioners, which include two black members, also were not immediately available for comment Tuesday.

"I want somebody held accountable for killing my uncle," said Lulu Montfort, 73, of Griffin, who was 13 when her cousin was killed. "They're probably all dead now, but people need to know that my uncle didn't do anything to deserve death."

Frightened family members loaded her and her brothers and sisters into the rear of a pickup truck, covered them with a tarpaulin and whisked them away 45 miles to Macon, where some caught a train to Ohio, she said.

"Every person in the state of Georgia needs to know that somebody died for that right to vote - a right we take for granted," she said.

DuBose and Vodicka said they also will continue efforts to persuade Taylor County officials to remove two large courthouse plaques that honor the county's World War II veterans, but separate them by race. Those plaques have hung there since 1944.

Commissioners say they cannot remove the displays because it would violate a state law that makes it illegal to "mutilate, deface, defile, or abuse" public monuments honoring service members.

"Any county that can't figure a way to get those plaques off the wall is in denial," Vodicka said.

CRS Doubts Constitutionality Of D.C. Bill (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, February 13, 2007

Perhaps previewing an expected legal challenge, a newly released Congressional Research Service report argues that current legislation does not give Congress the constitutional authority to grant a House vote to the Delegate from the District of Columbia.

There is very little case law on the issue, but what does exist indicates that Washington, D.C., is not a “state” for the purposes of representation, and the power Congress holds over D.C. is not enough to grant a House vote, the report reads.

The report specifically studies the constitutionality of the D.C. Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act, which would grant Democratic-leaning D.C. a vote in the House while also giving one to Republican Utah. Introduced by Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.)

and D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the bill currently sits in the Judiciary Committee. No hearing on it has been scheduled yet.

Despite the report, Norton remains confident in the measure.

"No similar case has ever been considered by any court," Norton said in a statement. "An unprecedented bill always raises constitutional issues, and we have always indicated that, not surprisingly, constitutional views on a novel bill like H.R. 328 are divided. ... We believe that the weight of constitutional opinion is with the District."

The question of constitutionality is nothing new. When a similar bill appeared before the Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution in September 2006, scholars who had studied the issue testified that while granting the District a vote in the House is a noble goal, the Norton-Davis bill could violate the Constitution. And if the bill were to become law, it is expected to be challenged immediately in court, although exactly by whom is yet to be determined.

Some observers believe the CRS report is further proof that only a constitutional amendment will permanently bring full Congressional representation to the District, because the Norton-Davis bill is bound to be thrown out.

"What are we doing if, at the end of the day, this is declared unconstitutional and another two and a half years have gone by?" said Timothy Cooper, executive director of Worldrights, a non-governmental organization that specializes in human rights issues in China and the United States.

Cooper, a longtime proponent of D.C. voting rights, said the new Democratic-controlled Congress should have thrown out the current measure — an effort created to make headway when the Republicans were in control — to focus instead on passing a constitutional amendment, similar to the effort that brought presidential electoral votes to the District.

"It's a new day in Congress, and it requires a new strategy," Cooper said. "To carry forward a dusty strategy ... is unsound."

But supporters of the Norton-Davis bill argue bipartisanship remains important in the effort, and they say the Constitution is behind them.

These supporters frequently cite the ruling in National Mutual Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia v. Tidewater Transfer Co., a 1949 decision in which the Supreme Court found that Congress has the right to extend federal diversity jurisdiction to cases with one party from the District.

But the justices' limited focus in their ruling might serve instead to strike down the measure, according to the CRS report.

"The plurality opinion took pains to note the limited impact of their holding — parties in diversity suits with residents of the District of Columbia would have a more convenient forum to bring a law suit," the report reads. "As noted, the plurality specifically limited the scope of its decision to cases which did not involve an extension of any fundamental right. Arguably, granting the Delegate a vote in the House does involve such an extension."

But supporters of the Norton-Davis bill remained confident.

"We don't think the CRS, or the Congress for that matter, is the arbiter of constitutionality," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote, adding that only the courts — where very little precedent has been established — are the forum for such debate.

"It's unusual for someone at CRS to take this approach in an area that is completely undecided," Zherka said. "This is not an area where there is case law. There isn't clarity on this."

In the meantime, continued discussion and lobbying for the measure will take place.

Hundreds of supporters, including D.C. Mayor Adrian Fenty (D), are expected to hit Capitol Hill on Thursday to lobby for the measure. That afternoon, the American Constitution Society for Law and Policy will host a forum on the constitutionality of the bill that will be moderated by Gilda Daniels, an assistant professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law.

The CRS report also analyzed the constitutionality of a recent House rules change that granted Norton and the four other Delegates a vote in the Committee of the Whole. Unlike with the Norton-Davis bill, the largely symbolic nature of that vote and past legal precedent likely will serve to uphold the rules change, according to the report.

Nashville Mayor Vetoes English-only Bill (AP)

By Erik Schelzig Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

AP, February 13, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Mayor Bill Purcell vetoed a measure Monday that would have made English the official language of Nashville, saying it was unconstitutional, unnecessary and mean-spirited.

"This ordinance does not reflect who we are in Nashville," Purcell said.

The measure passed 23-14 last week by the Metro Council required all government documents to be in English, except when multilingual communications are required by federal rules or are needed "to protect or promote public health, safety or welfare."

Opponents and supporters of the ordinance agreed it was largely a symbolic slap at illegal immigration that had no significant effect.

Purcell said his legal staff had advised him the bill violated the U.S. and state constitutions and would be costly to defend.

"If this ordinance becomes law, Nashville will become a less safe, less friendly and less successful city," Purcell said. "And as mayor, I cannot allow that to happen."

His veto seems likely to stand. It would take 27 council votes to override it.

Councilman Eric Crafton, who sponsored the measure, said it would offer an incentive for immigrants to learn English. Opponents including the Chamber of Commerce worried it would hurt the image of Nashville, which bills itself as "Music City USA."

Crafton told WKRN-TV: "It's almost ridiculous to the point of being absurd for the mayor to say, 'Well, I'm afraid that somebody might sue us because we want to conduct our business in English.' To me it's a lack of courage and a lack of leadership."

Several smaller communities have passed similar laws or resolutions, including Pahrump, Nev.; Taneytown, Md.; and the Dallas suburb of Farmers Branch, Texas.

Nashville, a city of more than 600,000, is home to the nation's largest Kurdish community and has been a resettlement site for refugees from Africa and Southeast Asia. The Hispanic immigrant population also has boomed.

Researchers say Nashville's foreign-born population has grown 350 percent since 1990.

ANTITRUST:

A Million Pages Later, Smithfield Still Waiting On Merger OK (VAPILOT)

By Philip Walzer, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, February 13, 2007

In September, Smithfield Foods announced that it wanted to take over Premium Standard Farms for $810 million in stock and cash.

The combination of the nation's top two pork producers would give Smithfield control of roughly 20 percent of the nation's hogs.

Nearly five months and more than 1 million pages of submitted documents later, Smithfield is still waiting to hear whether the deal passes antitrust muster with the U.S. Department of Justice.

The proposed merger has triggered cries of alarm from consumer and farming groups, Midwestern senators, and even The New York Times editorial board. They worry about the potential squeeze on small farmers and consumer choices.

The pork companies announced last week that they had completed the "second request" for information by the Justice Department's Antitrust Division.

Only 3 percent of proposed mergers trigger that level of scrutiny from the Justice Department, according to government statistics, but that doesn't necessarily mean Smithfield will face trouble.

"It may indicate heightened scrutiny on the part of the Justice Department," said Carl Tobias, the professor of law at the University of Richmond. "But it may be they just didn't have specific information from the first batch of material, and they want to follow up.

"My sense is that, generally in the Bush administration, the Justice Department has been rather receptive to mergers."

That doesn't mean Smithfield will get the whole hog, either.

In most cases, second requests lead to government intervention, but not lawsuits to block the merger, said Patricia Sullivan, the co-chairwoman of the antitrust practice group at Edwards Angell Palmer & Dodge LLP in Providence, R.I.

"Very often, the merging parties and the regulators reach an accommodation," Sullivan said, "and then the merger is closed with conditions," such as the divestment of certain assets.

Smithfield and Premium Standard Farms said in a statement last week that they have agreed to allow the Justice Department 60 days to review the material "and an additional 30 days thereafter for review should the Antitrust Division deem necessary."

Jerry Hostetter, Smithfield's vice president for investor relations and corporate communications, said the additional request for information was "very routine" and "totally anticipated."

He said he could not discuss what the material contained. "Their normal interest is in market concentration and market shares," Hostetter said.

Smithfield has never been blocked from previous mergers, he said. "Certainly, an option of the Justice Department is to request a divestiture," Hostetter said. "I can't comment on the likelihood of that."

Bart Chilton, the chief of staff of the National Farmers Union, which has criticized the proposal, said the department "has been more attentive than I expected. They appear to be methodical and genuinely interested in our concerns. That doesn't mean they will do what we want."

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division, did not respond to an e-mail or a phone message.

Premium Standard Farms, meanwhile, will hold a stockholders meeting on whether to approve the merger Feb. 23 in Kansas City, Mo.

The announcement of the merger in September drew howls of protest from organizations such as the National Farmers' Union, which represents 250,000 farming families, and lawmakers including U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R- Iowa.

Grassley reiterated his "serious reservations" about the deal at a Senate hearing last month. "I'm concerned about reduced market opportunities, possible anti-competitive and predatory business practices, and increasing agribusiness consolidation," Grassley said.

In its editorial in September, The New York Times said the deal "would mean fewer markets for farmers and fewer choices for consumers.... There is little or no role for the independent farmer in this landscape."

Hostetter said he could not address the critics' points directly during the department's review. However, he added: "They are the same people that complained about our buying Farmland Industries in 2003. We've brought them out of bankruptcy. We've shown we've made them a vibrant, competitive organization."

The Justice Department made its request for additional information in November. "Once you get into the second request, you're not filling out forms," said Sullivan, the antitrust lawyer from Providence.

"It can be pretty gargantuan: 'Produce all of your documents. Give me your e-mails. Let me interview your director of marketing, the head of your IT department.' "

Hostetter said the response was "incredibly expensive," though he declined to identify the cost to Smithfield.

"I have every reason to suppose it was like the Farmland second request," he said. "That response was 3 million pages."

The Justice Department's Antitrust Division has come under attack for being too soft on businesses. Grassley, in his comments at the hearing, cited an article in the weekly newspaper Legal Times last month on the perception among lawyers that the division is squeamish about challenging mergers.

Sullivan put it this way: "Right now, merger enforcement is characterized by a willingness on the part of the regulators to work with the merging parties to become surgical about solving the competitive problems yet allowing the transactions to close."

That makes sense "if you believe corporate entities should be free to right-size themselves and let the market punish them if bad decisions are made," Sullivan said. "But if your philosophical belief is 'big is bad,' this is a very dangerous approach."

ISS Urges Caremark Holders To Vote Down Bid By CVS (WSJ)

By David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

Pressure mounted on drugstore chain CVS Corp. to boost its bid for Caremark Rx Inc. after two firms advising investors urged Caremark shareholders to reject the deal and criticized its board for failing to negotiate a better price for the company.

A large Caremark shareholder said the CVS offer would likely be rejected by investors at a special meeting of the company scheduled for next Tuesday. "They have to raise the offer," said the investor, who controls several million shares. He said that given the strong performance of the pharmacy-benefits industry, keeping Caremark independent "is not unattractive at this point," for investors.

Since the $21 billion offer from Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS offer for Caremark, Nashville, Tenn., was announced Nov. 1, investors have complained the deal undervalues Caremark. That concern was amplified last week when Maryland Heights, Mo.-based Express Scripts Inc., another pharmacy-benefits manager that is making a hostile bid for Caremark, posted strong fourth quarter results and bumped up its expectations for earnings this year.

Shares of Caremark fell 41 cents to $60.91 in New York Stock Exchange 4 p.m. composite trading. Caremark shares are trading more than $4 above the CVS offer, which now stands at $56.25 per share based on the value of CVS stock. CVS stock fell 42 cents to $32.49 a share on the Big Board.

Express Scripts stock rose $1.42, or 1.9%, to $74.73 a share in Nasdaq Stock Market 4 p.m. composite trading. The rise increased the value of the cash-and-stock offer from Express Scripts to $61.08. The Caremark board has refused to negotiate with Express Scripts and has raised questions about the ability of the Express Scripts proposal to clear an antitrust review.

The proxy advisor, Institutional Shareholder Services Inc., urged a no vote on the CVS deal, saying the Caremark board should have played Express Scripts against CVS to win a better deal for shareholders. "Based on the risky strategic rationale, the nil-premium offer price, the initial poor market reaction, and the change-in-control benefits to insiders, we cannot fathom why the (Caremark) board did not...commence non-binding negotiations with (Express Scripts) after it had submitted its unsolicited offer," the report said. "What was the downside of playing the two parties against each other?"

Two other proxy advisers have also recommended no votes. In a statement, Caremark said it disagreed with the ISS recommendation. And CtW Investment Group, which is affiliated with union pension funds holding 1.5 million shares of Caremark, cited "a flawed negotiating process" as one reason to vote against the proposal.

While Caremark and Express Scripts have spent the past few weeks publicly criticizing each other, Caremark and CVS remain on friendly terms. This past weekend, CVS Chief Executive Tom Ryan and his Caremark counterpart, Edwin "Mac" Crawford, both played golf in the AT&T Pebble Beach National Pro-Am in California.

For CVS, which operates the largest number of drugstores in the country, the acquisition of Caremark is an opportunity to drive more customers to its stores while also increasing its clout with drug manufacturers. ISS was skeptical of some of the revenue "synergies" CVS says will result from the Caremark acquisition. "Supporting the type of transaction that has been proposed here takes a giant leap of faith in the vision of its architects," ISS said.

A merger of Caremark and Express Scripts would create the largest pharmacy-benefits manager in the country by revenue.

Caremark Urged To Reject CVS Deal (FT)

By James Politi In New York

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

Institutional Shareholder Services, the US proxy adviser, on Monday said that investors should vote against Caremark's planned $23bn merger with CVS because of its "risky strategic rationale" and "flawed process".

The strongly worded report by ISS will be seen as a further blow to Caremark, the pharmacy benefits manager, in its efforts to persuade investors that it was right to reject a higher bid worth nearly $26bn from rival Express Scripts.

It will increase the pressure on CVS, the drug store chain, to raise its bid ahead of a vote on the deal by Caremark shareholders, which is scheduled for February 20.

The ISS report, which can typically sway around 10 per cent of a company's shareholder base, was mainly critical of Caremark for not opening up its books to Express Scripts for due diligence.

"The process the Caremark board undertook did not comply with current mergers and acquisitions best practices," ISS said. "A board that is willing to open up a process can sometimes achieve greater value for its shareholders," the report said, highlighting the ability of Equity Office Properties, the $40bn commercial property group, to recently extract nearly $3bn more from Blackstone after allowing Vornado, a rival bidder, to study its confidential information.

Since Express Scripts launched its hostile bid in December, Caremark has maintained that it was a highly conditional offer that contained significant antitrust risk, as it would combine the second and third-largest PBMs.

But critics have said that Caremark and Mac Crawford, its chief executive, could be so adamantly defending the CVS deal in order to protect lucrative change-of-control terms for Caremark executives in the merger agreement.

ISS also challenged the strategic rationale of a CVS merger with Caremark, which would create a unique combination of a drugstore chain and an administrator of prescription drug plans.

Caremark Investors Urged To Reject Buyout (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

Two more investment advisory firms recommended Monday that shareholders of Caremark Rx Inc. reject a buyout offer from the drugstore operator CVS Corp. when it comes up for a vote next week.

CtW Investment Group and Institutional Shareholder Services Inc. joined two other advisors who said Nashville-based Caremark's board and managers had not tried to get the best deal for shareholders.

CtW held a forum Feb. 2 where institutional shareholders with about 46% of Caremark's stock heard from the chief executives of CVS and Express Scripts Inc., which has launched a rival bid for Caremark.

"Given the inadequate value and uncertain benefits of the CVS merger as proposed and the Caremark board's stunning failure to engage in a negotiating process that would maximize shareholder value, we urge you to vote the company's white proxy card against Proposal No. 1 to approve the CVS merger," the CtW letter to shareholders said.

New York-based CtW works with public and union-sponsored pension funds representing an estimated 18.7 million Caremark shares.

Rockville, Md.-based Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises mutual funds, pension plans and other institutional shareholders, also urged rejection of the CVS offer.

"We conclude that the process was flawed to such a degree that we cannot recommend that [Caremark] shareholders support the transaction as currently constructed," ISS wrote in its analysis.

Glass, Lewis & Co. and Egan-Jones, a pair of investor advisory firms, previously had advised Caremark shareholders to vote against the CVS offer.

Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS said Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Caremark for CVS stock in a deal worth more than $24 billion. That proposed deal has already won antitrust approval.

Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., announced a hostile bid for Caremark on Dec. 18. That offer is now worth about $26 billion and would unite the No. 2 and No. 3 pharmacy benefits managers.

Caremark shareholders are scheduled to meet Feb. 20 to consider the CVS deal, and CVS shareholders are to meet three days later.

CtW didn't endorse the Express Scripts bid and said it had "significant concerns" with that proposal as well. CtW hopes rejection of the CVS offer would prompt new bids for Caremark.

Shares of Caremark fell 41 cents to $60.91 and CVS fell 42 cents to $32.49. Express Scripts shares rose $1.42 to $74.73.

Tenaris Says It Agreed To Buy Hydril For US$97 A Share (AP)

LUXEMBOURG — Tenaris SA, a maker of tubular products and provider of services to the oil and gas industry, said Monday it agreed to buy Hydril Co. for $97 per share, or $74.6 million, in cash.

The offered price for Houston-based Hydril, a maker of connections and pressure-control products used in oil and gas drilling, represents a premium of about 17 percent to Hydril's closing share price of Feb. 9, the company said in a statement.

"With Hydril, we will be able to offer our customers worldwide a full range of integral and coupled premium connection products for the industry's most demanding applications," said Paolo Rocca, Tenaris's chairman

The agreement is subject to the receipt of clearance from U.S. antitrust authorities and approval of Hydril's shareholders. It is expected to close in the second quarter.

Hydril posted revenues of $503 million in 2006.

Tenaris will finance the acquisition through a combination of cash on hand and debt, for which bank commitments have been secured.

Houston Firm Agrees To $2.1 Billion Buyout Offer (HC)

By Brett Clanton, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 13, 2007

Houston's Hydril Co. agreed to a $97 per share acquisition offer by Tenaris, a Luxembourg-based maker of pipeline and related equipment for the oil and gas industry, according to the companies.

The offer represents a 17 percent premium to Hydril's closing stock price on Friday, Tenaris said in a statement. The company plans to finance the purchase though a combination of cash on hand and debt.

Hydril stock rose more than 14 percent to $94.86 in mid-day trading, making its shares outstanding worth more than $2.1 billion according to Bloomberg. Tenaris shares slipped by nearly 1 percent to $46.50 a share.

Tenaris' Chairman and CEO Paolo Rocca, said merging with Hyrdril, a leading North American manufacturer of premium connections and pressure control equipment for the oil and gas industry, is "another major step" for his company. Tenarais makes piping and related equipment for oil and gas companies.

"With Hydril, we will be able to offer our customers worldwide a full range of integral and coupled premium connection products for the industry's most demanding applications," Rocca said. Combining the research and development expertise of the two companies also will "make a substantial contribution in the new frontiers of exploration and production," and fuel growth of Hyrdril's products and services around the world, he said.

Chris Seaver, Hydril's chairman, president and CEO, said combining the two companies makes sense for both businesses and will benefit customers by grouping a wide array of products and services under one brand.

The agreement still needs clearance from U.S. antitrust authorities and a majority approval of Hydril's shareholders. Tenaris said it expects the deal to close in the second quarter.

Four Seasons Hotels Agrees To Acquisition Deal (WSJ)

By Josee Rose

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

After deliberating for three months, Four Seasons Hotels Inc. Monday said it has agreed to a $3.37 billion management buyout by Chairman and Chief Executive Isadore Sharp at the same price Mr. Sharp floated when he disclosed his offer Nov. 6.

The buyout team -- backed by Saudi Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal Bin Abdulaziz Alsaud's Kingdom Hotels International and Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates' Cascade Investment LLC -- will pay $82 a share in cash to take Four Seasons private. That's below the $83.88 closing level of Four Seasons shares Friday. Shares opened premarket trading Monday at $82.

The purchase price represents a 28% premium to Four Season's closing price the day before the offer was announced in November. Including debt obligations, the deal is valued at about $3.8 billion.

The deal will leave Mr. Sharp's family holding company, Triples, with a "significant continuing interest" in Four Seasons, and Mr. Sharp will remain as chairman and chief executive. If the deal is completed, Mr. Sharp will be entitled to realize proceeds of about $289 million stemming from an incentive plan set up in 1989.

Four Seasons' board unanimously approved the deal and will recommend that shareholders vote in favor of it. A special meeting is expected in April, and if approved, the deal should close in the second quarter. The deal requires approval by two-thirds of the votes cast by holders of the company's limited voting shares, which are the ones being bought for $82.

Merrill Lynch & Co. advised a special committee of Four Seasons' board set up to evaluate the offer and provided a fairness opinion. JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Citigroup Inc. have provided commitments for debt financing, the company said.

Standard & Poor's in November dropped the company's credit ratings one notch into junk-bond territory after Mr. Sharp unveiled his offer. S&P maintained its investment grade rating on the company's senior unsecured convertible notes on the expectation they'd be refinanced if a deal occurs.

The offer comes amid strong interest in hotel companies, particularly from private-equity investors. Blackstone Group has been a major force, with deals to acquire MeriStar Hospitality Corp., Extended Stay America Inc., Prime Hospitality Corp., Boca Resorts Inc., Wyndham International Inc. and La Quinta Corp. Four Seasons operates about 70 hotels and resorts throughout the world for a variety of owners. Mr. Sharp has run Four Seasons since its founding in 1978.

Google Takes Hits From YouTube's Use Of Video Clips (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, February 13, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Internet search giant Google is under fire from Hollywood, mostly about the many unlicensed clips available on its YouTube video-sharing site.

The studios have become more aggressive in demanding removal of the clips, and in a shot at Google itself, several entertainment companies have filed a lawsuit against two website owners over their use of Google's highly profitable search-advertising network.

Sony, Warner Bros., 20th Century Fox, NBC Universal and Paramount are suing two website owners who allegedly used Google's search-advertising system to promote the free trading of copyrighted movies.

In a statement responding to a Wall Street Journal article about the lawsuit, Google on Monday said, "We prohibit advertisers from using our advertising program to promote the sale of copyright infringing materials."

Google will continue to be at odds with the studios until it licenses the clips or comes up with some kind of filtering techniques to keep the clips off YouTube, says Ross Dannenberg, an intellectual property attorney at Washington, D.C.-based Banner & Witcoff. "But the technology isn't there yet," Dannenberg says.

"As long as people are copying or posting copyrighted programs on YouTube, and Google makes money off that, this problem (the studios vs. Google) won't go way," he says.

Last week, Viacom demanded that Google take down more than 100,000 copyrighted clips from YouTube, most from programs such as The Daily Show with Jon Stewart and The Colbert Report, which fans taped and uploaded themselves.

Google says it responds instantly to such requests. As of Monday afternoon, Viacom clips were hard to find on YouTube.

However, plenty of other copyrighted clips were in abundance, including the reunion of The Police singing Roxanne from Sunday's CBS Grammy Awards telecast, Prince's halftime show at the Super Bowl and snippets from the Fox TV shows Family Guy and Madtv.

The entertainment community banded together to fight the original song-swap service, Napster, in 2000, on concerns about copyright infringement. Napster tried to settle with the labels, but most of the record companies refused, and the service was shut down.

YouTube has deals with several networks, including CBS and NBC, to show their authorized clips. And Google says it has been in talks to come to terms with other copyright holders.

"I still think YouTube will end up being a good purchase for Google, as long as they can get things under control," says Danny Sullivan, who runs the SearchEngineLand.com website.

"The problem for Google is YouTube went from a little underdog with no money and lots of traffic, to being part of Google, which has oodles of money and deep pockets. That makes it a very attractive target."

Google spent $1.65 billion for YouTube in 2006.

John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website, says Google vs. the studios isn't Napster all over again.

"Both sides need each other far too much. This feels more like some strong positioning moves."

Belgian Court Says Google Violated Copyright Law (WSJ)

By Anne Jolis

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

BRUSSELS -- A Belgian court ruled Tuesday that Internet search engine Google Inc. violated Belgian copyright law when it published snippets and links to Belgian newspapers on its Web site without permission.

The court ordered Google to remove the material and pay a fine of €25,000 ($32,500) a day. A judge said the fine was retroactive from an initial September ruling, but lawyers said they weren't sure and needed time to analyze the judgment. A court official later said the fine was retroactive and amounted to €3.45 million and counting.

The ruling represents an initial defeat in what could become a major issue for Google -- beginning to define what it must do before using copyrighted material.

In September, Copiepresse -- an association of Belgian French- and German-language publishers in Belgium -- won a case against Google at the Belgian Court of First Instance, charging that by displaying its members' copyrighted articles on its news-search engine without payment and permission, Google had broken Belgian law. Google appealed the ruling to the same court, saying it wasn't aware of the first court hearing.

Google lists articles provided in response to news searches. The company previously has said it has an "opt-out" policy for publishers who don't want their content on Google, making the Belgian court case unnecessary.

But Google added it would be impractical for the company to contact every publishing company to get permission and pay a fee before publishing any articles as the press association has requested, Google spokeswoman added.

Since its case with Google, Copiepresse has also sent warning letters to Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp.'s news-search engine MSN for the same practice of using snippets of articles on their search engines.

In each case, Copiepresse has demanded that the search engines remove their members' material from their news sites until they agree to ask permission and pay before using it, or face fines. MSN is currently negotiating with Copiepresse, while Yahoo has already begun to remove the offending links from its site, Copiepresse says.

Patenting Life (NYT)

By Michael Crichton

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

YOU, or someone you love, may die because of a gene patent that should never have been granted in the first place. Sound far-fetched? Unfortunately, it's only too real.

Gene patents are now used to halt research, prevent medical testing and keep vital information from you and your doctor. Gene patents slow the pace of medical advance on deadly diseases. And they raise costs exorbitantly: a test for breast cancer that could be done for $1,000 now costs $3,000.

Why? Because the holder of the gene patent can charge whatever he wants, and does. Couldn't somebody make a cheaper test? Sure, but the patent holder blocks any competitor's test. He owns the gene. Nobody else can test for it. In fact, you can't even donate your own breast cancer gene to another scientist without permission. The gene may exist in your body, but it's now private property.

This bizarre situation has come to pass because of a mistake by an underfinanced and understaffed government agency. The United States Patent Office misinterpreted previous Supreme Court rulings and some years ago began — to the surprise of everyone, including scientists decoding the genome — to issue patents on genes.

Humans share mostly the same genes. The same genes are found in other animals as well. Our genetic makeup represents the common heritage of all life on earth. You can't patent snow, eagles or gravity, and you shouldn't be able to patent genes, either. Yet by now one-fifth of the genes in your body are privately owned.

The results have been disastrous. Ordinarily, we imagine patents promote innovation, but that's because most patents are granted for human inventions. Genes aren't human inventions, they are features of the natural world. As a result these patents can be used to block innovation, and hurt patient care.

For example, Canavan disease is an inherited disorder that affects children starting at 3 months; they cannot crawl or walk, they suffer seizures and eventually become paralyzed and die by adolescence. Formerly there was no test to tell parents if they were at risk. Families enduring the heartbreak of caring for these children engaged a researcher to identify the gene and produce a test. Canavan families around the world donated tissue and money to help this cause.

When the gene was identified in 1993, the families got the commitment of a New York hospital to offer a free test to anyone who wanted it. But the researcher's employer, Miami Children's Hospital Research Institute, patented the gene and refused to allow any health care provider to offer the test without paying a royalty. The parents did not believe genes should be patented and so did not put their names on the patent. Consequently, they had no control over the outcome.

In addition, a gene's owner can in some instances also own the mutations of that gene, and these mutations can be markers for disease. Countries that don't have gene patents actually offer better gene testing than we do, because when multiple labs are allowed to do testing, more mutations are discovered, leading to higher-quality tests.

Apologists for gene patents argue that the issue is a tempest in a teapot, that patent licenses are readily available at minimal cost. That's simply untrue. The owner of the genome for Hepatitis C is paid millions by researchers to study this disease. Not surprisingly, many other researchers choose to study something less expensive.

But forget the costs: why should people or companies own a disease in the first place? They didn't invent it. Yet today, more than 20 human pathogens are privately owned, including haemophilus influenza and Hepatitis C. And we've already mentioned that tests for the BRCA genes for breast cancer cost $3,000. Oh, one more thing: if you undergo the test, the company that owns the patent on the gene can keep your tissue and do research on it without asking your permission. Don't like it? Too bad.

The plain truth is that gene patents aren't benign and never will be. When SARS was spreading across the globe, medical researchers hesitated to study it — because of patent concerns. There is no clearer indication that gene patents block innovation, inhibit research and put us all at risk.

Even your doctor can't get relevant information. An asthma medication only works in certain patients. Yet its manufacturer has squelched efforts by others to develop genetic tests that would determine on whom it will and will not work. Such commercial considerations interfere with a great dream. For years we've been promised the coming era of personalized medicine — medicine suited to our particular body makeup. Gene patents destroy that dream.

Fortunately, two congressmen want to make the full benefit of the decoded genome available to us all. Last Friday, Xavier Becerra, a Democrat of California, and Dave Weldon, a Republican of Florida, sponsored the Genomic Research and Accessibility Act, to ban the practice of patenting genes found in nature. Mr. Becerra has been careful to say the bill does not hamper invention, but rather promotes it. He's right. This bill will fuel innovation, and return our common genetic heritage to us. It deserves our support.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

On Fla. Menus, A Favorite Fish Experiences Identity Theft (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

MADEIRA BEACH, Fla. -- What the undercover agents ordered, over and over, was the grouper.

What wound up on their plates could stifle anyone's appetite.

The alleged grouper at 17 of 24 area restaurants sampled by the investigators was actually another, less desirable species, according to a DNA analysis conducted for the state attorney general's office and released earlier this month. Asian catfish. Emperor. Painted sweetlips. And twice, types of fish that could not be identified.

"It's a rip-off -- like taking a cheap watch and selling it as a Rolex," said Bob Spaeth, who owns six commercial fishing boats and co-owns one of the largest grouper distributors on the Gulf Coast. "Someone should go to jail."

In this area that some consider the national capital of grouper -- more than three-quarters of the U.S. catch comes from Florida's Gulf and a grouper sandwich downed at a waterside bar is cherished as an authentically Floridian repast -- the finding has amplified a local outrage that, experts say, points to a larger national problem of fish fakery.

"This problem is rampant across America," said Mark Kinsey, a special agent for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration who enforces marine resource laws. "And it isn't just grouper."

Much of the reason for the questionable grouper, red snapper and other fish stems from a simple matter of supply and demand, regulators and industry officials say.

With the popularity of grouper rising nationwide and the domestic catch at times limited by federal guidelines, restaurateurs have relied on imports to fill the gap.

The quality of those imports has proved harder to control, even as the lower prices -- often a small fraction of domestic prices -- have made the imports irresistible.

In many instances, not only is the "grouper" in fact farm-raised Asian catfish from Vietnam or other species that swim with grouper, but the filets have shown signs of salmonella and traces of illegal carcinogenic fungicides, NOAA law enforcement officials said.

In December, a Panama City businessman pleaded guilty to marketing more than a million pounds of Asian catfish as grouper, a remarkable volume considering that the domestic annual catch is about 10 million pounds. Yet law enforcement officers said they think larger cases are out there.

Each year, the United States imports as much as 9 million pounds of grouper -- or fish known as grouper -- and it is served in restaurants from Seattle to Miami.

"It's scary, because people don't know what they're eating," Kinsey said.

Repeated revelations of fake grouper have scandalized restaurant-goers across Florida, and made them doubtful at the dining table.

In August, the St. Petersburg Times reported that at six of 11 area restaurants sampled, the "grouper" was actually something else, according to DNA tests. One restaurant was charging $23 for "champagne braised black grouper" but was instead serving tilapia.

A television station in Fort Myers and the Daytona Beach News-Journal followed with similar findings.

"People who don't know us are asking, 'Is that really grouper?' " said Stephanie Berry, a manager at Dockside Dave's St. Pete Beach, which many locals say serves the best grouper sandwich.

The texture and taste of real grouper are much different from those of the Asian catfish, which is its most common substitute. Grouper costs more because it tastes better. Moreover, Asian catfish filets are often thin and small; those of grouper, a much larger fish, are larger and thicker.

Exactly whom to blame for the fraudulent fish is a matter of debate. Some said anyone in the business should know the difference. Others said it is possible that the restaurants are being victimized as much as consumers are.

"If you order grouper and it says grouper on the box, what else can you do?" said Brian Connell, general manager of the Fourth Street Shrimp Store, a St. Petersburg restaurant. "A lot of honest people are catching a bad rap on this. We haven't been in business for 20 years by deceiving people."

According to the state tests, the restaurant was serving green weakfish as grouper.

The samples from that eatery and the others were tested by David Price at the Whitney Laboratory for Marine Bioscience in St. Augustine, part of the University of Florida.

Using essentially just a crumb of each alleged grouper, Price identified the type of mitochondrial DNA in each fish, then tried to match it up against one of about 100 grouper species in a genetic database maintained by the National Center for Biotechnology Information.

For 22 of the 24 fish samples, Price determined the species -- grouper or not -- by matching 99 percent of the sample DNA to grouper DNA. The remaining two were far enough away from any known grouper DNA that he could be sure that they were not the fish the restaurants had described.

The most common substitute was Asian catfish, he said. Emperor fish, which are known to swim with grouper, was next.

Connell said the restaurant bought the grouper from Sysco, a large national food-service company.

"They're the industry standard -- the best," he said.

Sysco West Coast Florida representatives said that they know a problem exists, and that last year they began testing about one of every several hundred to several thousand pounds of purported grouper. Each test costs $180.

They have also warned suppliers that they will not do business with those who falsely label their products.

Since testing began, the proportion of false grouper has dropped from 50 percent to 20 percent, said Lee Ann Applewhite, the chief executive of Applied Food Technologies, which conducted the tests for Sysco.

Still, fish that are not grouper can slip through.

"It's a classic case," said Spaeth, "of let the buyer beware."

Sharing Of Bison Range Management Breaks Down (NYT)

By Jim Robbins

DOJ_NMG_0131594

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

MOIESE, Mont. — An effort to have two Indian tribes assist government officials in operating a federal wildlife refuge that is surrounded by their reservation has collapsed amid accusations of racism, harassment, intimidation and poor performance. But top federal officials say they are determined to resurrect it.

The plan for the tribes and the government to jointly run the National Bison Range in western Montana, just north of Missoula, had long been viewed as unworkable by the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, the Department of Interior branch that manages wildlife refuges.

But top Interior Department officials say that despite the objections, they are committed to transferring some responsibility for the range from the wildlife service to a tribal government.

"There's a shared sense of mission between the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the tribes," said Shane Wolf, a department spokesman.

Representative Denny Rehberg, Republican of Montana, asked the Government Accountability Office and the House Resources Committee in late January to investigate the disagreement and the problems plaguing the range. Among them is whether political appointees at the Interior Department pressured the wildlife service into the pact. The department's inspector general and its Office of Equal Opportunity are also investigating.

The Indian Self-Determination Act of 1975 allows tribal involvement in the management of federal lands, and the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes, which have strong cultural links to bison, wanted the authority to manage the refuge.

The Fish and Wildlife Service opposed ceding control over the bison range, and the Interior Department and tribal officials decided to split the mission. The federal government maintained management authority but hired members of the tribes to feed and care for the bison. Federal managers, who did not have authority over the tribal workers, had to ask a tribal manager to relay orders.

The project leader at the range, Steve Kallin of the wildlife service, said tribal employees failed to do their assigned tasks and that this led to the cancellation of the agreement.

For example, Mr. Kallin said, tribe members failed to feed the bison properly in preparation for their transfer to another refuge, at which point, he said, the wildlife service resumed responsibility for feeding.

Tribal employees also did not maintain fences, Mr. Kallin said, allowing bison to wander into pastures that were being rested from grazing.

Wildlife agency employees also said that relations grew strained and that tribal employees started to threaten them. They also said they felt excluded because tribal employees prayed together during work hours. The wildlife agency hired a retired special agent-in-charge of the National Park Service for the Rocky Mountain region, Jim Reilly, to look into the situation.

Mr. Reilly's findings, which were not made public but appeared on a Web site run by a group opposed to tribal management, supported many of the federal employees' accusations. Mr. Reilly wrote that work conditions at the range "were as bad as he had ever seen in his career," according to a letter from the service's deputy regional director, Jay Slack, to the regional director that cited the investigation.

Tribal officials denied many of the accusations and said they were surprised by the list of complaints. Cancellation of the agreement "came completely out of the blue," said the chairman of the tribal confederation, James Steele Jr. "We didn't know until the day that they did it."

While he was aware of some problems, Mr. Steele said, he thought they were being dealt with.

A lawyer for the tribe, Brian Upton, said tribal officials did not allow Mr. Reilly to interview members who worked at the range "because they never told us why they were investigating us."

"We do not have any corroborating details for any of the complaints," Mr. Upton said.

Tribal officials said that the Fish and Wildlife Service never liked the arrangement because it meant that the agency had to cede some control over the range, so the agency always wanted it to fail.

"It was a decision looking for an excuse," said Clayton Matt, head of the tribal confederation's natural resources department.

"We work with almost every federal agency you can think of and we have a great relationship with all of them," he said. State and federal officials have also publicly praised the tribe's management of natural resources, including the grizzly bears and other wildlife on the reservation.

Regarding praying at work, the tribe's bison range coordinator, Sheila Matt (no relation to Mr. Matt) said, "When we rode through the bison, I asked the volunteers to pray for our safety and the safety of the bison."

Critics say the decision to allow tribal management was a political one made by Interior Department appointees who favor reducing the federal role in management of parks and other properties. Such an agreement, they say, leaves no one accountable because authority for the workers lies with a tribe, which is a sovereign nation.

“The evidence of incompetency is overwhelming,” said Susan Reneau, a member of the Blue Goose Alliance, which advocates for wildlife refuges. “They did not perform their duties; they did not do their work. Yet they are not accountable.”

The federal government took control of much of the reservation land from some tribes around the turn of the century and allocated each tribal member 160 acres. The rest was open to settlement, and white settlers moved in. As a result, 30 percent of the reservation is owned by people who are not tribal members and there is longstanding enmity between the tribe and some nontribal residents.

But Mr. Kallin said he saw the matter from the opposite perspective.

“At what point,” he said, “does the Fish and Wildlife Service retain the ability to manage, according to Congressional mandate?”

Ute Murder Rate "a Disgrace" (DENP)

By Electa Draper, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 13, 2007

Towaoc - It was one of five, possibly six, killings on the isolated, 2,000-person Ute Mountain Ute Reservation last year.

Friends were passing an afternoon drinking St. Ives malt liquor when 28-year-old Samson Lameman began to play Russian roulette with a long-barreled, silver revolver. He put the gun to his head and pulled the trigger twice, according to the FBI affidavit. The chambers were empty. Lameman then persuaded 26-year-old Tasha Posey to put the gun to her head and pull the trigger.

The chamber was empty. They kept drinking.

Lameman allegedly struck Posey in the right eye with the butt of the revolver. She pushed him, then fell on top of him. Lameman fired the gun into Posey's chest, according to an eyewitness. Posey died later in the Cortez hospital; Lameman denies shooting her. The case is making its way through the federal court system.

A handful of such incidents each year - fatal stabbings, bludgeonings, beatings, shootings and drunken-driving accidents - have prompted a U.S. attorney to label this tiny sovereign nation "the murder capital of Colorado."

The Ute Mountain Ute homicide rate, says U.S. attorney Troy Eid, dwarfs the state average of nearly 4 homicides per 100,000 people. The reservation rate is comparable to 250 or 300 killings per 100,000 people, he says, and more federal resources are desperately needed.

"It is a national and state disgrace. ... No other place in Colorado is like this," Eid says. "People shouldn't go to bed at night wondering if they're going to wake up."

People living here acknowledge the plague of alcohol-fueled, and increasingly methamphetamine-caused, violence. But residents see themselves as a community of loving - sometimes feuding - extended families bound by culture and tradition and better off without outside scrutiny or interference.

Eid's characterization is an unfair exaggeration, says former Tribal

But in his next breath, White skunk says his own brother, Avery, at age 41, was murdered just north of Sleeping Ute Mountain, the landmark looming over tribal headquarters in Towaoc, in the extreme southwest corner of the state.

"It's been three, going on four, years since my brother was murdered. He was shot with a shotgun above the neck. It took a portion of his head off. ... They put him in a ditch."

The murder is unsolved. White skunk doesn't know the status of the investigation. Neither has the family had word of his missing nephew, Odell Vest, who was 18 when he

"All the (trouble) here is pretty much alcohol-driven. We've got to stop this," Whiteskunk says finally. "We've got to stop killing ourselves."

Leadership troubles

Part of the problem may be that tribal leadership has not been stable.

Whiteskunk resigned as tribal chairman in 2005, after about a year on the job, amid allegations of domestic violence and unrelated charges of driving under the influence on this "dry reservation," where it is illegal to sell, possess or consume alcohol, even in one's home. All charges were dismissed, he says.

"I've been where my people have been," he says. "I've picked myself up."

Whiteskunk's predecessor, Chairwoman Judy Knight-Frank, stepped down in 2004 after pleading guilty in federal court to falsifying income-tax records by failing to disclose salary advances.

The Ute Mountain Ute Tribal Council and Chairman Manuel Heart declined to discuss the reservation crime rate, alcoholism or any other facet of life with The Post.

"We are preparing a response paper," says Tribal Councilor Prisllena Lopez, whose brother, Tracy, was murdered at age 36.

A jealous husband bludgeoned him to death with a tire iron and the help of two Ute juveniles outside Tracy Lopez's Towaoc home in April 2005.

As for the tribe's anticipated official public statement, Ute General Counsel Peter Ortego says: "I've been working on it for seven years."

Tribal officials, including Or tego, say the tribe doesn't trust outsiders, who focus on negative issues.

Only a few generations separate the tribe from genocide, forced relocation, mandatory boarding schools, language suppression and overt racism, either directly caused or tolerated by the federal government.

Why should the tribe trust the outside world? Ortego asks.

Serious crime is one of the few things exposed to the public because it is handled in federal court.

Denver-based Eid acknowledges many things are needed on the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation, but more police and better court access are among the most urgent requirements.

"We need more police on the ground. The fundamental issue is a need for a U.S. District Court in Durango. We are unique in the Lower 48 in having only one district courthouse (in Denver). Our (two) prosecutors spend a third of their time traveling. It's an access- to-justice issue."

One FBI agent is assigned to all of southwestern Colorado, although U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., has said he has a commitment from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for a second agent to "address the growing lawlessness."

Patrolling the more than 550,000 acres of the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation are six police officers based with the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Towaoc.

Eid says the department's uniformed officers are about one- tenth the number needed for a geographical area of that size.

"There are people who think because we're a casino tribe, we can throw money at problems," Or tego says. "We don't have the resources to compensate for the lack of officers on the ground."

The tribe would not disclose revenue or profit figures. Not even the state Division of Gaming is given information on tribal revenues.

Tribes have a choice of creating their own police departments, courts and funding streams or relying on the BIA and its chronically underfunded budget, as the Ute Mountain Utes do.

"I've told (tribal leaders), unequivocally, that I think they've got to get a tribal police department and court (like the Southern Utes)," says Eid. " It will dramatically improve their safety."

Ortego says the change has been considered.

"We're looking at taking over, but that takes years," Ortego says. "There is a lot of pride here. They want to solve problems on their own. But the problem is immediate."

Tribal-court void

Misdemeanor crimes are handled in a BIA-run tribal court in Towaoc, but the court didn't function for three years because of staffing problems, Eid says.

Whenever you have a weak court, says Albuquerque-based Dan Breuninger, the BIA's special agent in charge of law enforcement for the region, it doesn't take long for the community to figure out the system is not functioning properly.

"The idea of the rule of law is meaningless to people there," says one former court official who asked not to be named. "It is a completely dysfunctional society."

In the summer of 2005, Ute Mountain tribal member Felix "Phil" Hammond died after Charleston "Chuck" Lang stabbed him 21 times in the chest and arms with a bayonet at the end of a rifle. Last month, a jury acquitted Lang of second-degree murder.

The defense successfully argued that the killing was in self-defense after a drunken Hammond barged into Lang's home "with bad intentions." Lang also had been drinking, according to police.

Neither Selwyn Whiteskunk, who heads the tribe's Public Health Department, nor the head of tribal Social Services, Carla Knight-Cantsee, would quote a rate of alcoholism or drug abuse, except to say it is the plague of a small minority.

And despite the focus on alcoholism and addiction, Knight- Cantsee says the problem is similar to any other place in the U.S.

Whiteskunk and Knight-Cant see say they believe the tribe's policy of a dry reservation is a good one. They wish the tribe had the power to close the nearest liquor store, the Eagle Claw, which sits along U.S. 491/160, about 5 miles from the reservation boundary. The tribe has unsuccessfully petitioned the county to close the store.

"They're going to blame anybody they can but themselves," says Eagle Claw owner Sandy Schroeder. But they buy liquor at every store in Cortez (another 5 or 6 miles away).

Knight-Cantsee says people use alcohol to "numb themselves and forget."

"No one has had a chance to work through the grief of genocide that traumatized generations," she says.

The legacy of slain or dislocated ancestors does not vanish quickly, she says. The effects of decades of poverty are not vanquished by one decade of casino revenues.

FBI Laptops, Weapons Continue To Vanish (ABC)

By Jack Date

ABC News, February 13, 2007

Rate of Loss Slower, but Worry Remains Over Classified Hard Drive Information

WASHINGTON -- Feb. 12, 2007 — More than 300 laptop computers and guns were lost by the FBI in a nearly four-year period, according to a new Department of Justice inspector general's report.

At least 10 of the 160 laptop computers reported lost or stolen in that period contained sensitive or classified information, the report found.

The audit was a follow-up to a similar 2002 review of the FBI's internal controls on guns and laptop computers. The new audit, which looked at a 44-month period ending on Sept. 30, 2005, showed an improvement in the rate and number of lost or stolen guns and laptops.

But while the rates may have slowed, the statistics continue to alarm Justice Department officials and FBI critics.

The inspector general's report called the losses "significant" and added that "the FBI has not taken adequate corrective action on several recommendations outlined in our 2002 audit report."

The contents of missing FBI laptops containing classified or sensitive information include software for creating identification badges, security plans and names, addresses and phone numbers of FBI personnel.

The audit found 160 guns were also lost or stolen during the audit period. One weapon was lost in a purse stolen from a sports bar. Another gun was stolen along with a fanny-pack in a restaurant. Several weapons were stolen from FBI vehicles. Many of the firearms losses resulted in suspensions without pay for the agents to whom the guns were issued.

The FBI has an inventory of more than 52,000 weapons and 26,000 laptops according to the report.

In a statement, FBI Assistant Director John Miller said, "we acknowledge more needs to be done to ensure the proper handling of the loss and theft of weapons and laptops, and the information maintained on them."

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, a frequent critic of the bureau, said in a statement, "'making progress' may seem like a win for the FBI, but it's unacceptable when you're talking about lost weapons and computers with sensitive information."

Missing FBI Laptops Still A Problem (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Three or four FBI laptop computers are lost or stolen each month and the agency is unable to say in many instances whether information on the machines is sensitive or classified, the Justice Department's inspector general said Monday.

The IG said the FBI is reducing the number of thefts and disappearances of weapons and laptop computers, but the bureau acknowledged in a statement that "more needs to be done."

The Boston field office reported a stolen laptop containing software for creating identification badges. The laboratory division at Quantico, Va., said that a stolen laptop contained names, addresses and phone numbers of FBI personnel. The New Orleans field office reported a stolen laptop that had been used to process surveillance-related electronic digital imaging.

"Perhaps most troubling, the FBI could not determine in many cases whether the lost or stolen laptop computers contained sensitive or classified information," said the Justice Department IG's stated. "Such information may include case information, personal identifying information or classified information on FBI operations."

Of the 160 laptops lost or stolen over a 44-month period, 10 contained sensitive or classified information. The bureau did not have records on whether 51 others contained such data.

In a report five years ago, the inspector general said 354 weapons and 317 laptop computers were lost or stolen during a 28-month review.

The new report found that 160 weapons were lost or stolen during the 44-month period studied.

"Making progress' may seem like a win for the FBI, but it's unacceptable when you're talking about lost weapons and computers with sensitive information," said Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa.

FBI Lost Laptops, Weapons, Report Says (LAT)

One of the 160 missing computers had agents' names and addresses.

WASHINGTON — The FBI lost 160 laptops — including at least 10 containing sensitive or classified data and one with names and addresses of agents — sometime from February 2002 to September 2005, according to a report released Monday by the Justice Department.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine also reported that 160 weapons disappeared during the same period.

Fine's report grew out of an audit examining FBI efforts to keep tabs on its equipment. Progress has been made, he said, but more must be done.

"This is a significant deficiency," Fine wrote in the report. "Without knowing the content of these lost and stolen laptops, it is impossible for the FBI to determine the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security."

The bureau has an inventory of 26,166 laptops and 52,263 weapons, according to the report.

One of the missing laptops, stolen from a facility in Quantico, Va., held the "names, addresses and telephone numbers of FBI personnel," the report stated.

Another, stolen from the Boston field office, contained software to create identification badges, and one taken from the department's security division contained a "system security plan for an electronic access control system."

The bureau does not know what sensitive or classified information was on six other laptops, and is uncertain whether 51 other machines — including seven missing from the bureau's counter-terrorism and counterintelligence divisions — carried such high-value data.

The security measures on FBI laptops include encryption software and passwords, bureau spokesman Paul Bresson said.

In a statement, FBI Assistant Director of Public Affairs John Miller highlighted the bureau's progress in reducing the loss of equipment and disagreed with the report's conclusions about the number of missing weapons.

"Nonetheless, we acknowledge more needs to be done to ensure the proper handling of the loss and theft of weapons and laptops, and the information maintained on them," he said.

A 2002 inspector general's audit found that 317 laptops had disappeared, along with 212 working weapons and 142 inoperable ones, during a 28-month period.

Audit: FBI Has Lost More Laptops, Guns (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON —Despite new tracking systems designed to help the FBI account for thousands of weapons and personal computers, the bureau reported that 160 firearms and an equal number of laptops were lost or stolen during a recent 44-month period, according to a new Justice Department audit.

Of the computers that were lost from February 2002 to September 2005, at least 10 contained sensitive or classified information, according to the review by the Justice Department's inspector general. One of those computers, the review said, included telephone numbers and addresses of bureau employees, as well as software used to make bureau ID badges.

"Most troubling," the report said, was that the FBI could not determine whether 51 of the missing computers contained sensitive or classified information.

Seven of those 51 laptops were assigned to the bureau's counterintelligence or counterterrorism divisions, which handle some of the most sensitive national security material.

"Without knowing the content of these lost and stolen laptops, it is impossible for the FBI to determine the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security," the report said.

The review, a follow-up to an earlier study of lost computers and weapons at the FBI, actually represented an improvement over past findings.

However, the report said the FBI has not consistently followed equipment-tracking plans set up after a 2002 audit found that 354 weapons and 317 laptops were lost or stolen in a 28-month period that ended in January 2002.

After the 2002 audit, the FBI began requiring employees to report lost or stolen equipment to their managers within five days. Managers then were required to report the losses to headquarters within 10 days.

Monday's report, however, said auditors had found that many of the headquarters reports, detailing the loss of 51 weapons, lacked "critical information," including the dates of the losses.

Regarding the 10 missing laptops that contained sensitive or classified information, the FBI conducted investigations in six of the cases. One resulted in a three-day suspension of an employee, two inquiries were pending and three others led to no disciplinary action.

The remaining four losses — including the missing computer that contained details about FBI personnel and software for making ID badges — did not trigger investigations.

In a written response, Joseph Ford, the FBI's associate deputy director, said the bureau has taken "appropriate steps to minimize these losses."

Ford said 43 of the 160 lost or stolen weapons were reported in the prior audit period. As a result, he said, the actual number of missing weapons in the new audit should have been 117.

"We acknowledge that more needs to be done to ensure the proper handling … of the laptop computers and, more importantly, the information maintained thereon," he said.

Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, a frequent critic of FBI operations, called the losses "unacceptable."

FBI Lost 160 Of Its Computers In 44 Months, Report Says (SFC)

By Jennifer A. Dlouhy, Hearst Newspapers

San Francisco Chronicle, February 13, 2007

Some laptops had classified data -- 160 weapons gone, too

Washington -- Every month, the FBI loses track of three to four laptop computers, some of which contain classified or sensitive information, according to a report released Monday by the inspector general for the Department of Justice.

During a 44-month period from Feb. 1, 2002, to Sept. 30, 2005, the bureau reported 160 lost or stolen laptops, according to the report. In addition, the bureau said 160 weapons had been lost or stolen.

Inspector General Glenn Fine said that was an improvement for the FBI because, in the previous 28-month period, 317 laptops were reported lost or stolen -- about 11 a month. In the same time frame, officials could not account for 354 weapons.

"The FBI has made some progress in improving its controls over weapons and laptops," Fine said. "However, significant deficiencies remain, particularly with regard to the FBI's response to lost or stolen laptops that may contain sensitive information."

The inspector general's inquiry found that at least 10 of the 160 missing laptops contained sensitive or classified information -- and one of those contained names, addresses and telephone numbers for FBI personnel.

For another 51 missing laptops, the FBI was unable to say whether they contained sensitive or classified data even though seven of them came from counterintelligence and counterterrorism divisions that routinely handle national security information.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the number of lost weapons and computers is "unacceptable."

"Tracking these deadly weapons and computers may seem like it's not worth the time to some in law enforcement," Grassley said. "But it's critical to public safety, national security and the credibility of the FBI and the other agencies that are losing personal information on Americans."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the losses were "especially troubling" at a time "when Americans are increasingly confronted with reports of major data breaches involving lost or stolen laptops, and with the dangers of identity theft."

When Robert Mueller took over as director of the FBI in 2001, he promised to "restore the public's confidence" in the bureau, which had been embarrassed by its management of documents related to the case against Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, the spy scandal involving agent Robert Hanssen, and its chronic loss of weapons and laptops.

The FBI has implemented new requirements for reporting lost or stolen weapons and laptops.

10 Of 160 Missing FBI Laptops Had Sensitive Data (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

Of the 160 laptop computers reported by the FBI as lost or stolen in the past 44 months, 10 contained sensitive or classified information, including one with personal identification details on bureau personnel, a Justice Department report said yesterday.

But, according to the department's Office of the Inspector General, the FBI did not know whether 51 other lost or stolen laptops contained sensitive or classified information, seven of which were assigned to the bureau's counterintelligence or counterterrorism divisions.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that without knowing the content of the missing laptops, it was "impossible for the FBI to determine the extent of the damage" to its operations or to national security.

"This is a significant deficiency because some of these laptops may have contained classified or sensitive information such as personally identifiable information or investigative case files," Mr. Fine said.

The FBI also reported the loss or theft of 160 weapons during that period, the report stated.

FBI Assistant Director John Miller said the report notes that the bureau has made "significant progress" in reducing the loss of weapons and laptops. He also said the report counted as lost a number of weapons that were reported missing before the audit period.

"While the inspector general acknowledged that the loss of certain resources is inevitable in an organization the size of the FBI, we nevertheless stand committed to increasing institutional and personal accountability to further increase the progress we have made in minimizing the loss of firearms and information-technology components," Mr. Miller said.

But Sen. Charles E. Grassley, a senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said that "making progress" in reducing the number of lost weapons and computers was "unacceptable."

"Tracking these deadly weapons and computers may seem like it's not worth the time to some in law enforcement, but it's critical to public safety, national security and the credibility of the FBI and the other agencies that are losing personal information on Americans," he said.

According to the report, 63 laptops were stolen from or lost by officials assigned to FBI headquarters in Washington. Most of the lost or stolen weapons were reported in New York -- 13. The report stated that although the FBI had taken steps to address weaknesses in physical inventories and tracking of lost or stolen weapons and laptops since a 2002 audit, significant deficiencies remain.

In 2002, the FBI reported that 354 weapons and 317 laptops were lost or stolen over 28 months.

Mr. Fine said that since the 2002 audit, the FBI established deadlines for reporting lost and stolen weapons and laptops, entering those losses into the National Crime Information Center and referring them for investigation.

But, he said, the FBI did not consistently follow its own established procedures.

"When some of the lost or stolen laptops were identified as containing sensitive or classified information, the FBI examined few of these losses to determine the damage that these losses may have had on the FBI's operations and national security," he said.

FBI: 160 Laptops, 160 Weapons Missing (TE)

By Bill Myers,

The Examiner, February 13, 2007

An FBI staffer in the Washington field office lost a laptop in May 2004. To this day, the FBI doesn't know what was on the computer and whether the information was classified.

Another FBI laptop, reported stolen from the FBI's laboratory at Quantico in July, 2002, contained the names, addresses and phone numbers of FBI employees.

These were just two examples of 160 FBI laptops lost or stolen in less than four years and documented in a report released by the Department of Justice's Inspector General Monday.

In dozens of these cases, the FBI couldn't tell whether the computers stored classified information, Glenn A. Fine's report found.

Agents also reported 160 lost or stolen weapons in the same period, with 14 percent of those weapons not being entered into a national criminal database to track them, the report said.

Monday's report was a follow-up to a 2002 report that found the FBI lacked the necessary precautions to protect its weapons and computers. The overall situation have improved since then, inspectors found, but the FBI is still being too sloppy in tracking its laptops.

Though the rate at which laptops were lost dropped dramatically, the rate at which laptops were stolen jumped by over 50 percent between the two reports, Fine said. At least 10 of the lost or stolen laptops contained classified information, including the one allegedly stolen from Quantico.

In 51 cases, though, the FBI couldn't say whether the laptops had classified or sensitive data.

"This is a significant deficiency," Fine wrote. "Without knowing the contents of these lost and stolen laptop computers, it is impossible for the FBI to know the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security."

In an e-mailed statement, FBI Assistant Director John Miller said that many of the report's findings pre-dated the audit.

"Nonetheless, we acknowledge more needs to be done to ensure the proper handling of the loss and theft of weapons and laptops, and the information maintained on them," Miller's e-mail stated.

Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, the ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee and an outspoken critic of the FBI, called on the Bureau to clean up its act.

"Tracking these deadly weapons and computers may seem like it's not worth the time to some in law enforcement," Grassley said in an e-mail sent through his spokeswoman, "but it's critical to public safety, national security and the credibility of the FBI and the other agencies that are losing personal information on Americans."

F.B.I. Lags In Securing Its Laptops And Weapons (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 (Bloomberg News) — The Federal Bureau of Investigation is making progress safeguarding its weapons and laptop computers, though there are still shortcomings to address, the Justice Department's inspector general said in a report issued on Monday.

The report by the inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, said that 160 weapons and 160 laptops had been lost or stolen over a 44-month period and that the bureau could not determine "in many cases" whether the missing computers had contained sensitive or classified information. Six of those computers were assigned to the bureau's counterintelligence division, and one was assigned to its counterterrorism division, the report said.

The report also said the bureau had made progress protecting its weapons and laptops since a 2002 review found "significant" losses of both.

"We recognize that in an organization the size of the F.B.I., some weapons and laptops will inevitably be stolen or go missing," the report said. "However, it is important that the F.B.I. take appropriate steps to minimize these losses."

The bureau has 52,263 weapons, including semiautomatic pistols, rifles, carbines, shotguns, tear-gas guns and submachine guns, and 26,166 laptops, according to the report, which covered the period from Feb. 1, 2002, to Sept. 30, 2005.

In a response included in the report, Joseph L. Ford, the associate deputy director of the bureau, said that the actual number of stolen weapons was 117 and that the report included 43 that had been lost or stolen earlier.

John Miller, an assistant director of the bureau, said in a statement on Monday that it would take several steps suggested by the inspector general.

"We acknowledge more needs to be done," Mr. Miller said, "to ensure the proper handling of the loss and theft of weapons and laptops, and the information maintained on them."

FBI Struggles With Laptop And Gun Losses (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 13, 2007

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is struggling in-house to prevent its own guns and laptops from getting stolen or lost, according to the Justice Department's inspector general.

In a report issued today documenting the FBI's efforts, Inspector General Glenn Fine said that "significant deficiencies still remain" in the bureau's inventory and tracking system since he last did an audit in 2002. Fine says the FBI "has made progress" in "decreasing the rate of loss" for weapons and laptops. The bureau has an inventory of more than 52,000 weapons and 26,000 laptops. During a 44-month period from 2002 through 2005, Fine said, the bureau reported 320 lost or stolen weapons and stolen laptops.

The previous audit showed 354 weapons and 217 laptops lost or stolen during a 28-month period. Fine found that at least 10 of the 160 missing laptops had sensitive or classified information, and one contained personal identifying information on FBI personnel. The FBI told the IG that it couldn't figure out in 51 other instances whether lost or stolen laptops had sensitive or classified information.

More worrisome, said Fine, was the fact that seven of the 51 missing laptops were assigned to agents in the Counterintelligence or Counterterrorism divisions, which handle some of the most sensitive spy and terrorism investigations.

"Without knowing the content of these lost or stolen laptops," the IG's office said, "it is impossible for the FBI to determine the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations and national security." The inspector general also said that the bureau had "improved its controls" by setting up deadlines for reporting missing items, entering them into a criminal justice database, and triggering investigations.

But the FBI did not "consistently" follow its own protocols, Fine said.

Finally, the FBI has failed to properly document whether laptops and hard drives that are being disposed of have been erased of sensitive data prior to dumping them, nor did it consistently make sure that FBI employees who quit the bureau turn in their guns and computers before they exit.

The FBI says that Fine made some incorrect inferences and that some of the missing items predated the audit but that it is going to accept the IG's recommendations.

Report: FBI Loses 3 To 4 Laptops Every Month (INFOWEEK)

By Sharon Gaudin, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, February 13, 2007

Three to four laptops are lost or stolen from the FBI every month, according to a report issued this month from the Justice Department's Inspector General.

While 116 FBI laptops were reported lost and 44 were reported stolen in the last 44 months, the agency is doing better than it was five years ago, the DOJ's audit said of one of the nation's top investigative agencies. Another audit, conducted in 2002, showed that in a 28-month period 300 FBI laptops had been lost and 17 had been stolen.

At least seven of the computers were issued to FBI divisions that handle some of the most sensitive information related to national security. Six were assigned to the Counter-Intelligence Division and one was assigned to the Counterterrorism Division. Yet, the FBI did not know what these computers contained, including whether or not they held sensitive or classified information.

"This is a significant deficiency," the report states. "Some of these laptops may have contained classified or sensitive information, such as personally identifiable information or investigative case files. Without knowing the contents of these lost and stolen laptop computers, it is impossible for the FBI to know the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security."

The missing laptops include one that was reported stolen from a Boston field office that contained software for creating identification badges. Reports say it was encrypted. Another laptop was reported stolen from the FBI's own security division. While it, too, was encrypted, it contained a system security plan for an electronic access control system. However, it's not known if a laptop stolen from the FBI Academy at the U.S. Marine Corps Base Quantico in Virginia was encrypted. That machine contained the names, addresses, and telephone numbers for FBI personnel.

Ken van Wyk, principal consultant with KRvW Associates and formerly with the Defense Information Systems Agency, says it's important to separate the lost computers from the information on them. "It's disconcerting, but as someone who travels with electronic gear all the time, I can tell you we're targeted," he adds. "But a lot of agencies, and I've got to believe that includes the FBI, are using whole-disk encryption. The chances of a thief being able to break it are very slim. The risk, at that point, is extremely low."

Van Wyk adds that while the FBI obviously should tighten up its security, he thinks the agency's computer loss rate would match up to that of most large companies. "It's inevitable," he says.

According to the audit report, the FBI investigated six of the 10 laptop losses that were known to contain sensitive or classified information. Of those six, one resulted in a three-day suspension, two investigations were pending when the report was filed, and three resulted in no action taken against the employee. The FBI did not investigate the remaining four losses, including the loss of the laptop computers that contained personal identifying information of FBI personnel and software for creating identification badges

FBI Assistant Director John Miller said in a written statement that it is notable that the agency reduced the rate of lost computers.

"The OIG [Office of Inspector General] determined that when compared with figures from 2002, there has been a 349% reduction in the average number of weapons lost or stolen in a given month and a 312% reduction in the loss or theft of laptop computers," said Miller, noting that he disagrees with some of the audit's findings. "Nonetheless, we acknowledge more needs to be done to ensure the proper handling of the loss and theft of weapons and laptops, and the information maintained on them.

"While the Inspector General acknowledged that the loss of certain resources is inevitable in an organization the size of the FBI, we nevertheless stand committed to increasing institutional and personal accountability to further increase the progress we have made in minimizing the loss of firearms and information technology components," added Miller.

The Inspector General's report also audited the number of weapons that have been lost or stolen from the FBI. In the first audit, 354 weapons had been lost or stolen, and in this second audit, the number dropped to 160. Forty-eight functional weapons were lost, 94 functional weapons were stolen, and 18 training weapons were lost.

In 2001, the U.S. Attorney General requested that the Office of the Inspector General conduct audits over the control of weapons and laptops within the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Federal Bureau of Prisons, and the U.S. Marshals Service. The report on the FBI disclosed "significant losses" of weapons and computers so a follow-up audit was requested.

The FBI had the greatest number of losses, as well as the most significant deficiencies in controls, of all the DOJ components reviewed in the 2002 audits, according to the report.

17 Texas Syndicate Gang Members Indicted (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 13, 2007

Seventeen alleged members of the Texas Syndicate gang have been indicted under the federal RICO Act on charges that include murder, attempted murder, robbery and narcotics distribution.

Three of those charged, Jesus Galvan Jr., 40, Francisco Nuncio Jr., 34, and Jerry Villarreal, 36, appeared in federal court in Houston this afternoon.

The chained and handcuffed trio, wearing street clothes and heavily marked with tattoos, appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley. They are among eight defendants arrested this morning. The nine others indicted are behind bars.

RICO — Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act — allows extended prison time for crimes associated with ongoing criminal enterprises such as gang activity.

The sealed indictment against the 17 defendants was described by Botley as "quite lengthy." Botley said he expects to see all 17 defendants by Friday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tim Braley asked Botley to detain all three men because they are flight risks and a danger to the community. Detention and arraignment hearings for the trio were set for 10 a.m. Thursday.

As the hearing closed, Nuncio and Villarreal asked to call their wives. All three are married and Botley ordered the U.S. marshals to allow them to call their spouses.

HIV Patients: Marijuana Eases Foot Pain (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 13, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Smoking marijuana eased HIV-related pain in some patients in a small study that nevertheless represented one of the few rigorous attempts to find out if the drug has medicinal benefits.

The Bush administration's Office of National Drug Control Policy quickly sought to shoot holes in the experiment.

The study, conducted at San Francisco General Hospital from 2003 to 2005 and published Monday in the journal Neurology, involved 50 patients suffering from HIV-related foot pain known as peripheral neuropathy. There are no drugs specifically approved to treat that kind of pain.

Three times daily for nearly a week, the patients smoked marijuana cigarettes machine-rolled at the National Institute of Drug Abuse, the only legal source for the drug recognized by the federal government.

Half the patients received marijuana, while the other 25 received placebo cigarettes that lacked the drug's active ingredient, tetrahydrocannabinol. Scientists said the study was the first one published that used a comparison group, which is generally considered the gold standard for scientific research.

Thirteen patients who received marijuana told doctors their pain eased by at least a third after smoking pot, while only six of those smoking placebos said likewise. The marijuana smokers reported an average pain reduction of 34 percent, double the drop reported by the placebo smokers as measured with a widely accepted pain scale.

"These results provide evidence that there is measurable medical benefit to smoking cannabis for these patients," said Dr. Donald Abrams, the University of California, San Francisco professor who led the study.

Many critics of smoked marijuana agree THC has promise as a painkiller, but they argue the smoke itself is harmful.

DOJ_NMG_0131604

"People who smoke marijuana are subject to bacterial infections in the lungs," said David Murray, chief scientist at the Office of National Drug Control Policy. "Is this really what a physician who is treating someone with a compromised immune system wants to prescribe?"

Murray also questioned the statistical relevance of study with just 50 participants in the test.

Dr. Mark Ware, a researcher at McGill University in Montreal conducting similar tests, defended Abrams' study as sound and statistically reliable.

The study is one of the few human tests in a research field nearly devoid of federal funding.

"This is a valid medicine and I want safe access to my medication," said Diana Dodson, a 50-year-old grandmother of five who participated in the test in 2004.

California and 10 other states have passed laws legalizing marijuana for medicinal purposes, but the federal government considers it a dangerous drug, like cocaine or heroin. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2005 that state laws do not protect users from the federal ban.

To conduct the test, Abrams needed authorization from eight academic and government agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The study cost about $1 million and was paid for by the University of California Center for Medicinal Cannabis Research, which has sponsored several smoked marijuana tests.

Research Supports Medicinal Marijuana (WP)

By Rick Weiss, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

AIDS Patients in Controlled Study Had Significant Pain Relief

AIDS patients suffering from debilitating nerve pain got as much or more relief by smoking marijuana as they would typically get from prescription drugs -- and with fewer side effects -- according to a study conducted under rigorously controlled conditions with government-grown pot.

In a five-day study performed in a specially ventilated hospital ward where patients smoked three marijuana cigarettes a day, more than half the participants tallied significant reductions in pain.

By contrast, less than one-quarter of those who smoked "placebo" pot, which had its primary psychoactive ingredients removed, reported benefits, as measured by subjective pain reports and standardized neurological tests.

The White House belittled the study as "a smoke screen," short on proof of efficacy and flawed because it did not consider the health impacts of inhaling smoke.

But other doctors and advocates of marijuana policy reform said the findings, in today's issue of the journal Neurology, offer powerful evidence that the Drug Enforcement Administration's classification of cannabis as having "no currently accepted medical use" is outdated.

"This should be a wake-up call for Congress to hold hearings to investigate the therapeutic use of cannabis and to encourage more research," said Barbara T. Roberts, a former interim associate deputy director in the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, now with Americans for Safe Access, which promotes access to marijuana for therapies and research.

Countless anecdotal reports have suggested that smoking marijuana can help relieve the pain, nausea and muscular spasticity that often accompany cancer, AIDS, multiple sclerosis and other ailments. But few well-controlled studies have been conducted.

The new study enrolled 50 AIDS patients with severe foot pain caused by their disease or by the medicines they take.

The team first measured baseline pain, both subjectively (patients ranked their pain on a scale of 1 to 100) and with two standardized tests, one involving a small hot iron held to the skin and another involving hot chili pepper cream.

Then, for five days, patients lit up at 8 a.m., 2 p.m. and 8 p.m. using a calibrated puff method that calls for inhaling for five seconds, holding one's breath for 10, then waiting 45 seconds before the next.

The cigarettes were kept frozen and locked in a safe, then thawed and humidified one day before use. Cigarette butts and other debris were collected, weighed and returned to the safe to ensure no diversion for recreational purposes.

Grown on the government's official pot farm in Mississippi, the drug was about one-quarter the potency of quality street marijuana. The inactive version was chemically cleansed of cannabinoids, the drug's main active ingredients.

"It smelled like and looked like" normal marijuana, said study leader Donald I. Abrams, a physician at San Francisco General Hospital, where the smoking ward was located. Like the patients, Abrams was not told who had the active pot until the study was over.

Thirteen of 25 patients who smoked the regular marijuana achieved pain reduction of at least 30 percent, compared with six of 25 who smoked placebo pot. The average pain reduction for the real cannabis was 34 percent, compared with17 percent for the placebo.

Opioids and other pills can reduce nerve pain by 20 to 30 percent but can cause drowsiness and confusion, Abrams said. And many patients complain that a prescription version of pot's main ingredient in pill form does not work for them.

That was true for Diana Dodson, 50, who received an AIDS diagnosis in 1997 after a blood transfusion.

"I have so many layers of pain I can hardly walk," said Dodson, who was in the new study. Prescription drugs made her feel worse. "But inhaled cannabis works," she said.

Patients in the study -- all of whom had smoked pot previously -- reported no notable side effects, though the researchers acknowledged that people unfamiliar with the drug may not fare as well.

Igor Grant, director of the University of California Center for Medicinal Cannabis Research, which funded the research, said the study was probably the best-designed U.S. test of marijuana's medical potential in decades. He called the results "highly believable."

But David Murray, chief scientist at the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, called the findings "not particularly persuasive." The study was relatively small, he said, and it is likely that those who received the real pot were aware of that, introducing a bias of expected efficacy.

"We're very much supportive of any effort to ameliorate the suffering of AIDS patients," Murray said. But even if ingredients in marijuana prove useful, he added, they ought to be synthesized in a pill to make dosing more accurate and to minimize lung damage.

Separately, ending a six-year effort, a Massachusetts group learned yesterday that it had won a legal victory against the DEA in its battle for federal permission to grow its own cannabis for federally approved studies, instead of relying on government pot.

In an 87-page opinion, administrative law judge Mary Ellen Bittner ruled that it "would be in the public interest" to allow a University of Massachusetts researcher to cultivate marijuana under contract to the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies (MAPS), which sponsors medical research on marijuana and other drugs.

The DEA is not obligated to follow the advice of its law judges, but the detailed decision should make it difficult for the agency to balk, said MAPS President Rick Doblin.

Medical Pot Cuts Pain, Study Finds First Rigorous Research Looked At HIV Patients (SFC)

By Sabin Russell, Chronicle Medical Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 13, 2007

Doctors at San Francisco General Hospital reported Monday that HIV-infected patients suffering from a painful nerve condition in their hands or feet obtained substantial relief by smoking small amounts of marijuana in a carefully constructed study funded by the state of California.

Although the study was small, it is the first of its kind to measure the therapeutic effects of marijuana smoking while meeting the most rigorous requirements for scientific proof -- a randomized, double-blind placebo-controlled trial.

As such, the results of the trial are being hailed by medical marijuana advocates as the most solid proof to date that smoking the herb can be beneficial to patients who might otherwise require opiates or other powerful painkillers to cope with a condition known as peripheral neuropathy.

The federal government has taken a hard line against marijuana use for medical purposes, maintaining that smoking it is harmful and that there is no scientific evidence to support its legitimacy for treatment in the United States. The U.S. Supreme Court in 2005 ruled that medical marijuana patients can be prosecuted by the government, even in states like California where medical use has been legalized.

"It's time to wake up and smell the data," said Bruce Mirken, spokesman for the Marijuana Policy Project, a group advocating the legalization of the drug for medicinal purposes. "The claim that the government keeps making that marijuana is not a safe or effective medicine doesn't have a leg to stand on."

The study found that most volunteers who were given three marijuana cigarettes a day experienced a significant drop in the searing pain of peripheral neuropathy, which patients liken to a stabbing or burning sensation, usually on the bottoms of their feet. HIV patients are not the only group to experience peripheral neuropathy -- many types of the condition have been identified, and it can also afflict diabetics, cancer patients and people with injuries or infections that affect nerve tissue.

On average, the experiment's participants reported at the start that their pain was roughly at midpoint on a 100-point scale, where zero was no pain at all and 100 was "the worst pain imaginable."

At least half the volunteers who smoked the active marijuana experienced a 72 percent reduction in pain after their first cigarette on the first day of the trial. Over five days, the median reduction in pain reported by the marijuana smokers was 34 percent, compared with 17 percent reported by those who smoked placebo cigarettes that had the active ingredient THC removed in a process akin to decaffeinating coffee.

"This is evidence, using the gold standard for clinical research, that cannabis has some medicinal benefits for a condition that can be severely debilitating," said Dr. Donald Abrams, lead author of the study released Monday by the journal Neurology.

The trial was conducted over a two-year period beginning in May 2003, during which 50 volunteers each spent a week at a secured laboratory at San Francisco General. Patients were required to stop their marijuana use before the start of the experiment. After a two-day orientation period, they were given one cigarette three times a day. Half of the volunteers received marijuana containing about 3.5 percent THC, the active ingredient of the drug. That's significantly weaker than what can be purchased on the street or in medical marijuana dispensaries. The other half received the placebo.

Abrams said that the placebo cigarettes looked and smelled identical to the ones containing active ingredients.

One volunteer, Diana Dodson, a 50-year-old Santa Cruz woman, subsequently learned she had been given the active ingredient. She has tried the FDA-approved pill containing THC, a drug known as Marinol, but said it does not control her pain as well. "For four or five hours, it puts me in a fog," she said.

Smoking marijuana, she said, helps control nausea and her peripheral neuropathy. "I attribute my cannabis use to my staying alive 21 years with HIV," she said.

Dobson described the pain of peripheral neuropathy as a constant sense of burning on the bottoms of her feet, with periodic jabbing pains "like a sharp ice pick, or an electric shock."

After stopping her marijuana use for the required two-day period and then resuming it for the experiment, she said the effect of receiving the real drug again was powerful. "I was a little surprised the results were so dramatic, as they were using low-quality cannabis," she said.

Because of the unusual nature of the experiment, Abrams first had to receive clearance from eight different government agencies, including the University of California, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

The cigarettes were made from marijuana grown on a federal marijuana farm in Mississippi, and stored in a locked freezer at San Francisco General.

Publication of the paper is a milestone for Abrams, who has been exploring the medicinal effects of marijuana among AIDS patients since 1984 and fought a long battle to win permission from federal agencies to conduct the study.

In the end, it took the taxpayers of California to pay for the research. Under legislation signed by then-Gov. Gray Davis in 1999, the state created the Center for Medicinal Cannabis Research, headquartered at UC San Diego and operating in partnership with UCSF.

Dr. Igor Grant, executive director of the research center, said a total of $8.7 million has been allocated to the program by the state Legislature since it was launched in 2000. Abrams' study, the first of a dozen similar clinical trials now under way, cost $849,000.

Grant said that the findings were "very promising," but stressed that the results of any single trial, no matter how well constructed, are not necessarily definitive. He said that data are now being analyzed from a similar trial that was conducted at UC San Diego. A second trial, also completed at UCSD, enrolled volunteers who were not HIV patients. Their sensitivity to pain was measured using well-established monitoring tests using capsaicin, a cream that stimulates heat-sensing nerves.

Marijuana Reduces Pain In HIV Patients (MRE)

Mercury-Register, February 12, 2007

HIV patients who smoked three joints of marijuana per day for five days experienced relief from chronic foot pain associated with the disease, researchers at the University of California, San Francisco reported Monday in a rare U.S. study on medical marijuana.

"These results provide evidence that there is a measurable medical benefit to smoking cannabis for these patients," said study lead author Dr. Donald Abrams, UCSF professor of clinical medicine.

The study involved 50 HIV patients with sensory neuropathy, a peripheral nerve disorder that causes intense, sharp pain, numbness and tingling in the hands and feet. The condition affects about one in three HIV patients.

Patients assigned to smoke cannabis experienced a 34 percent reduction in intense foot pain -- twice the rate experienced by patients who smoked a placebo.

The first cannabis cigarette patients smoked reduced chronic pain by a median of 72 percent compared to 15 percent for patients who smoked the placebo, according to the study, published in the journal Neurology.

Half the patients were assigned randomly to smoke cannabis while the remaining 25 patients smoked an identical-looking placebo that lacked the drug's active ingredient. They had to be off any medication to treat neuropathy, including private-use marijuana. The patients were required to have some prior experience smoking the drug but could not have substance abuse problems.

The patients were sequestered at San Francisco General Hospital for seven days, where they underwent frequent testing. Over five consecutive days, they smoked cannabis or a placebo three times per day in rolled cigarettes. The National Institute on Drug Abuse provided the identical machine-rolled marijuana cigarettes.

Diana Dodson, 50, of Santa Cruz was among the 25 patients who received cannabis. She contracted HIV after receiving tainted blood product in 1985 and has been living with AIDS for 10 years.

Dodson, who smokes marijuana on her own to control her pain and nausea associated with AIDS, said the drug has been a lifesaver. "I really attribute cannabis to why I am still alive today," she said.

Her neuropathy symptoms include an extreme burning on the soles of her feet. "It's like an electrical poker going through me," she said. "I'll scream in the kitchen. Sometimes it's like a jabbing ice-pick pain."

Just a few puffs gives her relief for two hours without the grogginess associated with taking opiates such as morphine, she said.

The UCSF study indicated that pain relief from cannabis was on par with that from morphine.

The quality of the marijuana used in the trial wasn't as good as what Dobson gets on her own, she said, but she still felt relief from pain.

"It gives me a quality of life I wouldn't otherwise have," she said.

By contrast, previous studies of marinol -- the FDA-approved drug containing a synthetic version of THC, the active ingredient in cannabis -- showed little promise in relief for HIV-associated neuropathy.

"There are other compounds in smoked marijuana besides THC," said UCSF study co-author Dr. Cheryl A. Jay, a professor of clinical neurology. "That's one of several explanations why our study had a positive result while previous marinol studies did not."

David Murray, chief scientist at the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said people who smoke marijuana are subject to bacterial infections. He added that the study, considering its small size is "not a convincing demonstration."

Treatment for HIV-related neuropathy includes antidepressants and seizure drugs, but these medications don't always work and some patients cannot tolerate them. Opiates such as morphine are also sometimes used. There are no drugs approved by the FDA specifically for the condition.

The study is the first of several clinical trials of medical cannabis being conducted through the University of California's Center for Medicinal Cannabis Research, based at UC San Diego.

Dr. Igor Grant, director of the cannabis research center at UCSD, said the findings in this study suggest that cannabis "may be useful" in treating HIV-associated neuropathy. He noted that it has been many years since clinical trials of cannabis have been conducted in the United States.

"As a result, there has been insufficient light shed on the possible therapeutic value of cannabis," Grant said.

A 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine reviewed the scientific literature on medical marijuana and found that though it is a powerful drug, it is safe and should not be excluded from some medical uses.

Studies have indicated that cannabiniod drugs could help with pain relief, control of nausea and vomiting and appetite stimulation, according to the IOM report.

Americans for Safe Access and the National Association of People with AIDS on Tuesday plan to call for congressional hearings to implement the IOM report findings, which include further scientific studies of cannabis.

"Bolstered by the preliminary findings in the Abrams (UCSF) study, we will go to Congress and familiarize them with the IOM report so we can move forward with the research," said Dr. Barbara T. Roberts, director of medical and scientific affairs at Americans for Safe Access.

Study: Marijuana Can Ease HIV-related Nerve Pain (MCT)

By Carrie Peyton Dahlberg

McClatchy Newspapers, February 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131608

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - Smoking marijuana can ease HIV-related nerve pain, University of California San Francisco researchers are reporting Tuesday, in a study being hailed by legalization advocates as proof that federal pot policy is deeply misguided.

The rigorous study, appearing in Tuesday's issue of the journal Neurology, was funded by a state effort to provide answers in the long debate over whether marijuana makes good medicine.

Primary investigator Dr. Donald Abrams, a professor of clinical medicine at UCSF, was not surprised that about half the people studied with burning, tingling nerve pain got relief smoking marijuana.

"It has a 5,000-year history of safety and effectiveness as a medicine that we've ignored quite grandly in the last 70 years," he said. "It's been used ... in China, in India and also in Middle Eastern cultures as a medicinal substance."

Yet the study comes on the heels of an unrelated analysis, published in Monday's Archives of Internal Medicine, that links long-term exposure to marijuana smoke with coughing, wheezing and other respiratory complaints common among tobacco smokers.

"The bottom line is, it certainly needs to be looked into further," said Dr. Jeanette Tetrault, a general internal medicine fellow at Yale University who is among those investigating possible lung cancer or respiratory disease links to marijuana smoking.

If marijuana is ultimately found to deliver better pain relief than existing medications, she said, research into the safest possible delivery mechanisms would be critical.

The UCSF study is among the first published results funded by the UC Center for Medicinal Cannabis Research, which was created by state law to improve the science on marijuana after California voters supported medical pot use.

So far, the center has spent roughly two-thirds of the $9 million it received, devoting the money to research into nerve pain, sleep difficulties, muscle spasms and other conditions.

Some studies, including ones for cancer pain and nausea, had to be discontinued for lack of volunteers, said center director Dr. Igor Grant, a UC San Diego psychiatry professor.

The center will remain active until all the money is spent, supporting about a dozen studies, which Grant acknowledges are "not a lot" but still much more than we knew just a few years ago.

"The results of these studies will provide some real information into whether cannabis is or isn't helpful," Grant said.

Federal policy has long discouraged investigations of marijuana, setting up numerous regulatory and practical hurdles, said Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Marijuana Policy Project, which backs legalization.

In such an environment, the state-backed study is "truly gold-standard" research, Mirken said; it's placebo-controlled and double-blinded.

About half the 55 people who initially enrolled were given placebo cigarettes, with a key active ingredient stripped out. Both they and the researchers analyzing results were "blinded" - that is, not told who got the real thing.

Such measures are used to keep subtle bias from creeping into research, and to account for the powerful way people are known to respond to dummy medications. In the UCSF study, for example, about one-fourth of the people smoking placebo cigarettes experienced significant pain relief, compared with half of those smoking marijuana.

But researchers acknowledged that their blinding effort was imperfect because smokers might have been able to recognize whether they were inhaling active cannabis or not.

"I knew immediately because I could feel the effects," said one study subject, Diana Dodson. "I did get the cannabis." Her impression was later confirmed in a letter from researchers.

Dodson, who lives near Santa Cruz, gets burning, bruising, sometimes jolting nerve pain on the bottoms of her feet, a complication of the HIV she contracted more than 20 years ago from a tainted blood product.

"It's like an ice pick stab with an electric shock," she said, and stronger painkillers leave her less aware and less alert than marijuana does. She participated in the study in hopes that "we'll be able to have safe access to this medicine."

While other options exist for many of the ills that marijuana may treat, it's important to have as many safe drugs as possible in doctors' arsenals, said UCSF medical professor Abrams.

Individuals respond differently to each drugs' benefits and side effects, and drug interactions can make it tough to find the right match for each person.

Abrams is seeking volunteers now for another marijuana study, looking into whether cancer patients taking morphine or OxyContin for pain might be able to use a lower dose or suffer fewer unpleasant side effects if they combine the treatment with marijuana.

Marijuana Reduces HIV Neuropathy (MT)

By Michael Smith

DOJ_NMG_0131609

Medpage Today, February 12, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- Smoking marijuana significantly reduces nerve pain associated with HIV infection, according to researchers here.

In a randomized, placebo-controlled trial, the drug reduced chronic neuropathic pain by 34% compared with 17% for patients smoking placebo cigarettes, found Donald Abrams, M.D, of the University of California San Francisco.

The pain reductions are comparable with those seen with oral drugs used to treat peripheral HIV-associated neuropathy, Dr. Abrams and colleagues reported in the Feb. 13 issue of Neurology.

"There is a measurable medical benefit to smoking cannabis for these patients," Dr. Abrams commented.

In the study, 50 patients with HIV-associated neuropathy were randomly assigned to smoke either cannabis or placebo cigarettes three times a day for five days under supervision as in-patients San Francisco General Hospital.

The cigarettes, supplied by the National Center on Drug Abuse, were identical in appearance, but the placebo cigarettes had the active ingredient -- delta-9-tetrahydrocannabinol - removed.

To be eligible for the study, patients had to have an average daily pain score of at least 30 on a 100-point visual analog scale. The primary outcome was change in the daily pain score, while secondary outcomes included acute pain before and after the first cigarette of the five-day session and again before and after the last cigarette of the session.

A subset of patients also took part in an acute pain experiment in which they were subjected to heat or to other painful stimuli, the researchers reported.

The investigators found:

Over the course of the study, smoked cannabis reduced daily pain by 34%, versus 17% with placebo, a difference that was statistically significant at P=0.03.

52% of the cannabis group reported at least a 30% reduction in pain, compared with 24% in the placebo group, which was significant at P=0.04.

The first cannabis cigarette reduced chronic pain, on average, by 72%, compared with 15% for placebo, which was significant at P<0.001.

On Day five, before smoking the last cigarette, median pain ratings were significantly lower among the cannabis patients (at P=0.006) and were further reduced by 51% versus 5% after smoking. The reduction was significant at P<0.001.

Cannabis also reduced experimentally induced hyperalgesia to both brush and von Frey hair stimuli (P=0.05) but had little effect on the painfulness of heat stimulation.

No serious adverse events were reported.

In general, Dr. Abrams and colleagues found, adverse events such as sedation, dizziness, and confusion were significantly higher among the cannabis smokers.

However, in both groups, the values "hovered closer to zero than one and do not represent any serious safety concerns," the researchers said.

Also, there was little difference in mood effects between the two groups, Dr. Abrams and colleagues said, a finding that argues against the idea that cannabis smokers didn't feel pain because of the high associated with the drug.

The study indicates that "cannabis may indeed be useful in the amelioration of a very distressing, disabling, and difficult-to-treat complication of HIV," said Igor Grant, M.D., of the University of California at San Diego School of Medicine, and director of the University of California Center for Medical Cannabis Research, which was a sponsor of the study.

The trial was also supported by the National Institutes of Health. The authors reported no conflicts of interest. Additional General Neurology Coverage

Prof Gets Boost In Bid To Grow Marijuana (AP)

AP, February 12, 2007

Concluding that there is an inadequate supply of marijuana for medical research, an administrative law judge has recommended to the Drug Enforcement Administration that it grant a Massachusetts professor's application to grow the drug in bulk.

The judge's ruling is nonbinding. But officials at the American Civil Liberties Union hope that the recommendation to grant the application of Professor Lyle Craker will eventually lead to more research into the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes.

In June 2001, Craker submitted an application as a marijuana manufacturer to the DEA. However, the federal government limits the growing of marijuana available for clinical research to one source, the University of Mississippi.

Federal officials said that Craker's university, the University of Massachusetts Amherst, is free to compete for the next contract to produce research-grade marijuana for the United States. But there was no basis to add another producer.

The company that wants to fund Craker's facility for growing marijuana countered that researchers are not getting the quantity or the quality of marijuana needed to conduct research that is approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

The DEA contacted researchers and determined otherwise, so hearings were held in August and December of 2006 as Craker pursued the case. He got help from the ACLU along the way.

The administrative law judge, Mary Ellen Bittner, concluded Monday that granting Craker's application would be in the public interest. Among the reasons she cited were inadequate competition and an inadequate supply of marijuana for research purposes.

Steve Robertson, a spokesman for DEA, said Monday night the agency is reviewing Bittner's decision and would have no immediate comment. The DEA administrator, Karen Tandy, retains final authority to decide on the application.

"I hope that Administrator Tandy abides by the decision and grants me the opportunity to do my job unimpeded by drug war politics," Craker said in a statement distributed by the ACLU.

Judge: Let Prof Grow Medicinal Marijuana (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 13, 2007

An administrative law judge recommended Monday that a professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst be allowed to grow marijuana for research purposes, possibly making the state host to the nation's second laboratory authorized to grow the drug.

Professor Lyle Craker, a horticulturist who specializes in medicinal plants, has won support from both Senators Edward M. Kennedy and John F. Kerry in his effort to grow marijuana for research.

Marijuana is now only legally grown at the University of Mississippi, but Craker has argued that the drug grown there is neither potent enough nor readily available to researchers.

In her opinion, which can be overruled by the US Drug Enforcement Administration, Judge Mary Ellen Bittner said Craker's bid to grow marijuana "would be in the public interest."

"There would be minimal risk of diversion of marijuana," she wrote. "There is currently an inadequate supply of marijuana available for research purposes ... [and] competition in the provision of marijuana for such purposes is inadequate."

In a phone interview, Craker said he had not read the 87-page opinion. "I understand it's favorable, and that's good," he said.

Rick Doblin -- president of the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies, a drug research group based in Belmont that hopes to sponsor Craker's work -- called the decision "a major turning point."

"This is a major step to getting us to do the scientific research that the government has been blocking for the past 30 years," Doblin said. "If the government says no, the hypocrisy of their approach will help fuel efforts for state medical marijuana reforms."

Garrison Courtney, a DEA spokesman, declined to comment on the ruling. "We're still reviewing the opinion," he said. "We'll make a determination at a later point."

Craker first applied to the DEA for permission to grow marijuana in 2001. Kennedy and Kerry later wrote a letter to the DEA, saying that the Mississippi lab had an "unjustified monopoly."

In 2004, Craker and the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies sued the government in federal court, charging the DEA with unreasonable delays.

The DEA promptly rejected their bid. In 2005, Craker and the group sought the opinion from an administrative law judge.

If the DEA's administrator decides to reject Bittner's recommendation, Doblin said Craker and the group would file another lawsuit in federal court.

Deadly Abuse Of Methadone Tops Other Prescription Drugs (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, February 13, 2007

Methadone, a painkiller that has been used to treat heroin addicts for decades, has emerged as an increasingly popular and deadly street drug, joining narcotics such as Vicodin and OxyContin as frequently abused prescription drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0131611

Fatal overdoses of methadone rose at a higher rate than those involving any other narcotic from 1999 through 2004, according to a recent study by the National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS). The number of deaths from methadone in 2004 (3,849) represented a 390% rise from 1999, the study said.

MORE: Street availability up

Methadone was cited in nearly 13% of all the overdose deaths reported in the USA in 2004, up from about 4% five years earlier. Among drugs cited in fatal overdoses, only cocaine kills more people than methadone.

The NCHS study — and reports from coroners nationwide that the trend is continuing — indicate that doctors' increasing tendency to prescribe methadone as a cheap alternative to addictive pain relievers such as OxyContin has made it easier for addicts to get methadone, the Drug Enforcement Administration's Denise Curry says.

"It's out there, it's available, and it can be dangerous," Curry says. Pharmacies report that methadone is among the most popular drugs stolen, along with Vicodin and OxyContin, she says.

At about $20 a pill on the black market and pennies a dose when prescribed, methadone is considerably cheaper than such opiates.

Methadone has long been viewed as a relatively safe and effective narcotic, in part because its effects are gradual and it can ease withdrawal symptoms for recovering heroin addicts.

However, it also is addictive, and drug addicts account for most methadone-related deaths, says Nicholas Reuter, a senior public health analyst at the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Reuter says the problem is complicated by doctors who prescribe methadone incorrectly and patients who do not follow directions in taking it. On Nov. 26, the Food and Drug Administration warned doctors that "prescribing methadone is complex" because it eases pain up to six hours but can stay in the body 59 hours. Patients may want more before the dose wears off, the FDA warned.

"Methadone may build up in the body to a toxic level if it is taken too often, if the amount taken is too high, or if it is taken with certain other medications," the FDA said.

Authorities nationwide cite rising methadone fatalities:

· Fatal drug overdoses in New Hampshire rose from 39 in 1995 to 105 in 2003, and chief state medical examiner Thomas Andrew determined that methadone was the key. In 2005, Andrew says, at least 52 of the 153 people who died from overdoses in the state had taken methadone. He suspects the trend continued in 2006.

· Florida has had a "steady increase" in methadone deaths since 2001, says Jennifer Cook Pritt of the Department of Law Enforcement.

· In West Virginia, where fatal methadone overdoses rose from 40 in 2001 to 116 in 2005, state legislators are holding hearings on a plan to limit the medical professionals who could prescribe the drug, says Del. Don Perdue, a Democrat who leads the health committee in the House of Delegates.

Painkiller More Available For Abuse (USAT)

USA Today, February 13, 2007

For months, high school sophomore Sara Corbett of New Hartford, Conn., had begged her mother for permission to get her tongue pierced. On Aug. 7, 2004, Sara's mother, Robin DeBaise, relented and the two went to nearby mall.

The next day, Sara, 16, was in severe pain. At her aunt's house, she found a couple of methadone pills — amounting to twice the recommended dosage — and took them. She passed out and was rushed to a hospital, where she died.

MORE: Abuse tops other prescription drugs

"I know she had absolutely no clue of the strength of what she had taken. No clue," says DeBaise, 41, who says she did not know Sara had taken the pills until she had to be taken to the hospital. DeBaise says she is familiar with methadone's potency because she is being treated for an addiction to it.

Sara was among 3,849 people across the nation to die from an overdose of methadone in 2004, a record for methadone deaths and a jump of more than 3,000 such deaths from five years earlier, according to a study by the National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS).

The dramatic rise in fatal overdoses — which appears to have continued since 2004 — reflects how methadone, once known mainly for its usefulness in treating heroin addicts, has become increasingly prevalent in the illicit drug market as more and more doctors have prescribed it to treat chronic and severe pain.

Highly addictive, and lingers

As methadone has become more widespread — the number of pharmacy prescriptions for the drug increased fivefold from 1998-2002, according to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) — its drawbacks have become more apparent.

Among them: It's highly addictive. And because it takes longer to work than most opiate painkillers, it can remain in the body for more than four days after its effects are no longer noticeable, increasing the chances of an overdose.

Patients, and some doctors who have prescribed the narcotic, often have difficulty determining proper dosages, says Nicholas Reuter, a senior public health analyst at SAMHSA.

Dozens of overdoses have been linked to such miscalculations, he says.

Methadone is "being prescribed more frequently not only by pain specialists who know how to use it, but by general practice physicians, who may not," says Denise Curry of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

However, Curry and other drug specialists say, most methadone-related deaths in recent years have involved people like Sara: users who overdosed after taking the drug without a prescription, or methadone addicts who took too much of it while chasing the warm, euphoric feeling that users experience over four to six hours after taking the drug.

"With more prescriptions, there's more methadone in the supply pipeline," Curry says, and therefore more chance the drug will wind up for sale on the street.

The 390% rise in methadone-related deaths from 1999 to 2004 far outpaced the rate for fatal drug overdoses involving all types of drugs, the NCHS says. The overall number of fatal overdoses rose from 9,955 in 1999 to 16,735 five years later, an increase of 68%.

Those figures, and reports from coroners and drug specialists nationwide who say the trend is continuing, reflect how methadone has joined OxyContin and Vicodin as addictive drugs of the moment at a time when there is increasing concern about the abuse of prescription drugs, particularly by teenagers.

The NCHS study identified 12 states as having especially significant increases in methadone-related fatalities from 1999-2004: Florida, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

Several other states also are reporting big increases in methadone deaths.

In Oklahoma, for example, the number of overdose deaths involving methadone rose from 45 in 2001 to 118 in 2005, according to a report from the state's chief medical examiner.

Doctors have used methadone to treat pain for more than 50 years, but the drug has gotten a boost in the past four or five years, in part because of the attention Vicodin and OxyContin have received as frequently abused prescription drugs, Reuter says.

He adds that because law enforcement and medical boards have been stepping up their scrutiny of opiates such as OxyContin, some doctors may believe that prescribing methadone leaves them less vulnerable to such scrutiny.

Cheaper choice for doctors

Methadone's pharmacy price — pennies a dose — also encourages doctors to use it rather than far more expensive narcotics such as OxyContin, Reuter says.

"Physicians find it more convenient for the patient (and) easier to get approval from Medicaid," he says of doctors' trend toward prescribing methadone over other prescription pain relievers.

Meanwhile, the Food and Drug Administration is warning doctors, patients and others that methadone can be deadly if improperly prescribed or used.

Methadone also can be deadly when used with benzodiazepines such as the anti-anxiety drug Xanax, the FDA said in a warning about methadone on Nov. 26.

"Methadone is a drug of abuse," Reuter says. "It's abuse potential is not quite as dramatic as heroin. It has a much slower onset and doesn't produce the euphoric highs associated with heroin, but people do seek it out expecting euphoric properties."

DeBaise, who keeps her daughter's ashes in a stuffed animal she calls "Sara Bear," says she remembers how seductive methadone can be.

"You can get high on methadone. It's the same exact high like a heroin high," she says. "It's very mellowing. You get a warmth through your body. It would make me feel good. It would make me talkative."

New Questions Arise In ATF Killing (DCEX)

By David Francis

Washington Examiner, February 13, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131613

Arlington - When he exonerated two federal agents last week in the shooting death of a 24-year old Washington man, the Arlington County commonwealth's attorney made fresh assertions about the case that raised new questions about the incident, a Washington Examiner investigation shows.

County attorney Richard Trodden determined that the agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms acted in self-defense when they chased and fired upon Travis Lamar Hampton seven months ago and that Hampton killed himself after an eight–hour standoff.

In an interview with The Examiner, Trodden presented a new version of a July car chase involving federal agents and the District man including the revelation that the man fled a drug-related robbery and initiated a shootout with the agents.

The new version of events added significant details to the initial account. But additional questions have emerged:

» Whom did Hampton rob? And where exactly did the robbery take place?

» How many shots did the ATF agents fire? How many were fired by Hampton?

» Without a ballistics report, can the public determine Hampton took his own life, or even had a gun?

Hampton's sister Tonya Kirby said these questions needed to be answered before she could move on. Without looking at the police report, she said her family would not accept Trodden's account.

"We feel helpless," she said. "They told us whatever they wanted to tell us. We have no evidence of anything. We weren't allowed to see the report."

Trodden said Hampton returned to the District from Fairfax County, where he had robbed a drug dealer of money and marijuana. He was driving in the right–hand emergency lane on Interstate 395 when he sideswiped the agents, who rode in an unmarked rental van. Trodden said Hampton stopped, got out of the car, but jumped back into the auto and fled once the agents — who were in town for training before being deployed to Iraq — identified themselves as "police."

Hampton then sped to the Glebe Road exit, where two cars waited at a stoplight. The agents followed, and once on the ramp, Trodden said, Hampton initiated the shooting. One agent returned fire and blew out the back windshield of the car as Hampton reentered the vehicle. Hampton then nudged the two cars waiting at the light out of the way and drove north in the southbound lane of Glebe Road.

The agents chased Hampton, with a second significant exchange of gunfire occurring at the intersection of Glebe and Walter Reed Drive. Trodden said Hampton exited the car and again shot at the agents, this time disabling their vehicle. He then drove his vehicle to 13th Street with agents giving chase on foot. He entered a home, shot a tenant and eventually killed himself, Trodden said. Only one agent fired at Hampton throughout the entire incident, according to the commonwealth attorney.

Sometime during this chase, Hampton sustained two wounds to the back of his head, Trodden said. One appeared to be similar to shrapnel wound, while the other resulted from a bullet graze. Trodden said police determined Hampton died by suicide using his own gun.

Without the public release of the ballistic reports, it is impossible to confirm Hampton had a gun or committed suicide. The death certificate lists the cause of death as "pending." It is also impossible to determine how many shots the parties involved fired.

Trodden said he did not have the exact number of shots fired, but said he believed Hampton had fired more than the agents.

The "robbery" in Fairfax raises questions as well. According to the Fairfax County Police Web site, two robberies occurred on or around July 5, but none of the suspects match the description of the 5 foot 10 inch, 260-pound Hampton. Who was the victim of Hampton's robbery? Where in Fairfax did it occur?

Trodden said the crime was reported as brandishing a weapon, although no reports of this crime are listed on the Fairfax police Web site on or around July 5.

The severity of the wounds Hampton suffered on the back of his head is also unknown, as is whether he suffered wounds to his legs, as described to The Examiner by the person who prepared his body for burial.

Trodden said the neck wounds were not life-threatening and that Hampton died from a self-inflicted gun shot in his mouth. The person who prepared Hampton's body for burial said there was no exit wound.

Finally, the content of a note Hampton held against a window during the standoff remains a mystery.

Because Trodden determined the agents did not break any laws by chasing Hampton, he said the police report will not be released publicly. He added the ATF agents were not interviewed in person for the investigation. Instead, witness statements and tape recordings of the agent's statements were used.

Trodden's account confirms aspects of the incident established through a seven-month Examiner investigation, the results of which have been published from July to November. Hampton's head injuries are consistent with the pictures of the bullet-ridden, blood-spattered car he drove. Trodden confirmed the agents actively chased Hampton, even after their van was disabled.

DOJ_NMG_0131614

Trodden did not determine if the agents should have chased Hampton in the first place. A few weeks after the incident, The Examiner reported that, under Federal Law Enforcement Training Guidelines, a high-speed chase would not have been allowed in this case. Arlington and Alexandria police have also said they would not have pursued Hampton.

"I did not offer any opinions" about whether guidelines were followed, Trodden said. "Criminally, they did nothing wrong."

IMMIGRATION:

Minuteman Project Chief To Probe Prosecution Of 2 Border Agents Jailed For Shooting (FOX)

Fox News, February 13, 2007

The founder of the Minuteman Project may soon announce a citizens' investigation commission to look into the prosecution of two former Border Patrol agents now in prison for the nonfatal shooting of a Mexican drug runner in Texas.

Jim Gilchrist has joined the chorus of grassroots groups and lawmakers to push President Bush to pardon the two agents, Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos. Gilchrest later on Monday may hold a press conference in El Paso to vocalize his group's concern with the case and to outline plans for the commission.

"We cannot stand idly by if border agents are railroaded, so in addition to our work of monitoring border activities, we are establishing a citizens' investigation commission to look into this Ramos/Compean situation, starting with a thorough review of the federal attorney's procedures and motivations," said Gilchrist, who started the Minuteman Project originally push for more immigration law enforcement. "We believe that federal attorney Johnny Sutton was, at the least, overzealous in his prosecution of these agents."

Investigation Underway

Compean and Ramos are behind bars for shooting at fleeing drug dealer Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila then trying to cover up the incident. The two were convicted by a jury last year and are now serving their time at two separate federal prisons. Aldrete-Davila was given immunity for his testimony against the two agents — both of whom say they were just doing their jobs.

Gilchrist and other supporters of the two agents argue that Sutton improperly prosecuted the case and that evidence may have been withheld. Sutton, on the other hand, has maintained that there was more than enough evidence to show that the two men shot at Aldrete-Davila while he was running away from them, and that he likely did not have a weapon.

Supporters of the two ex-agents say even if the two men are guilty of these actions, they do not deserve to spend 11 and 12 years in prison. The two are currently appealing their punishment

"These men could have fled, but they didn't," Gilchrist said in a statement. "At the very least, they should be out on bail pending appeal. They certainly shouldn't be mixed in with the prisoners they or their fellow Border Patrol agents put there."

Tancredo and nearly 100 other Congress members are currently seeking a congressional pardon for Compean and Ramos, in hopes that it pushes Bush to do the same. The president has said he would review the case, once it gets sent to his desk from the Justice Department with that agency's pardon recommendations.

"Our members from around the nation are disgusted with a government which ignores its duty to secure our borders, then grants Constitutional rights to illegal non-citizens and persecutes the people who risk their lives to protect us," Gilchrist said.

Justice Department Indicts Malden Man On Immigration Fraud (MALOBV)

Malden (MA) Observer, February 13, 2007

A Malden resident and Vietnam native was indicted this week for allegedly making false statements in his naturalization application, including denying a criminal past that included child rape charges.

Anh Tam Nguyen, 45, of 343 Medford St. in Malden, was charged in an indictment with one count of unlawful procurement of naturalization. He will be arraigned in federal court on the indictment today.

The naturalized U.S. citizen, originally from Vietnam, allegedly made false written statements on a naturalization application, where he denied he had ever been charged criminally. It is alleged by the U.S. Department of Justice that Nguyen in fact had been charged in Suffolk Superior Court with, among other things, indecent assault on a child under 14 years, and assault with intent to rape a child under the age of 16.

United States Attorney Michael J. Sullivan and Bruce M. Foucart, Special Agent in Charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement in New England, announced the indictment this week.

According to the indictment and other documents previously filed with the court, Nguyen, born in Saigon, was first admitted into this country at Los Angeles as a refugee in September 1984. The following year, Nguyen's status was adjusted to that of Lawful Permanent Resident. In June, 1996 Nguyen signed and submitted an application for Naturalization. It is alleged that, in response to a question on the application inquiring if he had ever been arrested, charged, indicted, convicted, fined or sentenced for a crime, Nguyen answered "no."

In June, 1997, Nguyen was interviewed in Boston by an Immigration and Customs Enforcement District Adjudications Officer in connection with his application. It is alleged that Nguyen responded in the negative when questioned by the Immigration Officer as to whether he had any previous criminal charges. At the end of the interview, Nguyen signed a statement that the responses he had given were truthful. Nguyen was naturalized on Sept. 17, 1997 at a ceremony in U.S. District Court in Boston.

It is alleged that Nguyen's written and oral responses to the questions regarding any previous criminal charges were false. According to Suffolk Superior Court records, Nguyen was indicted in October, 1995, and charged with indecent assault and battery on a child under the age of 14, assault with intent to rape a child under the age of 16, and rape of a child under the age of 16, among other charges. Additionally, in April of 1997, Nguyen was indicted and charged with, among other things, assault and battery with intent to commit rape, and indecent assault and battery on a person who had attained the age of 14. The 1995 charges were pending when Nguyen signed his naturalization application, and the 1995 and 1997 charges were pending when he had his naturalization interview.

On Sept. 26, 1997, nine days after being naturalized, Nguyen went to trial in Suffolk Superior Court and was convicted on two charges -- indecent assault and battery on a person who had attained the age of 14, and assault and battery. He was sentenced to three to four years, to be followed by two years of probation. In April, 1998, Nguyen pleaded guilty to the October, 1995 charges of indecent assault and battery, and was sentenced to an additional two years of probation.

Had Nguyen responded truthfully on his application and during his interview for naturalization, he would not have been eligible for naturalization, according to the Justice Department.

If convicted, Nguyen faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, to be followed by up to three years of supervised release, and a $250,000 fine. He also faces losing his U.S. citizenship and possible deportation to his native Vietnam.

The case was investigated by Immigration and Customs Enforcement, with assistance from the Malden Police Department. It is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Feeley in Sullivan's Major Crimes Unit.

TAX:

Financial Firms Try To Lure Tax Refunds (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, February 13, 2007

Financial firms are stepping up their efforts to capture money from tax refunds, hoping to capitalize on a new option that lets you have the IRS directly deposit your refund in up to three accounts.

Citibank, Wells Fargo and Countrywide Bank, among others, are urging taxpayers to take advantage of the change this year to deposit at least part of their refund into a savings or individual retirement account.

The advice to save — rather than spend — your tax refund isn't new. But the firms hope for a warmer reception from investors this year because of the policy change. Previously, taxpayers could have their refunds directly deposited into only one account.

Because of that limitation, "People would put their tax refund into their checking account, and they may or may not have saved that," says Jeff Pearlberg of Citibank. "When you're allowed to do a split refund, what you're doing is telling people to pick a savings account."

The marketing efforts come as a rising number of taxpayers arrange for their refunds to be deposited directly into their bank accounts, rather than mailed to them. For the 2005 tax year, $149.2 billion in refunds were directly deposited — more than double the level of five years ago — the IRS says.

In its branches, Citibank is pitching a no-fee IRA for tax refunds. Wells Fargo tells investors online to "put your tax refund to work" by depositing it into a bank IRA. Countrywide urges taxpayers to consider its menu of savings products.

Those who decide to have their refund directly deposited should be sure, though, that the money is going into the most appropriate investment product.

With an IRA, "You have to look at where you want to open it, what kind of investment options the (company) has," says Ed Slott, an accountant in Rockville Centre, N.Y. "I would never open an account just off a marketing pitch."

Taxpayers should also be aware that while the IRS gives them until April 17 to make an IRA contribution and deduct it for the 2006 tax year, some banks don't go along. Citibank, for instance, will credit refunds that are directly deposited this year into its IRAs only for the 2007 tax year.

Slott also notes that those who delay filing their returns this year could run into trouble claiming an IRA deduction. They might, for example, claim a deduction with the intention of having their refund deposited directly into a traditional IRA by April 17. The problem, Slott says, is if their refund arrives late. Then they'd have to reverse the deduction and pay any tax owed.

That's why, "If you're filing paper returns, don't do it past March 1, and if you electronically file," don't take much longer, to be sure the refund is deposited on time, he adds.

House Panel Approves $1.3B In Tax Breaks (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, February 13, 2007

It's not like a business group to oppose the largest possible tax breaks for its members. But when it comes to sweetening a minimum wage bill with small business tax relief, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is backing a House proposal that is a fraction of the size of a tax package passed by the Senate.

The House legislation, approved Monday by the House Ways and Means Committee on a bipartisan voice vote, would extend business tax credits and increase the amount of capital spending that a business can write off. It also would give restaurants a break on how to calculate deductions for Social Security taxes paid on tips.

According to congressional estimates, the House tax cuts would cost the Treasury $1.3 billion in lost revenue over 10 years. The tax cuts in the Senate bill, approved two weeks ago, would cost $8.3 billion over 10 years.

At issue for the chamber is how the new Democratic-run Congress will make up for that lost revenue. The Senate bill would eliminate tax loopholes, place restrictions on deferred compensation for corporate executives and eliminate deductions for payments in lawsuits — provisions opposed by big business.

House tax writers paid for their bill, in part, by eliminating a loophole that encouraged the wealthy to shift income to their dependent children to avoid higher capital gains and dividend taxes.

"The business community ... appreciates the restraint you exercised in omitting onerous permanent tax increases from the package," the chamber's top lobbyist, Bruce Josten, wrote to Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the committee's ranking Republican.

House action could come as early as Wednesday and the bill is expected to pass with considerable bipartisan support. That would set the stage for negotiations with the Senate.

The irony of the chamber's support of the House bill was not lost on Democrats. The chamber tends to support Republicans over Democrats, and Republicans last year warned that a Democratic victory would result in higher taxes, not tax cuts.

"Who would have thought we'd have an endorsement letter from the Chamber of Commerce on our first bill, " said Rep. Bill Pascrell, D-N.J., a member of the Ways and Means Committee. "Try us, you might like us."

Chamber support for the House bill, coupled with pressure from labor unions on Democrats to keep the tax package small, means the final House-Senate compromise could be closer to the House version. That means a tax break and minimum wage package could then make its way to President Bush's desk for his signature.

The House and Senate have both approved raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over two years. The bill had been held up over a reluctance by House Democrats to attach tax cuts tot he legislation.

"This looks like it's going to break the logjam," said Bill Samuel, legislative director for the AFL-CIO. He said he hoped that when Rangel and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., reconcile differences in the two bills they would "be pushing for as small a package as possible."

Senate Democrats have said tax breaks need to be coupled with the wage hike to win enough Republican support to overcome procedural tactics that could kill the minimum wage legislation. It takes 60 votes in the 100-member Senate to leap hurdles such as a filibuster. There are 49 Republicans in the Senate, a number that gives them a considerable voice on legislation.

Small business groups were unhappy with the House bill and insisted on a package closer to the Senate version.

"We're hopeful the package will move toward the cuts in the Senate," said Dan Danner, senior vice president for public policy at the National Federation of Independent Business.

If Congress adopts tax breaks closer to the House bill, business groups said they still expect future tax measures to contain the revenue-producing features in the Senate bill.

One of the biggest challenges facing House and Senate tax writers is fixing the alternative minimum tax, a feature of the tax code designed to guarantee that wealthy taxpayers don't avoid taxes altogether. But the AMT is not adjusted for inflation and its net has been catching more middle-income taxpayers. Fixing it would cost billions of dollars.

"I imagine those revenue raisers will come up again," said Ashley Miller, a lobbyist for the Chamber of Commerce.

House Wage Bill Gets Tax Breaks (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

The House Ways and Means Committee yesterday approved a modest package of tax breaks for restaurants and small businesses that would be affected by an increase in the federal minimum wage, breaking a logjam with the Senate that has delayed passage of one of the Democrats' top legislative priorities.

By a voice vote, the committee agreed to expand and extend a handful of tax credits and deductions worth $1.3 billion over 10 years. Those provisions would be offset by adjustments to the tax code that would raise a similar amount. The full House is expected to vote on the measure later this week, Democratic aides said.

The House tax package is far less generous than an $8.3 billion package approved by the Senate this month under pressure from that chamber's Republicans, who refused to support a minimum-wage increase unless it included tax relief for small businesses. Senate leaders yesterday said they were hopeful that differences between the two chambers would be worked out. With both houses now willing to go along with tax breaks, congressional aides said it was just a matter of resolving the details.

"The bottom line is, it's moving in the right direction," said Don Stewart, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). "Everyone recognizes we have to help both the employees and the employers who hire them. I think that's clear in both parties and in both chambers."

As recently as two weeks ago, Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and other House leaders had insisted that the Senate approve the first increase in the minimum wage in nearly a decade without tacking on a batch of small business tax breaks. After six years of tax cuts from the Bush administration, House Democrats argued, businesses needed no additional help. Meanwhile, they said, the value of the minimum wage, when adjusted for inflation, had fallen to its lowest point in 50 years and should quickly be increased from $5.15 an hour to $7.25.

However, the push to approve such a bill failed in the Senate, which instead overwhelmingly approved the wage hike with tax relief. House leaders quickly reconsidered their hard-line stance, and Rangel and the ranking Republican on Ways and Means, Jim McCrery of Louisiana, introduced their own tax package late last week.

Yesterday, after less than 30 minutes of discussion, the committee unanimously approved the package. It would extend for one year a tax credit for employers who hire former welfare recipients, at-risk youth and other targeted groups. Like the Senate bill, the House measure would expand the credit to apply to military veterans. The bill would also extend for one year a law that allows small businesses to quickly deduct $112,000 for equipment purchases, and would raise the deduction amount to $125,000.

The House bill would also adjust a tax credit paid to restaurant owners whose workers earn more than the minimum wage when cash tips are counted. That change would ensure that restaurant owners continue to receive the same tax benefit after a higher minimum wage is enacted.

To pay for the changes, the House bill would prohibit dependent children who do not support themselves from claiming the lowest tax rate for capital gains and dividends. That measure is aimed at preventing wealthy taxpayers from sheltering income from taxation by shifting it to their children. And the bill would require businesses with assets over $1 billion to pay more in estimated taxes in 2012, though all the excess payments would be returned to them in 2013. The temporary bump in revenue would cover the cost of the tax breaks through their most expensive period.

In a statement, McCrery called the package "a better balance of targeted tax relief and sensible offsets than the Senate has approved," adding that he had "serious concerns" about the Senate's proposal to impose new limits on deferred-compensation plans, one of the most popular executive benefits in corporate America. The House bill omits those limits.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Pitches Free-Trade Policies (WP/AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Free-trade policies that make it easier for U.S. companies to sell their products are important to the economy's vitality, President Bush said Monday as he projected a year of good _ though somewhat slower _ economic growth.

Bush, in his annual economic report to Congress, made a fresh pitch for breaking down trade barriers and energizing global trade talks. He also called on Congress to extend his authority to negotiate free-trade deals, a request likely to face an uphill battle in the Democratic-controlled Congress.

"This authority is essential to completing good trade agreements," Bush wrote in the introduction to the report. "The Congress must renew it if we are to improve our competitiveness in the global economy."

With the United States racking up record trade deficits and facing intense competition from rapidly growing China and India, global trade tensions have intensified.

Democrats blame Bush's free-trade policies for contributing to the trade deficit, costing U.S. factories jobs and exposing U.S. workers to unfair competition from low-wage countries.

"We need to shift focus so that working Americans start to feel as good about our changing economy as those at the very top do," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Against that backdrop, Bush faces a daunting challenge in getting Congress to renew the Trade Promotion Authority, also known as fast-track authority. It lets the president negotiate trade deals that Congress must approve without amendments. That authority expires on July 1.

"Further trade liberalization, particularly in services, could bring even larger gains to American consumers, firms and workers," according to the report.

The Bush administration argues that the way to deal with the trade deficit is through free-trade policies that make it easier for U.S. companies to do business abroad. Getting China to move to a more flexible currency system, another administration goal, also would help U.S. exporters.

A technical chapter in the president's economic report dealt with currency markets and exchange rates. It mentioned that "economic theory does not dictate a clear preference" between two different monetary policy tools countries may use to influence economic activity. One way is for a country's central bank to set short-term interest rates; another way is to rely on linking the value of the country's exchange rate to another currency.

Asked how this squares with the administration's policy regarding China's currency practices, Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, said the chapter aimed to be an academic discussion on how currency markets function, not a message about appropriate exchange rate policy, which is left to the president and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, he said.

Critics contend that China is keeping its currency artificially low, giving Chinese companies a big trade advantage over U.S. companies. The United States has a record $202 billion trade deficit with China alone, the greatest ever with a single country.

Irked by China's currency and trade policies, some Democrats and Republicans in Congress want to impose hefty tariffs on Chinese made goods flowing into the United States.

On other matters, Bush also talked about restraining growth in Medicare and Medicaid and the need to financially shore up Social Security as a wave of retiring baby boomers will place massive strains on the government's resources.

And, he promoted his plan to balance the budget while not raising taxes.

Bush, in a budget plan sent to Congress last week, proposed balancing the budget by 2012, three years after he has left office. That would be done by spending restraints. Bush's plan would make his first-term tax cuts permanent, which the administration says is key to maintaining economic growth.

Democrats charged that the president's budget plan works only on paper and that it is based on overly optimistic assumptions about how much revenue the economy will generate and leaves out expensive items, such as further war costs after 2009.

On immigration, the report said that "effective immigration policy can curtail illegal immigration and at the same time promote America's national and economic interests."

Looking back on last year, Bush said the economy turned in a solid performance despite the ill effects of the residential real estate bust.

The economy grew by 3.4 percent last year, as measured by gross domestic product from the fourth quarter of 2005 to the fourth quarter of 2006.

The president's report projects that economic growth will slow to 2.9 percent this year, reflecting lingering fallout from the housing slump. Next year growth will pick up, with the economy expanding by 3.1 percent.

The nation's unemployment rate, which averaged a six-year low of 4.6 percent in 2006, should hold steady at that rate this year and then edge up to 4.8 percent in 2008, the White House estimates.

Inflation, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, is expected to edge up 2.6 percent both this year and next. Last year, consumer prices rose by 2.5 percent, the smallest increase in three years. The improvement came as once-surging energy prices calmed down.

Bush's Economic Advisers Call For Lower Taxes And Freer Trade (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

DOJ_NMG_0131619

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 — The Bush administration reveled in the economy's continued expansion on Monday, as the president's advisers stepped up their calls for freer trade, lower taxes and a continued openness to immigration.

In a buoyant annual report, President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers said the economy was poised to keep growing at a solid 3 percent a year, that unemployment would remain below 5 percent and that rising productivity would allow higher wages without higher inflation.

"I would say right now that we're pretty close to hitting it right on the head," Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said.

The optimistic outlook came at a time when the economy's broad indicators have been surprisingly favorable. Real wages rose faster than inflation last year and unemployment remains low, at 4.6 percent. Consumers continue to spend at a healthy clip and inflation has ebbed, in part because oil prices have declined sharply from last summer.

But the report set up a clash with Democrats and even some Republicans in Congress, by putting its emphasis on increasing investment and globalization rather than on cushioning workers from the disruptions of foreign trade and corporate overhauls.

In addition to calling for an extension of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are set to expire at the end of 2010, the report floated ideas for further reducing taxes on corporate dividends, reducing corporate tax rates and letting companies immediately deduct all their costs for new equipment and infrastructure.

"One of the biggest misconceptions about pro-growth tax policy is that reducing the statutory corporate tax rate only benefits corporations," the report declared. "Ultimately, reducing corporate taxes benefits labor through higher wages and benefits, and capital owners through higher after-tax returns."

The report praised globalization, brushing aside criticisms from many lawmakers in Congress about the loss of manufacturing jobs in this country or from many economists about the nation's rapidly expanding foreign indebtedness.

"Engagement in the global economy through increased trade has contributed to rising average living standards in the United States," it said. Anticipating a clash over trade with Democratic leaders, it called for Congress to extend the president's authority to negotiate trade agreements under fast-track procedures, which allow Congress to approve or reject a trade deal but not to make any amendments.

It defended the importance of foreign investment in the United States, saying that "access to international financial markets tends to lower borrowing costs and enable a country to increase capital investment without increasing domestic savings."

It also defended the freedom of American companies to shift some or all of their work overseas — a practice that lawmakers in both parties have attacked as outsourcing American jobs.

"When U.S. companies expand their employment abroad, they also tend to expand domestically," the report said. It cited studies, which it did not identify, estimating that each additional dollar of foreign capital spending is associated with $3.50 of additional domestic capital spending.

Democrats wasted little time criticizing the report.

"We can't just put on a happy face and cross our fingers that wages will grow, trade deficits will shrink, savings rates will rise and health care costs will slow," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee. "We need to shift focus so that working Americans start to feel as good about our changing economy as those at the very top do."

Democrats plan to highlight what they see as the economy's dark side later this week, when the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, delivers his semiannual report on the economy.

Representative Barney Frank, chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, has scheduled a follow-up hearing for Friday with economists who argue that the current economy is much worse than the overall numbers indicate.

In a curious omission, the White House advisers barely mentioned the biggest and most immediate tax issue confronting both President Bush and Congress: the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax that was originally aimed at millionaires but will engulf 20 million households this year if it is not changed.

Mr. Bush and Democrats alike want to repeal the A.M.T., a change that would cost $70 billion in 2007 and more than $1 trillion over the next decade. In 2004, Mr. Bush hoped to address the issue as part of a sweeping overhaul of the tax code.

At the time, Mr. Lazear served on Mr. Bush's advisory panel on tax changes, but the panel's recommendations were ignored as soon they were made.

On Monday, Mr. Lazear said the report stayed away from the alternative minimum tax because it was tangential to his main focus on increasing productivity.

U.S. May Be Losing Its Appeal To Foreign Investors, Report Warns (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0131620

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

There are troubling signs the U.S. may be losing its traditional appeal as a destination for foreign investment, the White House says, a veiled warning to legislators now contemplating tighter controls over such investment.

This year's Economic Report of the President, released Monday, says foreign investment in the U.S. has numerous benefits: foreign-owned firms in the U.S. pay higher wages, invest more in research and development, and export more than purely domestic firms, on average. Moreover, foreign direct investment (FDI) helps modernize U.S. plant and equipment and finance the U.S.' large trade deficits, it says. (Read the full report1)

"Recently, however, some trends have developed with respect to FDI in the United States that may be cause for concern," says the report, prepared each year by the president's Council of Economic Advisers.

While the share of U.S. output accounted for by foreign-owned firms has grown over the last two decades, "it has stagnated and even declined in recent years." In addition, foreign-owned firms' share of employment has declined, from 5.1% in 2000 to 4.7% in 2004. Finally, foreign direct investment's share of all foreign investment in the U.S. has declined since 1999; the balance is primarily "portfolio" investment such as stocks, bonds and bank deposits.

The report says it isn't clear whether "these are benign and temporary trends or whether this development is symptomatic of deeper issues with respect to the attractiveness of the United States as a country in which to make direct investment."

While the report doesn't elaborate on what those deeper issues may be, administration officials have worried that foreign investors could shun the U.S. in the wake of public and congressional hostility to foreign investment, in particular since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks have elevated national security over economic efficiency considerations in many economic matters. A 2005 bid by Dubai Ports World to manage six U.S. ports was ultimately abandoned last year in the face of congressional opposition. Congress now proposes tightening the process by which the administration's secretive Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States approves foreign takeovers of U.S. companies.

While the Dubai Ports controversy is too recent to be reflected in the data cited by the Economic Report of the President, administration officials say that and several similar events could threaten foreign investment flows. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt, in a speech delivered Monday in Frankfurt, said the recent focus on CFIUS has "raised questions in the minds of global investors about whether the doors to foreign investment remain open both in Europe and in the United States."

Last week, Treasury Assistant Secretary Clay Lowery warned Congress that foreign investors will be closely watching the current debate over CFIUS. Investment controversies, foreign barriers to investment and "increasingly negative media coverage of the U.S. investment climate, underscore the need to improve and reform the CFIUS process. It is also important to note that our actions to reform CFIUS are and will continue to be closely watched."

Still, the report's emphasis on the benefits of foreign investment didn't get a receptive ear from Democrats. The report "pays lip service to the … anxiety and sense of insecurity that many Americans feel in the face of growing international competition," New York Senator Charles Schumer, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, said in a news release. "It does not talk about the kinds of policies that will be necessary to reassure the average American family that it can expect to share in the benefits of more open international markets."

This Expansion Looks Familiar (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

It is five years into an economic expansion and most Americans are still waiting for their share. Inflation is swallowing pay raises. Businesses are hiring, but forecasters worry that the economy may be about to stall.

This may sound like the stuff of today’s headlines. But it comes from 1996, when Bill Clinton was president and his rival was Bob Dole, the Republican nominee. The economic expansion in question, which got off to a sputtering start in March 1991, was to become the longest period of uninterrupted growth in the nation’s history.

Now, a little more than five years into an expansion that officially started in November 2001, the economy is showing remarkable parallels to the situation of a decade ago. “It’s striking how similar they are,” said Robert J. Gordon, an economics professor at Northwestern University.

The overall rate of growth has followed a trajectory almost identical to the first five years of the 1990s expansion. Now, as then, corporate profits have surged; the stock market has, too. But just as workers have finally begun to reap some of the spoils of a growing economy, many forecasters worry — as they did a decade earlier — that the expansion is running out of steam.

What is striking, considering these similarities, is how little effect the policy choices of Democratic and Republican administrations seem to have had on how both growth cycles played out.

Few economic forecasters expect the current growth cycle to have the length and vigor of the 1990s boom, which continued for 10 years from trough to peak.

Yet fewer still expected strong growth in the mid-1990s. In early 1996, forecasters polled by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia predicted that the economy would grow merely 1.8 percent that year. The economy ended up growing at twice that pace.

Average Americans were more pessimistic then than they are now. According to Gallup's most recent snapshot of public opinion, last month 52 percent of Americans rated economic conditions as either excellent or good. In May 1996, at a similar moment in the previous expansion, only 30 percent did so.

"Consumers don't expect a slowing economy," said Richard T. Curtin, who heads the surveys of consumers at the University of Michigan. "According to consumers, we are going to improve."

Given the parallels, perhaps it is not surprising that the economy is providing the same sort of political ammunition as it did 10 years ago.

"Profits are up for our companies, but where are the wage increases?" asked Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in an online conversation with voters last month, after announcing that she intends to run for president. "Where are the, you know, the benefits that should accrue to hard-working Americans?"

Wage increases have, indeed, been slow in coming. In December, 61 months after the economy started to grow, the wages of production and other nonmanagement workers were barely 1.7 percent higher, after inflation, than when the economy hit bottom in November 2001. Most of those gains came in the last few months.

But many people have forgotten that, initially, the expansion of the 1990s was also called a "jobless recovery," and then a "joyless" one, when employment started growing but real wages did not. In April 1996, 61 months into that growth cycle, the hourly wages of nonmanagement workers were actually worth 0.4 percent less, after inflation, than when the expansion began.

"Now this is a real economic slowdown," Mr. Dole said on a campaign stop in Florida in October of that year. "And I might say, it's disastrous news for American workers and businesses and even worse news for low- and moderate-income Americans who have been squeezed and squeezed and squeezed by lower wages and higher taxes in this administration."

Advocates on each side insist that government policy was crucial to steering the economy. Gene B. Sperling, a former economic adviser to Mr. Clinton, argued that his administration's efforts to cut the budget deficit were instrumental in bringing down interest rates and improving investors' confidence in the economy.

By contrast, Edward P. Lazear, President Bush's chief economic adviser, argued that the tax cuts enacted by the Bush administration in 2003 deserve some credit for the current expansion. "They had a fundamental impact on investment," Mr. Lazear said. "There was an abrupt turnaround at the point when those tax cuts were put into effect."

But even Mr. Lazear conceded that the role of policy in driving the economy can be overstated. "Neither President Clinton nor President Bush fundamentally altered the structure of the American economy," he said. "This is a pretty healthy economy where the private market is most of what is going on."

There are substantial differences, of course, in the nature of the two expansions. The early '90s were characterized by a building bust; the current one has been supported by a housing bubble. The boom of the second half of the 1990s was underpinned by an Internet-driven investment bubble, but most technology stocks today are far below their earlier highs.

"In both situations we had overinvestment, now in housing, then in fiber optics," said Joseph E. Stiglitz, a professor of economics at Columbia who was Mr. Clinton's chief economic adviser from 1995 to 1997.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Clinton had very different economic priorities and will leave very different economic legacies. Mr. Clinton increased the top marginal tax rate to 39.6 percent, from 31 percent, and closed the budget deficit. President Bush cut tax rates back to 35 percent, and the deficit reappeared.

Corporate profits have swollen twice as fast, as a share of the economy, in the first five years of this expansion, under Mr. Bush, as in the same period of the previous one.

Still, policy has had less effect on the distribution of the rewards of growth than the stated goals of Democrats and Republicans would suggest.

Indeed, the share of the economy devoted to workers' compensation shrank as much in the first five years of the 1990s expansion — to 56.3 percent, from 57.7 percent, of gross domestic product — as in the most recent five years, when it fell to 56.6 percent, from 58.1 percent.

The decline underscores the powerful impact of globalization and technological change on the American economy over the last three decades, putting strong downward pressure on production workers' wages regardless of who occupies the White House.

No one knows how this expansion will end. In the 1990s, nearly all the gains for ordinary Americans occurred in the second half of the decade. Comparing the current point in the economic cycle with the same moment a decade ago is something like predicting the outcome of a baseball game in the sixth inning.

"If we conjecture another five years of the current expansion, I think it's going to be another surprise," said Professor Gordon of Northwestern. "We had a good surprise in the '90s, but this time I think we're in for a series of bad surprises."

One ingredient that helped drive the 1990s expansion is missing today: the explosion of productivity that took off in the mid-'90s and lasted for more than a decade, when the investments that firms began to make in technology in the 1980s started to pay off.

"It's kind of hard to point to anything like that now," said Ken Matheny, senior economist at Macroeconomic Advisers. "It's difficult to say that we're about to have another productivity and investment boom as we saw in the late '90s."

Productivity grew by 3 percent in the last quarter of 2006. Still, for the full year, it grew only 2.1 percent, which is the slowest since 1997.

Even as growth has remained on a remarkably similar path in both decades, administration critics say that President Bush's policies have weakened the economy's longer-term prospects.

Professor Stiglitz argued that the Bush tax cuts, aimed mostly at the wealthy, opened a big hole in the budget and provided little stimulus to the economy. This forced the Federal Reserve to push interest rates very low to keep the economy afloat, he said, creating a bubble in housing.

Under a more effective fiscal policy, Professor Stiglitz said, "growth would be more broadly based and less of the economy would depend on real estate."

Mr. Sperling suggested that the mushrooming of the nation's trade imbalance and the reappearance of large budget deficits have not caused more damage to the economy because money flooding into the United States from China and elsewhere has kept long-term interest rates low, underpinning investment and consumption. That support, he suggested, will eventually dry up.

"We are in a moment where excess savings are coming from India and China, so perhaps it is a moment in which fiscal irresponsibility won't have as negative short-term consequences," Mr. Sperling said. "But it has increased the risk factor in the economy. It is still poor long-term policy."

Meanwhile, the housing bubble has turned to bust, dragging residential investment down. Overall growth has been little affected so far, but many economists still expect household finances to weaken, cutting into consumer spending, the main bulwark of economic growth.

"Maybe we dodged a bullet, but you don't know," said Jeffrey A. Frankel, an economics professor at Harvard.

The economy seems to be getting a second wind, though, and other economists are more sanguine. "This expansion still has legs," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group.

If anything, he added, the biggest danger to the economy is that growth takes off again, so quickly that the Fed feels compelled to raise interest rates sharply to keep inflation at bay.

"Usually in the past, the Fed overdoes it," Mr. Baumohl said. If it does so again, "that would be the end of this cycle."

U.S. Ran Budget Surplus In January (WSJ)

By Benton Ives-halperin And Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. federal government ran a January budget surplus of $38.24 billion, up 82% from the year-earlier monthly surplus as tax receipts and outlays both set records, the Treasury Department said Monday.

Treasury's monthly budget statement shows receipts were $260.61 billion last month, up 13% from a year earlier and a record for the month of January. Meanwhile, outlays were $222.37 billion, also a record for the month and up 6.4% from a year earlier.

The January surplus came in below than the Congressional Budget Office's estimate of a $40 billion surfeit during the month. "January tends to be a favorable month for the budget because one of the estimated tax payments for individuals is due in January, and some outlays for salaries and benefits shift into December because Jan. 1 is a holiday," according to CBO.

The Treasury on Monday revised December's surplus down to $41.96 billion, from a previously reported $44.54 billion. The Treasury estimates the U.S. government ran a budget deficit for the first four months of fiscal 2007 of $42.17 billion, down 57% from the same period last year. The 2007 fiscal year began Oct. 1, 2006.

In fiscal 2006 the full-year deficit fell 22% to $248.20 billion, marking the second-straight year of declining deficits. For the first four months of fiscal 2007, growth of federal government receipts have increased faster than outlays.

In the October-January period, receipts total $834.14 billion, up 9.7% from for the same period in fiscal 2006. Outlays so far this fiscal year total $876.30 billion, up 2.1% from the same period a year ago.

Individual income tax receipts total $405.29 billion in fiscal 2007 through January, up 13% from the same period a year earlier. Meanwhile, corporate income tax receipts in the October-January period were $109.71 billion, up 22% from the year-earlier period.

The government paid $18.40 billion in net interest last month on the federal debt. Net interest on the federal debt excludes interest paid on nonmarketable government securities held by federal trust funds, such as Social Security.

The Treasury said it plans to release budget data for February on March 12.

Deficit Dips 57% From Same Time Last Year (USAT)

USA Today, February 13, 2007

Record tax collections reduced the federal deficit by more than half during the first four months of the fiscal year compared with the same period a year ago, the Treasury Department reported Monday. The four-month deficit for the budget year that began Oct. 1 totaled $42.2 billion, down 57.2% from the same period in fiscal 2006. Revenues were up 9.7%, climbing to $834.1 billion, a record for the period from October through January. Government spending was up only 2.1%, but set a record for the period at $876.3 billion.

The government ran a surplus in January, spending $222.4 billion while collecting $260.6 billion.

The Congressional Budget Office expects the full-year deficit will be about $200 billion, down from $247.7 billion in fiscal 2006. That was the lowest in four years.

McCain says Iraq could see Tet-like attack

Republican presidential hopeful John McCain said he fears an offensive by Iraqi insurgents similar to the Tet Offensive by the Viet Cong that sent U.S. casualties soaring in Vietnam nearly 40 years ago. McCain said a large-scale offensive in Iraq could "switch American public opinion the way that the Tet Offensive did."

McCain, who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam, said it's not the U.S. presence in Iraq that upsets voters but rather the number of casualties. The U.S. death toll is more than 3,100.

McCain is one of the strongest proponents of President Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by about 21,500.

Bush adviser won't testify on fuel plan

The White House is resisting a congressional request for an economic adviser to President Bush to testify about the administration's plan to upgrade the federal fuel-efficiency requirements for new passenger cars.

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich., wants Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council, to testify.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said there's a long-standing policy that members of the president's personal staff don't testify before Congress, but "we'll continue to work with the committee to see what we can work out."

Oil Price, Home Default Woes Slam Stocks (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 13, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks extended their worst weekly decline since December Monday as lower oil prices and rising homeowner defaults contributed to a sell-off in energy and real estate shares.

ExxonMobil dropped to its lowest point in a month after crude fell below $58 a barrel. Simon Property, Boston Properties and Kimco Realty fell for a third-consecutive session on renewed concern that interest rates may increase later this year. Energy companies make up 9.7% of the benchmark Standard & Poor's 500 index by value. Analysts expect the group's earnings to fall this quarter as oil's 5.3% slump in 2007 erodes the companies' profit margins.

"Our expectation has been for about a plus 5% to plus 6% growth rate in earnings on the S&P 500" in 2007, says Craig Hester, president of Hester Capital Management. "That's a fairly dramatic slowdown from last year. It will cause the market to not have as good of returns this year as we've experienced the last few years."

All three major U.S. stock indexes retreated for a third session. The S&P 500 fell 4.69 points, or 0.3%, to 1433.37 after slipping 0.7% last week. The Dow Jones industrials fell 28.28 points, or 0.2%, to 12,552.55. The Nasdaq composite lost 9.44 points, or 0.4%, to 2450.38.

Crude declined $2.08, or 3.5%, to $57.81 a barrel after Saudi Arabia told Asian refiners to expect more shipments next month, and the nation's oil minister said OPEC doesn't need to rein in production. Exxon, the world's biggest oil company, fell 62 cents to $74.60. ConocoPhillips, the No. 3 U.S. oil company, retreated 96 cents to $66.03.

Real estate stocks slumped for a third session, sliding 2.2%. The shares had led the S&P 500 higher this year on speculation that takeovers will increase after Blackstone Group agreed to buy Sam Zell's Equity Office Properties Trust for $23 billion. Simon, the largest U.S. mall developer, retreated $2.47 to $114.91. Boston Properties lost $3.54 to $123.50. Kimco slid $1.16 to $50.72. Home builders dropped for a sixth-consecutive day, the longest losing streak since November. D.R. Horton, the No. 2 U.S. builder, fell 72 cents to $27.33. Pulte Homes slipped 32 cents to $31.88.

Concern that mortgage defaults may increase was sparked last week by London-based HSBC's announcement that it set aside more provisions for bad loans than analysts expected because bad home loans in the USA rose. St. Louis Fed President William Poole also noted defaults in loans to risky borrowers and signaled rates may head higher.

Stocks Slide On Cautious Trading Ahead Of Week's Economic Reports (WP/AP)

NEW YORK, Feb. 12 -- Wall Street extended its losses Monday as investors awaited important economic data this week and were disappointed by the collapse of several proposed acquisitions.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 28.28, or 0.22 percent, to 12,552.55. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was down 4.69, or 0.33 percent, at 1433.37, and the Nasdaq composite index retreated 9.44, or 0.38 percent, to 2450.38.

The markets traded cautiously ahead of Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's scheduled testimony before Congress on Wednesday. Government data due Friday should shed light on wholesale inflation and the state of the housing market.

Unlike recent Mondays, there was a dearth of acquisition announcements to give the market a lift. Instead, the Nasdaq Stock Market failed in its bid to buy the London Stock Exchange, and Sanofi-Aventis, a French drugmaker, called off talks for a possible deal with Bristol-Myers Squibb.

Wall Street fell last week on concerns about higher oil prices and the possibility that inflation could lead to higher interest rates. With fourth-quarter earnings reports nearly completed, investors have traded hesitantly as they waited for some kind of catalyst to give them direction.

Movers

Exxon Mobil fell 62 cents, to $74.60, on falling oil prices.

ConocoPhillips was off 96 cents, at $66.

Chevron declined $1, to $72.32.

Nasdaq fell $2.10, to $35.10, after London Stock Exchange shareholders did not approve its bid to acquire the British bourse.

Bristol- Myers tumbled 93 cents, to $27.59, after the report on the Sanofi-Aventis deal.

Home Depot rose 44 cents, to $41.44, after it said it was considering shedding its division that serves contractors, home builders and other business customers.

Apple rose $1.61, to $84.88, after it was upgraded by a Citigroup analyst.

Bayer rose 62 cents, to $58.45, on good news about a possible treatment for liver cancer.

Novelis, an aluminum producer, rose $5.13, to $43.67, after it agreed to be bought by India's Hindalco Industries.

The Bernanke Blues Leave Stock Prices Seeing Red (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

The stock market has a case of the Bernanke blues.

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke gives his twice-yearly testimony to the Senate Banking Committee tomorrow and to the House Financial Services Committee the next day. Investors fear he will comment on the economy's strength, feeding fears that the Fed eventually will try to cool the economy off by raising its target short-term interest rate.

Higher rates typically hurt stocks by raising borrowing costs for companies and consumers, stifling business.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 28.28 points, or 0.22%, to 12552.55. It is up less than 1% this year, but still is only about 121 points below its record close, 12673.68, hit Feb. 1.

"The big story now is interest rates. People are concerned that the Fed may have to raise interest rates because the economy is heating up," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co.

With the Dow industrials up 16% last year, some investors have been selling a bit, to bank some profits.

The interest-rate worries overshadowed the $2.08 drop in oil futures to $57.81 a barrel, the biggest one-day decline in a month -- good news for most stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0131625

Saudi Arabia's oil minister said the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries may not cut production next month after all.

But the news didn't help the broader market much. It did drive down oil-company stocks, contributing to market weakness.

Bond yields rose, sending bond prices down, on fears that any Fed move could push up a broad variety of interest rates.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.33%, or 4.69 points, to 1433.37, up 1.1% in 2007. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.38%, or 9.44 points, to 2450.38, still up 1.5% this year.

The Dow Jones Transportation Average, down last week, rebounded on lower oil prices and hopes for sustained economic growth. It rose 0.38% to 4937.93, up 8.3% in 2007.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms, with Hong Kong's benchmark stock index hurt by selling in China Mobile Ltd. ahead of its weighting cut in a reshuffle of the index. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.67%, or 1.66 points, to 247.16. Japan's markets were closed for National Foundation Day.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.03 billion shares, as 1,289 stocks rose and 2,022 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.804%. The 30-year bond was down 10/32 to yield 4.886%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 121.94 yen, up from 121.68, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2964 from $1.3006.

Our Economy Is At Risk (USAT)

By Charles Schumer And Michael Bloomberg

USA Today, February 13, 2007

Today, Wall Street is booming, and our nation's short-term economic outlook is strong. But the report we released last month confirmed what many of us have suspected: Our economy's long-term health will be at risk unless we address our declining global competitiveness in the capital markets. We can — and must — do this while also continuing to protect consumers and investors.

This is not simply a New York issue. Seven states have more than 10% of their gross domestic product devoted to financial services. Yet other nations have begun to capture an increasing share of this business. Growing financial centers across the globe are challenging us in cutting-edge areas, such as derivatives, bond securitization and initial public offerings. Technology is letting capital flow to all corners of the globe, and there is nothing we can do to stop it. But capital flows to the most efficient and attractive markets, and we can — and should — increase the efficiency and attractiveness of our markets.

The problem we face is not that our investment banks can't compete, but that international businesses are looking for stable, predictable, low-cost markets — and, increasingly, not finding them here. Our study found that the American market is harmed by legal and regulatory policies that are too burdensome, and immigration policies that are too restrictive.

To prevent further losses, we should:

· Streamline our regulatory process, which is now a thicket of complicated rules.

· Reform our immigration policies so we stop turning away talented and innovative people driving the industry forward.

·Move toward a fairer and more predictable legal environment that reduces frivolous litigation, while preserving cases aimed at protecting shareholders and consumers.

As the international market evolves, we have to evolve with it. And that means carefully recalibrating the balance between private-sector innovation and government regulation, with consumer and investor protection always foremost in mind. We welcome more international competition and the benefits it will produce for Americans. But we also believe strongly that America should not be forced to compete with one arm tied behind our back.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg produced a recent report on American capital markets.

USA Today, February 13, 2007

When Main Street jobs go overseas, Wall Street generally shrugs. The typical response from the nation's financial elite is that people who have lost work should tough it out and acquire new skills.

Now the tables may be turning, as Wall Street ponders its own potential job losses. Foreign companies are increasingly bypassing New York and listing their shares on overseas markets. If the trend continues, it could mean the migration of high-paying investment banking jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0131626

The horror! Faced with this threat, Wall Street and its political supporters have sprung into action, commissioning studies and urging that the government help by easing post-Enron accounting regulations, adopting lawsuit reform and pre-empting state banking regulations.

Regulation and litigation are, to be sure, legitimate issues, ones that go well beyond Wall Street. But they are not why companies are listing on foreign exchanges. That is happening for the same reason that other industries have gone overseas — global competition.

New York has long been the world's financial center. Now bankers in other countries are mastering financial skills — much as others in past decades figured out how to produce textiles, cars and appliances — and are competing at prices that undercut New York. According to a study by the London Stock Exchange, for instance, New York firms' underwriting fees for initial public offerings of stock are about twice those charged throughout Europe.

Before Wall Street gets any relief from Washington, it should consider lowering its fees and expectations of exorbitant profits and bonuses. According to the New York comptroller's office, the average Wall Street bonus was a record-smashing $137,580 last year, hardly a sign of an industry in distress.

The pleas coming from Wall Street are akin to the National Association of Realtors arguing that the downturn in housing requires government action to help brokers.

The loss of financial services jobs would certainly be bad for New York and for anyone interested in being a U.S.-based investment banker. But from customers' perspective, the increased competition means more choice and lower fees.

Moreover, regulations are not designed to protect investment bankers. They are to protect investors and consumers. What do investors think? Some groups, like the mutual fund industry's Investment Company Institute, favor modest accounting law changes that fall far short of Wall Street's sky-is-falling attitude. Others, like the pension fund-oriented Council of Institutional Investors, are downright hostile to Wall Street's ideas.

The jobs in question are among the high-skill, high-wage ones that should drive the U.S. economy in a competitive age. But ultimately the way to keep them is by competing on the basis of price, quality and integrity.

That is something that Americans in other professions have come to know. Wall Street can do so as well.

States And U.S. At Odds On Aid For Uninsured (NYT)

By Robert Pear And Raymond Hernandez

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 — In the absence of federal action, governors and state legislators around the country are transforming the nation's health care system, putting affordable health insurance within reach of millions of Americans in hopes of reversing the steady rise in the number of uninsured, now close to 47 million.

But the states appear to be on a collision course with the Bush administration, whose latest budget proposals create a huge potential obstacle to their efforts to expand coverage. While offering to work with states by waiving requirements of federal law, the Bush administration has balked at state initiatives that increase costs to the federal government.

State efforts have almost invariably begun with children, building on the Children's Health Insurance Program, which is jointly financed by the federal and state governments. Many states are eager to expand eligibility for that program, and some are going far beyond the income levels deemed appropriate by the White House. In his budget last week, President Bush said he wanted to return the program to its "original objective" of covering children with family incomes less than twice the poverty level.

Sixteen states already cover children in families with incomes above 200 percent of the poverty level, and some want to go higher, even as the president seeks to reduce federal payments for children in families with higher incomes.

In New York, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, has proposed raising the state's income limit to 400 percent of the poverty level, from 250 percent. A family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650. Arizona and Wisconsin are also proposing raising income ceilings.

In California, as part of a plan to cover all state residents, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, proposed increasing the income limit for the children's insurance program to 300 percent of the poverty level, from 250 percent.

Gov. Rod R. Blagojevich of Illinois, a Democrat, said Mr. Bush's proposal "would seriously hamper the efforts of Illinois and other states" to ensure that all children had coverage — the goal of a state law he signed in November 2005.

The movement to expand coverage is by no means limited to children any more.

The National Conference of State Legislatures has reported: "Health care reform was hot in legislatures across the nation in 2006, and the forecast for this session may be even hotter. Fueled by the increasing number of uninsured Americans, the declining number of employers offering insurance to their employees, the improved fiscal conditions in the states and the lack of federal action, states are leading the way in health care reform."

Officials cite a groundswell of state activity:

¶Arkansas, Kentucky, Montana, Oklahoma, Rhode Island and Tennessee have new laws and programs to reduce the cost of insurance for small employers.

¶Massachusetts and Vermont passed laws in 2006 to achieve universal or nearly universal coverage, while addressing the cost and quality of care.

¶Several states, including Colorado and Delaware, are requiring insurers to cover young adults, the fastest-growing segment of the uninsured population.

"We have a goal that all Minnesotans should be covered by health insurance," Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican, said in an address to the State Legislature last month.

In New York State, the Children's Health Insurance Program covers 385,000 children, of whom 55,000 have family incomes above 200 percent of the poverty level. Another 50,000 children would be eligible under Governor Spitzer's proposal to increase the income ceiling.

The federal government now pays 65 percent of the cost of coverage for each child in New York's program, or $1,154 a year out of a cost of $1,776. Judith Arnold, the program's director, said Monday that under the president's proposal, the federal contribution would be reduced by $266 a child. So, she said, New York would lose $14.6 million a year.

Knowing they cannot count on a major infusion of federal money, some states are looking to their own revenue sources, including tobacco taxes, pools of money set aside for charity care and uncompensated care, and assessments levied on employers who do not provide health benefits to their workers.

Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, has proposed paying for coverage of the uninsured through a variety of new taxes, including an increase in the state's tobacco tax.

Mr. Rendell also wants to levy a 3 percent assessment on the payrolls of businesses that do not offer coverage to their employees.

Similarly, under Governor Schwarzenegger's proposal, businesses with 10 or more employees would have to offer insurance to their workers or pay 4 percent of their payroll into a state fund to be used for coverage.

State efforts face several potential pitfalls. The cost of coverage could spin out of control. An economic downturn could reduce states' fiscal capacity. Moreover, a federal law, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, could block any state program that requires employers to alter their health plans.

In Washington, health policy debates highlight the ideological divide between Republicans and Democrats over the proper role of government in helping the uninsured. Governors and state legislators tend to be more pragmatic.

"There is such a political divide in Washington that many people believe that the only reasonable chance to succeed is at the state level," said Jeffrey S. Crowley, a senior research scholar at the Health Policy Institute of Georgetown University.

Soaring health costs are placing pressures on employers and employees alike. In recent weeks, companies like Wal-Mart have joined labor unions and consumer groups in coalitions espousing universal coverage.

In his State of the Union address on Jan. 23, Mr. Bush proposed a new tax deduction to help people buy health insurance outside the workplace, and he said he wanted to help "states that are coming up with innovative ways to cover the uninsured."

In his budget, Mr. Bush said the way to transform the health care system was by "subsidizing the purchase of private insurance," not by expanding public programs in a way that would increase costs to the federal government.

To slow the growth of Medicare and Medicaid, Mr. Bush asked Congress to squeeze tens of billions of dollars from the programs.

Mr. Bush's efforts, combined with the flurry of state activity, have forced Congress to face fundamental questions about the Children's Health Insurance Program: If states run out of money, should the federal government bail them out? Should states be allowed to use the money to cover adults?

More than a dozen states expect to exhaust their allotments of federal money in the next few months, raising the possibility that children will be removed from the rolls. Georgia and New Jersey, for example, said they would run out of money by May.

White House officials said that some states had strayed from the purpose of the program in another way, by covering adults. Mr. Bush wants to prohibit states from adding childless adults to the rolls. And he would restrict eligibility for parents.

Jason A. Helgerson, policy director for the Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services, said, "There is strong empirical evidence that when you cover adults and children, you get more kids covered." In Wisconsin, the Children's Health Insurance Program covers 36,900 parents and 29,800 children, Mr. Helgerson said.

Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, asked: "What is going on here? When we created the program, its purpose was to provide coverage for low-income children."

Industry Plans National Attack On Proposed Health Care Cuts (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

DOJ_NMG_0131628

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

Hospitals and a health care workers' union in New York plan to mount an advertising campaign to defeat spending cuts proposed by President Bush — their first attempt to affect national policy with a strategy they have used statewide.

Officials of the union and the hospital association said they would also run ads in New York State attacking Gov. Eliot Spitzer's proposed medical spending cuts as a danger to the health care system, a tactic they used to great effect against his predecessor, George E. Pataki.

On the national level, the officials said the campaign would probably take aim at key members of Congress — those on important committees and those who are likely to be swing votes — with ads in their home districts and in Washington, to persuade them to oppose the president's cuts.

The union, 1199 S.E.I.U. United Healthcare Workers East, and the Greater New York Hospital Association jointly control a $60 million fund, the Health Care Education Project, which they could spend on ads to promote or to assail policies, though by law the money cannot be used for a particular side in political campaigns.

The officials said they had not decided when such a campaign would start, or what markets the ads would appear in. And they said they had not decided how much to spend, but some hospital executives in New York said they had heard discussions about an initial commitment of $15 million, with possibly more to follow.

"We will do whatever is needed," said Dennis Rivera, the president of 1199.

The hospital association and the union plan to meet on Thursday, along with top officials of 1199's parent union, the Service Employees International Union, to develop their strategy.

"We have to take our case to the court of public opinion that affects both venues," Washington and Albany, said Kenneth E. Raske, president of the hospital association, which represents nearly all the hospitals and nursing homes in New York City and its suburbs.

Such a campaign would be the first real test for Mr. Rivera as he makes the transition to a new post as national chief of health care workers within the service employees' union, one of the nation's largest and most politically active unions.

He had already planned to help health care companies and unions around the country duplicate what their counterparts have done in New York, uniting employers and workers in raising millions of dollars to turn themselves into political powers. The primary long-term goal, he said, would be to press for health insurance for all.

But, at least at first, a national campaign against Mr. Bush's proposed cuts would rely primarily on New York money, which is already in hand. "It would be fair to say that at the beginning, we will be the seed money for this project," Mr. Rivera said in an interview. "There are commitments from other employers and labor organizations around the country, but I'm not at liberty to divulge that."

The fund was built over many years, mostly through $5 and $10 monthly deductions from the paychecks of thousands of mostly low-wage workers, as part of a provision in the contracts negotiated by 1199 and the hospitals.

Millions of dollars from the fund have been spent on ads in New York State several times over the past dozen years to defeat proposed cuts or to win passage of bills in Albany. In a few cases, more than $10 million from the fund was spent on a single campaign over a few months — more than some serious candidates for statewide office spend.

But it remains to be seen whether an essentially liberal appeal for government support of health care — especially one emanating from New York — would be as effective in other parts of the country as it has been in New York.

Mr. Spitzer's proposed budget would reduce state support for hospitals — mostly through Medicaid, the health plan for the poor — by $300 million to $400 million a year. He has also accused hospitals and the union of manipulating the state budget to benefit themselves at the expense of all New Yorkers, leading to some heated exchanges with Mr. Rivera and others.

The effect of Mr. Bush's cuts would be several times as great in New York, possibly more than $1 billion a year when fully carried out, though hospital officials said it was hard to make precise estimates because information from parts of the White House plan had not been released.

Heading a union local with 275,000 members, Mr. Rivera has become one of the most feared forces in New York politics, and beyond.

In addition to the ad fund, 1199 has a political action committee that raises $7 million a year from its members to donate to candidates, a formidable phone bank operation and thousands of experienced campaign volunteers.

Mr. Rivera said he planned to have other union locals and employers create "education funds" through payroll deductions and to have health care workers nationwide raise $20 million a year for political contributions, mostly to federal campaigns.

"I will try to reproduce what we do in New York," he said. "In a short period of time, it will become the largest political action committee in the United States."

Mr. Rivera repeatedly used the phrase "the Bush-Spitzer cuts," and said that an essential part of the campaign's message in New York would link the governor, a Democrat, to the president, a Republican.

Mr. Spitzer released his budget before the federal cuts were announced, and some hospital executives and lawmakers said they hoped that seeing the compounding effect of the two proposals would cause the governor to give some ground.

Mr. Bush called for broad cuts in Medicaid and in Medicare, the health insurance for the elderly and the disabled, both major sources of hospital and nursing home revenue.

He also proposed reductions in support for public hospitals and for teaching hospitals that train new doctors in their first years after medical school — cuts that would hit New York much harder than other parts of the country.

Members of New York's Congressional delegation have vowed to fight the president's plans, but some of those cuts would be made administratively, not as part of a budget that must be passed by Congress. It might also prove easier to find votes from around the country against across-the-board cuts than against reductions that would primarily hurt New York.

Burdened By Healthcare Costs, US Businesses Seek A Shift (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 13, 2007

The message comes from Wal-Mart, but it reflects a view that's increasingly common in corporate America: The US healthcare system needs to be fixed. Big business can help, but don't expect us to shoulder the whole burden.

That was a subtext when Wal-Mart chief executive Lee Scott took the stage last week alongside representatives of a major labor union to kick off a campaign called "Better Health Care Together." The aim of this unlikely partnership is to extend coverage to all Americans by 2012, and Mr. Scott emphasized that the responsibility must be shared by government and individuals as well as business.

His rallying cry doesn't represent any shared blueprint among employers, but it does symbolize an important shift over the past year.

Faced with surging healthcare costs and employees who want insurance coverage, businesses have become more likely to be advocates, rather than skeptics, of a major overhaul. At the same time, their motive is not just to see healthcare problems addressed. They also want to avoid shouldering more of the burden themselves.

"Clearly, we're going to start moving away from employer provided health insurance," says Richard Brown, director of the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research. "Employers are seriously looking for a way to get out of this."

The major role of employers in America's healthcare system is, in some ways, an unusual artifact of history. The practice of employers providing health insurance spread in the wake of World War II limits on wages, which prompted many employers to provide back door pay hikes by offering health insurance to employees.

Given that legacy, many experts say the nation will probably migrate toward hybrid solutions, which blend a major government role with responsibilities for individuals and employers.

"Whatever kind of reform we have will be a mixture of approaches," predicts Jack Hadley, a healthcare expert at the Urban Institute in Washington. In the process, he expects that employers will end up covering a smaller share of American workers.

"That's certainly what the trend has been, and I don't see anything that would reverse that trend," he says.

Last year, just 59 percent of US workers were covered by their employer's health insurance, down from 65 percent in 2001, according to research by the Kaiser Family Foundation. And health insurance premiums, on average, are 87 percent higher now than in 2000, compared with cumulative overall inflation of 18 percent during that span.

It's not that businesses don't want to offer strong benefit packages to their workers. Many, especially at small businesses, can't afford big health plans. Even large businesses are asking employees to pay more out of pocket.

"Wal-Mart is committed to high quality, affordable, and accessible healthcare," said Scott of Wal-Mart on Feb. 7. "But our current system hurts America's competitiveness and leaves too many people uninsured."

The company has come under fire for what critics say are skimpy health benefits. Wal-Mart, for its part, says that 9 in 10 of its blue-garbed "associates" have coverage, either through the company or another source.

In last week's push for universal coverage, Wal-Mart was joined by other major companies: Intel, AT&T, and Kelly Services.

"We feel a huge sense of urgency," says Maria Ghazal, public-policy director for a healthcare task force at the Business Roundtable, a group of large employers based in Washington.

The Roundtable itself, last month, joined with the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) to push for action on healthcare.

"Mostly it's a sense that the way the system is now, if you can call it a system, is not sustainable," Ms. Ghazal says.

She says the desire for discussion is very different from the atmosphere in 1993, when President Clinton's push for healthcare reforms foundered amid dissent, including from business.

DOJ_NMG_0131630

"That's one of the fundamental differences between 2007 and 1993," says Sara Howard, a health policy expert at the SEIU. "What is remarkable about what's happened in the last few weeks is that, for the first time, major corporations are stepping up and saying that the time for change is now."

But all the calls for change don't create any clear mandate on policy.

"Right now the momentum is there. I just don't know where we can find common agreement," says Katie Strong, director of congressional and public affairs at the US Chamber of Commerce, a business group in Washington.

For one thing, the business world push doesn't settle a basic conservative-liberal divide over whether the key fix is a stronger role for government, or the introduction of more free-market competition in an industry where government has become the major purchaser.

"The status quo guarantees government dominance of the system," says Robert Moffitt, an expert at the conservative Heritage Foundation.

That's because government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid continue to grow, and some proposals envision government insuring workers who don't get coverage through their employer.

Many employers support at least the concept behind President Bush's recent proposal to let individuals have the same tax deduction for healthcare that business enjoys. Such a move might inspire greater competition in the health-insurance marketplace, something businesses generally support.

Employers also hope to see cost-control achieved through policies that improve the use of information technology in healthcare.

Many others are open to discussing requirements that they provide health insurance for workers, or pay into a government fund to provide such coverage. Such a system, often dubbed "play or pay," is under consideration in California.

Mental Health Nears 'Parity' (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A decision by major insurance and business groups to support legislation requiring health insurers to treat mental illnesses the same way as physical ailments could mean better mental-health coverage, at least for many who already receive it.

A bill introduced by a bipartisan group of senators -- Pete Domenici (R., N.M.), Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) and Mike Enzi (R., Wyo.) -- doesn't mandate that group health plans cover mental illness. Instead, it requires that plans, if they cover both mental and physical illnesses, treat both with "parity," or similar benefits, such as deductibles, co-payments and treatment limitations. Employers with fewer than 50 workers would be exempted.

The measure marks a compromise reached after more than a year's negotiations among lawmakers, mental-health advocates, insurance companies and business groups. Supporters include America's Health Insurance Plans, the National Retail Federation and the National Alliance on Mental Illness. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce also said it is "prepared to support" the legislation as introduced.

The endorsements, as well as the change to a Democratic-controlled Congress, brighten prospects for the long-stalled legislation. For 15 years, versions of the bill had passed the Senate and even the House, only to founder. Business and insurers opposed coverage mandates and said they were concerned about the rising health-care costs.

But this time around, the legislation won over many opponents, in part due to dropping the mandate of mental-health coverage and favoring tools to cut costs and improve quality. Companies and insurers can opt out if their overall costs -- because of the equal-coverage requirement -- grow by 2% during the first year and 1% in later years. The bill also requires states to follow the "parity" standard, which would simplify rules for companies doing business across state lines.

The bill "addresses very reasonable concerns that the employer community has raised about the costs of the proposed parity requirement," said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, in a letter to bill sponsors. In an interview, she said the legislation should serve as a model of how bipartisan bills should be crafted.

About one in four Americans older than 17 suffers from a diagnosable mental disorder in a given year, according to the National Institute of Mental Health. About 45% of those people have two or more disorders. Companies aren't required to offer mental-health coverage and many of those patients have none.

The bill, in further defining coverage "parity," would finish what the 1996 Mental Health Parity Act started and improve coverage for those who already receive it. The 1996 law requires plans, if they offer mental-health benefits, to set annual and lifetime dollar limits equal to those applied to physical and surgical benefits. But the law didn't define parity on important benefit structures in mental-health coverage, especially cost-sharing, inpatient stays and outpatient visits. As the bill languished in Congress, more than 40 states passed such laws, with varying definitions of "parity."

Bush Close To Trade Deal With Congress (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

The Bush administration is close to a deal with Congress to pass pending trade agreements and form a common international economic agenda for the president's last two years in office, say senior officials and leading Democrats.

The negotiations are designed to reach an agreement that would leave the administration six weeks to submit agreements with Peru, Colombia, Panama and possibly South Korea to Congress for ratification.

The talks are complicated by mutual distrust and internal divisions but are edging close to a breakthrough, according to participants.

Agreement by leading Democrats to support the Latin American deals would be followed by further bargaining over trade and currency imbalances with China and Japan and the treatment of vehicles and agriculture in negotiations between Washington and Seoul.

The dialogue could break down at any point and both sides are ready to exchange blame and score political points in the event of failure. But interviews over the past week with current and former administration officials, congressmen, lobbyists and experts reveal a remarkable degree of confidence that a bipartisan consensus on trade can be reached.

An administration official said leading Democrats and Republicans were ready to proceed despite opposition from "elements in both parties that don't want this to succeed".

Congressmen seen as obstacles to a deal are also changing their tune, including Collin Peterson, chairman of the House agriculture committee. "Well, you know, I had a visit with Charlie Rangel here just recently and he and Sandy Levin, who are the main players in the House, are working very hard to see if there is a way to do this and I think maybe something will get worked out," he said.

"Currently they're in some serious discussion and negotiations with the administration."

Representative Sander Levin said: "There is time to act. This is doable if the administration is serious."

The process sketched out by the administration involves a series of carefully choreographed steps that it hopes will lead to the renewal of President George W. Bush's trade negotiating authority, due to expire on June 30.

Welles Orr, a former adviser to Mr Bush's father and to ex-President Bill Clinton, said: "The Bush team badly wants and needs this." But many doubt the White House can win renewal of fast-track – needed for a successful conclusion to the Doha round of world trade talks. "There is every chance they will mess this up," said a Republican lobbyist.

Carla Hills, a former US trade representative, said the trade arm of the White House was "small and overworked" and would need the resources of industry lobbyists to sell its agenda to Capitol Hill.

Susan Schwab, the current US trade representative, was due to meet business leaders yesterday, including representatives of Procter & Gamble, Caterpillar, Eastman Kodak, Cargill, UPS, New York Life and Abbott, to rally support ahead of talks with House Democrats tomorrow.

This week Ms Schwab will concede demands from House Democrats for the addition of international labour standards to the pending trade deals and try to devise an acceptable formula for enforcing them.

Earlier Ms Schwab caved in to a longstanding demand of House Democrats and launched a case against China at the World Trade Organisation over tax subsidies for manufacturing exports. But the Democrats quickly raised the bar, adding a stronger yen to the list of "must haves" – to the alarm of economists.

Adam Posen, a monetary expert, said that if Congress hit "blindly out at any exchange rate levels that particular domestic lobbies do not like, they will truly politicise exchange rates around the world, increase uncertainty in financial markets and deal a severe blow to the creditworthiness of the dollar".

Mr Levin made it clear that as the deadline for fast-track approached, Democrats would also seek a fresh debate about globalisation to address the impact on income inequality and issues such as "how much you have to worry about the equity factor or just go for growth".

"All of these issues have busted out in the globalisation process as it has intensified. That is what has been happening," he added.

TODAY'S AGENDA December Trade Gap Expected To Be Wider (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0131632

The trade deficit is expected to have widened modestly in December from November's $58.2 billion gap, partly due to higher prices for imported oil. Exports of aircraft, which hit a record in November, are likely to pull back. Overall, the gap -- which in large part reflects the huge imbalance with China -- has been narrowing since August's record $68.5 billion deficit.

The Commerce Department releases trade figures at 8:30 a.m. EST

Japan Holds Forum to Discuss Whaling

Japan will play host to a three-day conference of the International Whaling Commission to discuss possible changes to the organization. Critics say the aim is to advance a campaign to resume commercial whaling, and more than 25 of the IWC's 72 member countries, including the U.S., are boycotting. Japan, which kills whales under a scientific program, says whale stocks have recovered enough following a 1986 moratorium to allow limited commercial hunting.

Court Adviser to Issue Opinion on "VW Law"

A senior adviser to Europe's highest court will issue a legal opinion on whether Germany can shield Volkswagen from a takeover, in a case that could set a precedent. The so-called VW law limits voting rights of each shareholder in the car maker to 20%, regardless of shares held. The advocate general submits his opinion for consideration to 13 European Court of Justice judges. In about 80% of cases, the panel follows the adviser's opinion.

Veterans Face Consecutive Budget Cuts (AP)

By Andrew Taylor,

AP, February 13, 2007

The Bush administration's budget assumes cuts to funding for veterans' health care two years from now — even as badly wounded troops returning from Iraq could overwhelm the system.

Bush is using the cuts, critics say, to help fulfill his pledge to balance the budget by 2012. But even administration allies say the numbers are not real and are being used to make the overall budget picture look better.

After an increase sought for next year, the Bush budget would turn current trends on their head. Even though the cost of providing medical care to veterans has been growing rapidly — by more than 10 percent in many years — White House budget documents assume consecutive cutbacks in 2009 and 2010 and a freeze thereafter.

The proposed cuts are unrealistic in light of recent VA budget trends — its medical care budget has risen every year for two decades and 83 percent in the six years since Bush took office — sowing suspicion that the White House is simply making them up to make its long-term deficit figures look better.

"Either the administration is willingly proposing massive cuts in VA health care," said Rep. Chet Edwards of Texas, chairman of the panel overseeing the VA's budget. "Or its promise of a balanced budget by 2012 is based on completely unrealistic assumptions."

A spokesman for Larry Craig, R-Idaho, the top Republican on the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee, called the White House moves another step in a longtime "budgeting game."

"No one who is knowledgeable about VA budgeting issues anticipates any cuts to VA funding. None. Zero. Zip," said Craig spokesman Jeff Schrade.

Edwards said that a more realistic estimate of veterans costs is $16 billion higher than the Bush estimate for 2012.

In fact, even the White House doesn't seem serious about the numbers. It says the long-term budget numbers don't represent actual administration policies. Similar cuts assumed in earlier budgets have been reversed.

The veterans cuts, said White House budget office spokesman Sean Kevelighan, "don't reflect any policy decisions. We'll revisit them when we do the (future) budgets."

The number of veterans coming into the VA health care system has been rising by about 5 percent a year as the number of people returning from Iraq with illnesses or injuries keep rising. Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans represent almost 5 percent of the VA's patient caseload, and many are returning from battle with grievous injuries requiring costly care, such as traumatic brain injuries.

All told, the VA expects to treat about 5.8 million patients next year, including 263,000 veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The White House budget office, however, assumes that the veterans' medical services budget — up 83 percent since Bush took office and winning a big increase in Bush's proposed 2008 budget — can absorb a 2 percent cut the following year and remain essentially frozen for three years in a row after that.

"It's implausible," Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., said of the budget projections.

The White House made virtually identical assumptions last year — a big increase in the first year of the budget and cuts for every year thereafter to veterans medical care. Now, the White House estimate for 2008 is more than $4 billion higher than Bush figured last year.

And the VA has been known to get short-term estimates wrong as well. Two years ago, Congress had to pass an emergency $1.5 billion infusion for veterans health programs for 2005 and added $2.7 billion to Bush's request for 2006. The VA underestimated the number of veterans, including those from Iraq and Afghanistan, who were seeking care, as well as the cost of treatment and long-term care.

The budget for hospital and medical care for veterans is funded for the current year at $35.6 billion, and would rise to $39.6 billion in 2008 under Bush's budget. That's about 9 percent. But the budget faces a cut to $38.8 billion in 2009 and would hover around that level through 2012.

The cuts come even as the number of veterans from the Iraq and Afghanistan wars is expected to increase 26 percent next year.

In Bush's proposal to balance the budget by 2012, he's assuming that spending on domestic agency operating budgets will increase by about 1 percent each year.

Spending Reforms Empower Agencies To Ignore Earmarks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

Members of Congress quietly have been calling federal agencies demanding their pet projects still be funded weeks after they swore off pork-barrel spending, the Bush administration says.

In response, administration officials have signaled they ignore many of those requests -- a move that thrills fiscal conservatives who have called on the president to take that step. But it's likely to irk congressional spending committees because it may threaten 95 percent of pork-spending projects, or "earmarks."

"Some of your offices have begun to receive requests from some congressional offices asking that the department continue to fund programs or activities that received earmarked funds in prior years," the Department of Energy's chief of staff, Jeffrey Kupfer, wrote in a Feb. 2 internal memo. A check by The Washington Times of other agencies turned up similar reports of phone calls -- from congressional offices of both parties.

But now, Mr. Kupfer wrote, they will no longer feel bound by earmarks and will follow through only on those "with meritorious proposals or programs that effectively support and advance the department's missions and objectives."

Even stronger assurances have been made privately by top administration officials to Republican lawmakers who have been pleading with President Bush for the changes, congressional aides said.

"We may have totally changed the paradigm on how the federal government spends money," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, who has led the congressional fight on the issue. "For years, the risk has been on the agency side -- if they don't comply they're going to lose their budget. Now the risks shift to the member."

Earmarks have become the hottest issue in spending, thanks to big projects such as the one critics labeled the $223 million "Bridge to Nowhere" in Alaska. Estimates for annual earmark spending run from $17 billion to more than $71 billion.

The administration's recent action is aimed at earmarks slipped into the reports that accompany spending bills, which the Congressional Research Service says account for more than 95 percent of pork projects.

Congress votes on the bills but not the reports. Yet most agencies afforded the reports the force of law -- until now.

Last week, Mr. Bush declared open war on the report earmarks, bringing a foot-high stack of the add-ons with him to a speech in Manassas.

"Let that sun shine in. It's called transparency," Mr. Bush said. "If the members of Congress think it's a good idea, then they ought to vote it up or down and then send it to my desk so I know full well that there's been full scrutiny in Congress."

The administration's case was bolstered by a federal appeals court ruling last month that the reports do not have the force of law.

The first test will come soon on the Defense and Homeland Security spending bills, which were the only two spending bills passed last year. Each has earmarks in the bills and in the conference report.

A Homeland Security spokesman said the department was still in the process of gathering information on what earmark items are included, while a Defense spokesman was unable to find out the status of his department's earmarks.

Lawmakers are waiting to see whether Mr. Bush follows through.

"Killing an earmark is like trying to kill a snake -- you never know if it's dead or not. But I think we've got it surrounded," Mr. DeMint said.

DOJ_NMG_0131634

Mr. Bush has also challenged Congress to cut earmarks in half, but he can't say what that target number is because disagreement exists on what an earmark is.

Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, has directed agencies and departments to catalog all earmark requests, and defined them as spending requests from Congress that circumvent the normal competitive process.

Cutting earmarks will not necessarily cut spending, because the money would still flow to the agency, but it would be spent on the administration's priorities.

Some departments said they have never felt bound by items tucked into reports.

"Traditionally, the Education Department doesn't comply with earmarks that are part of report language," said Rebecca Neale, a department spokeswoman.

Ethics Gun Is Turned At Executive (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 13, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is planning to move legislation that would place strict ethics limits on executive-branch officials, going further than the ethics reforms the lower chamber adopted for itself last month.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a close ally of Pelosi's, is scheduled to hold a hearing on the legislation today and plans to mark it up in committee tomorrow.

Several of the proposed reforms in the measure appear to be in response to various controversies that have emerged during President Bush's tenure, ranging from a dispute over a secret energy task force to criticism over paying pundits for favorable reviews.

One of the far-reaching reforms Waxman is considering would require executive-branch officials to report all significant contacts they have with any private interest related to an official government action.

Four times a year administration officials would be required to report with whom they have met during the previous three months, the subject matter of those meetings, and the name of any clients represented. Congress had considered adopting a similar measure for its own members, but later dropped it amid complaints that it would create too much paperwork for lobbyists.

Publicizing the identities of those meeting with high-ranking administration officials has been a point of contention between Waxman and the Bush White House. During Bush's first term, Waxman supported the Government Accountability Office's (GAO) lawsuit to ascertain who met with Vice President Cheney's energy task force, which held extensive meetings with industry representatives before the administration unveiled its energy proposal.

There is little doubt that Cheney, who for the past six years has pushed to extend the bounds of executive privilege, would not be pleased if the legislation passed. But if enacted, he would face strong incentive to adhere to it. Executive-branch officials who failed to comply with the new ethics rules would be subject to a fine of up to $50,000.

The bill, the Executive Branch Reform Act of 2007, would be nearly identical to similarly titled legislation that the Government Reform Committee passed unanimously last April. Karen Lightfoot, a spokeswoman for the committee, said the bills were "very similar."

The major difference between this year and last is that Democrats now control the House floor agenda. Last year Republican leaders did not allow the full House to vote on the legislation, but this year Pelosi has vowed a different outcome.

"This leadership is supportive of this bill and it will come to the floor," said a Democratic leadership aide. "Timing is not clear yet."

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) - who controlled the House floor schedule last year - said he did not know why it never received a final vote and offered to look into it.

The legislation would expand two reforms that the House adopted earlier this year. One would create a two-year cooling-off period during which persons leaving the administration would not be allowed to lobby their former colleagues. Waxman's proposed reforms for the executive branch would go further than House reforms adopted earlier this year by also requiring similar restrictions for persons entering government from the private sector.

The second reform similar to new House rules would prohibit certain executive-branch officials from working on any matter impacting a prospective employer with whom they are in negotiations.

Officials could only continue working on something affecting a prospective employer if they receive a waiver because of "exceptional circumstances." The Office of Government Ethics (OGE) director would be required to review the circumstances before granting a waiver.

That reform would address the controversy that arose three years ago when Thomas Scully, then director of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, received a waiver allowing him to negotiate for jobs while he was working on the 2003 Medicare bill. He subsequently landed a job with Alston and Bird LLP.

Soon after Scully's departure, then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card directed government agencies to stop issuing such waivers, stipulating that only the White House could make those calls.

In addition, the new version of the bill would use stronger language than the 2006 version to prohibit individuals entering the administration from making decisions that affected their former employers financially.

The bill would also eliminate loopholes allowing federal officials to accept compensation from contractors and would prohibit the unauthorized expenditure of funds for publicity or propaganda purposes. The Department of Health and Human Services drew scrutiny years ago when it became known that it had paid columnist Maggie Gallagher $21,500 to work on the president's marriage initiative. Federal investigators also launched a probe into payments the Department of Education made to conservative pundit Armstrong Williams for his work on the No Child Left Behind law.

The pending bill would also overhaul the OGE. It would require the office to put out new reporting requirements for administration officials, and verify the accuracy and timeliness of reports.

No single agency compiles ethics records, such as gift waivers, for administration officials, and there is no venue for public inspection of those documents. They must be requested by a Freedom of Information Act request, said a person familiar with the legislation.

The Oversight panel's bill would change that by requiring the OGE to "make available to public inspection and copying" filed reports. The government ethics office would also play the role of law enforcer by notifying the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia when an executive-branch official may be in violation of reporting rules.

When House Changed Rules For Travel, He Lobbied For The Lobbyists (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Loopholes in laws and regulations sometimes seem to appear by magic, and often no one wants to claim to be the magician. But one man actually wants credit for a couple of big loopholes in the new ethics rules the House passed last month: John H. Graham IV.

Graham is the president of an organization that could exist only in Washington -- the American Society of Association Executives. In other words, he is the chief lobbyist for lobbyists.

His organization represents 22,000 association executives, from large groups such as the American Medical Association and small ones such as the Barbershop Harmony Society. When any of them are in danger of losing access to lawmakers, Graham, 57, is supposed to intervene.

Which is what he did -- proudly -- as soon as he learned that Democratic leaders wanted to ban travel provided by lobbyists and the entities that employ them. Graham dispatched his own lobbyists and several of his most sympathetic allies to meet with House staffers. Eventually they poked two gigantic holes in the proposed prohibition.

The first opened the way for lobbyists to pay for short trips -- one day as far as the Midwest and two days to the West Coast. The second permits colleges to provide travel to lawmakers without restriction, even though they lobby in Washington a lot. (See the next item.)

Ethics advocates were disappointed. "The better policy is no privately financed travel," said Meredith McGehee of the Campaign Legal Center.

But Graham was unabashed. Golf trips to Scotland should be nixed, he said, but not visits to taxpayer-funded programs or to industry-backed seminars. "We didn't want a total ban on travel," Graham said. "We were on top of it from the very beginning."

In fact, he and his lobbyists started their campaign a year ago after then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) first suggested a travel ban. That effort failed partly because of Graham's enterprise.

After the Democratic victory in last year's midterm elections, Graham's lobbyists -- Senior Vice President Jim Clarke and contract lobbyist James W. Rock -- targeted the staff of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and then met with aides to Democratic House leaders Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and James E. Clyburn (S.C.).

After one such meeting, Graham learned that the ban would prevent lawmakers from taking trips to colleges to give commencement addresses. He quickly asked the Association of American Colleges and Universities and the American Association of State Colleges and Universities to join the crusade.

Graham also recruited other groups with sterling reputations, including the American Heart Association, the YMCA of the USA and the American Cancer Society. They went as a group from office to office on Capitol Hill and made the case that brief trips could not be mistaken for boondoggles, especially when white-hat interests like themselves were footing the bill.

The result: Graham has become Mr. Loophole, winning the exemptions and on track to getting them in the Senate as well.Taken to School

Colleges are filled with smart people, but nobody gets rewarded just for their brains. Many of those brainy people know they've got to go asking for money when they want it. So it's no surprise that colleges are among the most prodigious users of lobbyists. Universities and other groups with direct interests in higher education spent $94.6 million on lobbying in 2005, an 18 percent increase from 2004, according to Inside Higher Ed.

Johns Hopkins University led the way with $1,020,000. Boston University, Case Western Reserve University and the University of Miami followed, with $920,000, $820,000 and $730,000, respectively.

Those numbers will probably decline now that pet projects, or earmarks, are harder to get. House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) told colleagues last week that they have until March 16 to request them and that their dollar amount will be cut in half compared with most earmarks in fiscal 2006.Conspicuous-Consumption Alert

Virginia Congressmen James P. Moran Jr. (D) and Thomas M. Davis III (R) sat next to each other in center-court floor seats at the Verizon Center last Wednesday to watch the San Antonio Spurs rout the Washington Wizards, 110-83. Turns out they both bought their tickets from real estate investor Joe Robert, their spokesmen said.

Davis paid a whopping $850 for his ticket out of his own pocket. But Moran used campaign funds to cover the $780 he shelled out for his seat, which raises the question: Why should donors finance his fun?

Moran's eventual answer (after further inquiry): They shouldn't. Spokesman Austin Durrer said Moran has canceled the campaign check and is personally paying Robert $850 "to avoid any perception of impropriety." Moran also regretted arriving late to the game. "At 70 bucks a minute," Durrer said, "it was an expensive seat to watch the Wizards get blown out."Winners and Losers of the Week

Bush's budget proposal last week provided plenty of surprises for K Street, both good and bad.

Telephone lobbyists are thrilled that Bush wants to repeal the federal excise tax on local telephone service. Alternative-fuels advocates also have lots to crow about in the president's plan to expand research on "green" energy. And airlines are happy that more of the fees used to fund the Federal Aviation Administration would be paid by owners of private planes.

Losers include hospitals, which would get less in Medicare and Medicaid reimbursements; life insurers, which see Bush's proposed lifetime savings accounts as unwelcome competition; and natural gas suppliers, which are disappointed that the president wants to reduce write-offs for their distribution lines.Hires of the Week

After 16 years as chief of staff to Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), Ed Greelegs has joined Kenneth Levine, a veteran Democratic lobbyist, to form Levine & Greelegs, a lobbying firm affiliated with Downey McGrath Group. Durbin is the Senate's second-ranking Democrat.

Dan Shapiro, former deputy chief of staff to Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), was hired by Timmons and Company. Shapiro replaces Joab M. "Joey" Lesesne III, who was hired by the media company Cox Enterprises, a Timmons client, as a vice president in Washington.

Chellie Pingree is stepping down as president of Common Cause after four years to return to her home state of Maine to pursue a possible run for Congress. Executive Vice President Jon Goldin-Dubois will assume Pingree's duties until a permanent successor can be named.

After the Democratic victories in November -- and facing major railway legislation this year -- Union Pacific, America's largest railroad, has named Thomas "Mack" McLarty, who served as President Bill Clinton's chief of staff, to its board of directors. He joins another former White House chief, Andrew H. Card Jr., who served President Bush, and who became a director last summer.

Rove: 2008 Race Is Already Too Much, Too Soon (POL)

By Mike Allen And John Harris

The Politico, February 13, 2007

White House senior adviser Karl Rove says that the 2008 presidential candidates have been pushed into such an early focus on tactics, fundraising and publicity that they risk a backlash from voters long before the first primary ballots are cast.

"I think it is going to mean that people develop a persona earlier and wear out their welcome earlier than they would," he told The Politico in an interview. "I think there's going to come some point this year where people are going to basically be saying: 'I'm largely disinterested in the contest.' "

But Rove doubts that will slow the campaign. "There's going to be so much momentum from everybody feeling like they need to continue to move around the country and do things and to engage each other," he said.

In the wide-ranging half-hour interview in his West Wing office late last week, Rove also remarked on a shift in relations between the administration and Congress since the Democrats gained power.

Click here for The Politico's exclusive interview with Karl Rove "The entire White House is spending a lot more time talking to the Hill and a lot more time seeking feedback and giving them the time that they want," Rove said. He said his own outreach efforts include following up on "a letter to me from a Democrat member" who asked him "to look into a specific issue" that he did not reveal.

"Why this member feels comfortable saying, 'Here's something that I want you to look into,' I can't speak to," Rove said. "But I'm glad that she feels that she can say: 'I'd like you to look into this. I think we can find a way to work together.' "

One of three White House deputy chiefs of staff, Rove is in the unaccustomed position of spectator for a national campaign. Candidates and their aides quietly seek his advice as the reigning GOP strategist, and he is likely to serve as the liaison between the Republican nominee and the White House in the fall of 2008.

During the interview late Friday afternoon, Rove was cheery as ever, teasing his underlings and spooning peanut butter on green apple slices as he spoke clinically about the drubbing Republicans took in November, when they lost the House and Senate.

Since the election, Rove has kept a low public profile but has agreed to a series of speeches that began last night with an appearance at a Lincoln Day Dinner -- a staple for local Republican groups -- in Springfield, Ill. Asked why he's not in the fetal position after a rebuke like the last election, Rove said that when he started in Texas politics, Republicans had 13 of 150 seats in the Texas House. They now have a comfortable majority.

"I am by nature an optimist," he said. "And, look, I know this is an opportunity. I know why we lost. I know we lost the Congress in part because of Iraq, in part because of the sense of entitlement, in part because of the scandals and in part because of beliefs about congressional earmarks and spending.

"I went out there and made speeches about how we've kept discretionary domestic spending underneath inflation, but the average cat out there saw high-profile things about spending that just sunk in," he said. "All those bad things they thought about Washington came back up."

Lamenting the lightning trajectory of the race to succeed his boss, Rove recalled that Bush had a quiet, productive period after his re-election as Texas governor in November 1998 until he started campaigning the following June. Rove said the current contenders may pay a price for being lured into a shooting war four months earlier.

Rove recalled that Bush and his Austin brain trust had the ability to think about the message for a number of months, while this year's candidates are "being driven by the calendar and by the competition to move into the fray earlier -- less prepared, and focused more on the tactical, short-term advantages."

"Is anyone talking about their agenda for America?" Rove asked, noting the possible exception of former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., who has been out of office since 2005.

He added that of necessity, candidates are thinking about fund-raising and giving the impression of aggressiveness as they carve out the niche they hope to occupy. "But as far as saying a lot of really interesting things that are going to be compelling enough and durable enough to serve as the means to get to the nomination, let alone the general election," he continued, "I don't see anybody at that place yet."

Rove added that the early start is "going to mean that people are going to spend, ironically enough, more time raising money, because it's going to give them opportunities to spend more money."

Looking to the immediate political horizon, Rove said Bush is confident that seeking common ground with Democrats will allow him to shape the debate for years to come, and perhaps even score some legislative accomplishments as President Ronald Reagan and others have done when they were lame ducks heading a divided government.

"In one way, things are bad," he said. "We had the majority, and now we don't. On the other hand, that happens with frequency in American politics. What the American people want to know is: Are you going to take the time that you have and turn it to good purpose? Are you going to pick yourself up off of the mat, are you going to go get back into the game, and are you going to do so in a way that gets me to applaud you? If we pick ourselves up off of the mat and get back in the game, as we are, then this'll be a good thing for us."

Rove, a master of the minutiae of political demographics, has singled out four voter groups that he thinks the Republican Party needs to focus on:

Suburbanites: "The heart of our party is married couples with children, but they are also those that are most prone to be mobile in our society and hence less linked into politics."

Younger voters: "That's where you set in motion things that come to pass not in a matter of an election or two, but a matter of a decade or two."

African-Americans: "You can't claim to be a great political party if you're getting 9 or 10 or 11 percent. One of the interesting things about the 2006 election is that we appeared to make gains in the African-American community even while we were losing a national election."

Latinos: "This group is rapidly growing. We do well among them in some elections and not well in others."

Rove has a special interest in the group that demographers call "some college" -- people who, like him, attended college but did not graduate. The concerns of this group dovetail with one of his current policy passions: income distribution and education.

"Income is increasingly correlated to more education," he said. "The challenge for our society is how do we prepare every child to be ready for college if he or she decided to go to college? Our problem today is not that we don't have enough higher education opportunities. It's that we don't have enough people who are prepared to take advantage of it."

by tnproud2b on 02.13.2007 at 12:19 AM

I can say with absolute certainty that after 21 more months of hearing about Obama - even his most die-hard supporters will be sick of him. Folks, practically none of the candidates we're discussing today will make it past the primaries. If history has its way, the candidate with the most money (ie, Hilary) will inevitably be on the presidential ticket. I don't feel old, but apparently I'm old enough to know how these things work. This is politics...you never get things your way.

by LL on 02.12.2007 at 11:48 PM

I think Mr. Rove is probably right, I'm already tiring of hearing them and I haven't even been listening to them. I hope that is not the kind of peanut butter that is loaded with hydrogenated oils he is spooning onto green apple slices.

by urcluless on 02.12.2007 at 11:11 PM

I love it!! Mimi11s' response says it all. He is so good he forces people to make-up reasons to hate him. If he worked for former President Clinton, he would be a political god-send. For some strange reason the historic 2002 elections are ignored??

by glaucon5177 on 02.12.2007 at 10:07 PM

I think Rove makes a good point here. But that point is valid in every race. Its not uncommon that the fighting that takes place during primaries and before primaries can create a bit of fatigue in the public mind. Chuck Schumer points out nicely in his new book on how his own rather unknown status in the democratic primary for senate was beneficial since his two democratic opponents fought one another leaving themselves weak to his novelty to a degree.

But there is a flip side to starting early and I think this is what Rove is missing a bit. As with every election without an incumbent there are more voters up for grabs. Taking the last few years of both parties being in disarray I think this election will have an incredibly high number of on the fence voters. So getting out early is a way to make a first impression quicker. It shores up voters and voters who commit will sway voters who are undecided. Especially with sites integrating blogs and a myspace like atmosphere (at least on my.barackobama.com) candidates have a chance to directly involve voters and keep their attention even after the media come down from their initial orgasms of either positive or negative attention.

I've joined my.barackobama while I'm not committed to the candidate it has given me a chance to blog a bit on his views and argue with some other democratic voters. Its making me involved and involved early and I dare say getting the first impression makes it a candidate's position to lose a vote rather than in the position of having to win it.

Whatever backlash of over media attention I think this latter argument in light of our fast media age makes it pertinent for candidates to campaign early.

When will Beltway journalists like Mike Allen and John Harris stop treating Karl Rove like a political genius?

The so called genius lost the 2000 election and had to get GOP judges on SCOTUS to fix the election for Bush. He squeaked out a win in 2004 running a swift boat smear campaign. He lost the midterms after claiming he had done the math and the election was in the bag.

And yet Beltway journos still treat him like a philosopher king, begging him for scraps of wisdom.

by GGPSmith on 02.12.2007 at 09:17 PM

Karl's just saying that because he still has a day gig to pay attention to, and so he can't play in the 2008 game just yet. Besides, it takes three years to get so overexposed in the media that everyone gets tired of you. Barring martial law, someone will be elected by then. Still, the early contenders run the risk of burning themselves out and increasing their chances of saying (or yelling) something randomly stupid in front of a YouTube fanatic.

Rove: White House And The Hill Are 'Spending A Lot More Time Talking' (POL)

The Politico, February 13, 2007

President Bush once referred to him simply as "the architect," but Karl Rove's actual titles are assistant to the president, deputy chief of staff and senior adviser. Whatever he's called, Rove, 56, has sat at the intersection of politics and policy for George W. Bush ever since Bush began testing the waters for national office as Texas governor. Rove sat down with The Politico's Mike Allen and John F. Harris on Friday afternoon in his West Wing office. Here are excerpts from the conversation.

Q. What's the main point you'll be making in your upcoming series of speeches?

A. Actually, I have three different speeches. I'm giving a Lincoln Day Dinner speech on Monday, coincidentally on Mr. Lincoln's birthday, in Mr. Lincoln's hometown -- Springfield, Illinois. I'll talk about the challenges of a new century, the global challenges to the United States. Then I'm going to give a speech at the School of Communications at Texas State University in San Marcos. I've been asked to talk about the modern American presidency and communications. Then I'm going to speak at the Clinton Presidential Library. My speech is going to be about the institutional debt that presidents owe their predecessors. I'll talk a bit about the kind of institutional changes and structures put in place by presidents whose values were fully realized by presidents who followed them. I'll talk about that with regard to this president and the global war on terror.

Q. Does this president owe a debt to President Clinton?

A. Yes. I'll talk about that. Stay tuned for my very interesting remarks. The National Economic Council is a big part of that. He also made changes to the Domestic Policy Council. If you want to stretch it, it goes back to (Lyndon) Johnson but the reality of it is under (Richard) Nixon. There were also some institutional changes made by Clinton. I'll start with a little bit of (William) McKinley, the first modern American president, according to Lewis Gould, then talk mostly about (Harry) Truman, Nixon and Clinton.

Q. What historical precedents are informing you and President Bush as you study the challenges from the elections?

A. Well, there are lots, because most American presidents governed for some significant part of -- some of them for all of -- their term or terms with Congress controlled by the party of the opposition. How does a president govern with the Congress controlled by the opposite party? The irony is that at first blush, there's a lot of constructive stuff that gets done. It's under divided government that Reagan gets tax reform, the latter half of his term in office. It's under divided government that Clinton gets welfare reform. We got No Child Left Behind passed with a divided Congress.

Q. How do these examples inform your current stance?

A. There's a lot of different models. There is one model where you seek to find common ground. There's another model in which you find accommodation by basically moving dramatically on fundamental principles. You need to give people the benefit of the doubt and basically start off saying: Look, let's try and find ways to work together. And then you need to work like the devil to find ways to work together. We tried to do that in the State of the Union by laying out, in conformity with our principles, things that we felt were constructive that people from both sides of the aisle could find their way to support. Energy, where the message was: Let's set an ambitious goal of reducing gasoline usage by 20 percent in 10 years and relying upon technology to provide alternative fuels and renewal fuels that will get us there. Health care, where we said we want to tackle the issue of the uninsured. Let's start by saying that if you are self-employed or working in a small business where you have to buy health care out of your own pocket, you ought to get the same tax advantage that you get if you're working at a big corporation. Let's put the little man up on the same stage, on a level playing field, with the big guy. You do so by saying: In each instance, you can pay for your health insurance with pre-tax dollars.

Q. Given that you have both divided government and the latter part of a presidency, what are your realistic hopes for what you can accomplish in the next two years?

A. Here's the way I look at it: You need to press your agenda. I'm not certain at the beginning of it that Reagan said, I'm going to be able to get tax reform. I'm not certain that any president is able to say: Look, in the final two years of my second term, I know what I can get. But I think every president understands that one of two things will happen by advocating that agenda. Either the agenda will get adopted, or it will shape the public debate for some long time after they leave office. Government is like, in many respects, a very large seagoing craft where you can't turn it radically. You can't execute an immediate 180-degree turn. Because of that, successors look at the policies, understand them outside the context of an election campaign, re-evaluate them and in many instances adopt them or accept them. One of the big examples was Truman and (Dwight) Eisenhower. I'm going back and rereading, trying to get a better handle on Eisenhower's speeches in the '52 campaign. But in essence, in the years leading up to '52 -- both in Korea and outside of Korea, starting with the Long Telegram and maybe even before the Long

Telegram -- Truman begins to develop an approach to the emerging Cold War. At least in one instance, Korea, it looks Eisenhower may not be in agreement with it. But after he gets into office, either because the burdens of the campaign are now gone or he re-evaluates it, he in essence adopts the policy of containment and adopts the policy of accepting a stalemate on the Peninsula, which bought breathing time for market democracy to create this economic powerhouse in the south.

Q. What are you doing differently in your job, substantively or stylistically, in 2007 compared with 2006, before the election?

A. The entire White House is spending a lot more time talking to the Hill and a lot more time seeking feedback and giving them the time that they want. It's not that they didn't want to talk to us before. But I think there's a desire for them to talk to us more now. I think they want to be able to test whether or not we're serious about working together by spending more time talking about whether or not we're going to work together. A lot of that is done by other people, but the entire White House finds itself in a place where we're supporting that process more than we might have in the past. I have, sitting on my desk, a letter to me from a Democrat member asking me to look into a specific issue. Why this member feels comfortable saying, Here's something that I want you to look into, I can't speak to. But I'm glad that she feels that she can say: "I'd like you to look into this. I think we can find a way to work together. I'm having a dialogue with common interlocutors. You can ascertain from them that I'm serious about this. Let's see if we can't work together on this issue."

Q. What are some of the ways this president has changed governing and campaigning?

A. I think it's going to be difficult for a presidential candidate not to run with a pretty concrete vision. It's not going to be enough merely to tear down if you're a Democrat, the incumbent administration, or if you're a Democrat or Republican, to tear down your opponent. The model is going to be: What is it that you are going to do? I think what we were held to in 2000, which we realized -- we're not responsible for it, the press is -- people wanted to know: Did it all add up? I remember the endless discussions we had with the economic experts and the budget experts about how much did things cost. I remember lots of discussions with each of our policy groups, some of which were represented in work on speeches, about what did those things mean and how did they work. It's not us, but I suspect the thing that we dealt with, and dealt with effectively in '00 and '04, is going to be demanded of other candidates. I do think there's going to be a greater emphasis upon the grass-roots nature of politics -- that is to say, a slight rebalancing. We rebalanced it. It used to be that all you really cared about was how much money did you spend on television.One visible thing that we have done for the last six years, particularly in the aftermath of the 2000 campaign, is putting a strong emphasis upon all the tools of the so-called 72-hour approach -- micro-targeting. It's got the least descriptive name of anything in politics. The 72-Hour Task Force says you use tools available to you in the computer age to identify people who are less likely to participate and are persuadable, and you focus all of your volunteer efforts on talking to that vast number of people in order to make certain that they are registered to vote, that they're persuaded to support your candidate and that they're then motivated to get out to vote.

Long A Target Over Faulty Iraq Intelligence, Ex-C.I.A. Chief Prepares To Return Fire (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Julie Bosman

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 _ — For the past two years, George J. Tenet has maintained a determined silence even as senior White House officials have laid the blame for the prewar mistakes about Saddam Hussein on him. But now Mr. Tenet, the nation's former spy chief, is preparing to return fire.

Mr. Tenet was awarded a Presidential Medal of Freedom at a grand White House ceremony in December 2004, after stepping down as director of central intelligence, only to have Vice President Dick Cheney appear on "Meet the Press" 21 months later and pin the mistake about the Iraq intelligence squarely on him.

Now, as he races to complete a memoir due out this spring, the talk in Washington has turned to how Mr. Tenet, known for fierce loyalty and political survival instincts that enabled him to weather both Democratic and Republican administrations, will use the book to juggle a host of agendas: polishing his legacy, settling scores and explaining just what he meant when he said it was a "slam dunk" that Mr. Hussein had unconventional weapons.

Of course, Mr. Tenet must finish the book first, which has proved to be something of challenge. The book was supposed to hit shelves last week, but Mr. Tenet was still writing as late as last month. The book has also undergone a slow vetting process at the White House and the C.I.A., which reviewed it to ensure it did not contain classified information.

Friends and former colleagues of Mr. Tenet note that he built his career by making more friends than enemies, and they say he is unlikely to use his book to pick new fights. But some of president Bush's top aides with whom Mr. Tenet clashed in the past, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, are said to be targets of criticism.

"George is a born politician and he wants everyone to love him, but in order to sell books he's going to have to throw somebody out of the lifeboat," said a former colleague of Mr. Tenet at the C.I.A., one of several people interviewed for this article who requested anonymity because they did not want to speak on the record until the book was published.

Mr. Tenet is not expected to take on Mr. Bush, with whom he developed a close bond during early morning intelligence briefings in the Oval Office. But Mr. Tenet's friends said he had been surprised when Mr. Cheney and Ms. Rice, appearing on Sunday talk shows last September, fingered him in justifying Mr. Bush's decision to go to war with Iraq.

In the interview on "Meet the Press," Mr. Cheney said: "George Tenet sat in the Oval Office and the president of the United States asked him directly, he said, 'George, how good is the case against Saddam on weapons of mass destruction?' The director of the C.I.A. said, 'It's a slam dunk, Mr. President, it's a slam dunk.' "

Mr. Cheney added, "That was the intelligence that was provided to us at the time, and based upon which we made a choice."

Promotional materials for the book promise that Mr. Tenet will give the "real context" for that episode.

One person who has read early drafts of the book said Mr. Tenet defended himself by carefully parsing the "slam dunk" comment: he said he was not telling Mr. Bush that there was rock-solid evidence that Mr. Hussein had chemical and biological weapons, only that the president could make a "slam dunk" case to the American public about these weapons programs.

David L. Boren, the former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee and a longtime friend of Mr. Tenet, said it was Mr. Tenet's friends and former C.I.A. colleagues who urged him to write a book to balance the record.

Mr. Boren said that in the weeks before the Iraq war, he warned Mr. Tenet that since he was not a member of Mr. Bush's closest circle of advisers, the White House would make him the scapegoat if things went badly in Iraq.

"I told him they had your name circled if anything goes wrong," recalled Mr. Boren, who is now president of the University of Oklahoma.

Tina Andreadis, a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, declined to discuss the book in detail. People who have read parts of the manuscript said it would span Mr. Tenet's career at the C.I.A., with a particular focus on the agency's warnings about Al Qaeda and operations in Afghanistan after the Sept. 11 attacks.

One publisher who met with Mr. Tenet to discuss publishing the book said he had vowed to defend the assessments of C.I.A. analysts about Iraq.

"He wanted everybody to know that he felt the portrayal was inaccurate," the publisher said. "He defended the agency. He was very emotional. This was not a mea culpa."

Mr. Tenet has been applauded for sounding an early alarm about the threat from Osama bin Laden and his network. Yet his exchanges with the Sept. 11 commission left some commission staff members puzzled about his recollection of details of certain crucial decisions.

"He has a lot to be proud of and a lot he will want to explain," said Philip D. Zelikow, who was executive director of the Sept. 11 commission and more recently a counselor to Ms. Rice. "If he felt that he was constrained in his ability to tell the full story when he was a member of the Clinton or Bush administrations, then people like me should wait patiently and read what he has to say now before offering further judgments."

According to HarperCollins's original news release for the book: "Tenet will offer a gripping narration of the run-up to the war in Iraq. Saddam Hussein's Iraq was an unusual foe: Never before had a rogue nation tried so hard to convince the world that it had WMD."

A string of carefully planned news media appearances to promote the book has been in place for months. HarperCollins has decided to release it on a Monday, rather than a Tuesday, when most books are released, to coincide with a scheduled Sunday evening appearance by Mr. Tenet on "60 Minutes" on CBS.

The Crown Publishing Group first signed a book contract with Mr. Tenet in December 2004 for a reported $4 million, but the contract was dissolved a few months later when Mr. Tenet hedged on a delivery date.

The publisher who met with Mr. Tenet said he had spoken extensively about the toll that the Iraq war had taken on his family, particularly on his son, who was "teased mercilessly" at school. "Other kids would yell, 'Your dad's a murderer!' and that kind of thing," the publisher recalled him saying.

For Mr. Tenet, the downside of waiting so long to emerge with his own account is that other books by journalists and former officials have already shaped public opinion about his role in the Iraq war, and some of Mr. Tenet's friends fear that his account may be arriving too late.

Other allies said that while his book would give a fresh perspective, it would still be one account among many competing interpretations of the events of the past five years.

"Because of the nature of intelligence work, you can never totally set the record straight," said former Senator Bob Kerrey, a member of the Sept. 11 commission who has known Mr. Tenet since the two worked together on the Senate Intelligence Committee. "The record is always going to be a little bit murky."

Judd Gregg: Point Man Or Hit Man? (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0131642

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 13, 2007

With an unofficial seat at the Senate Republican leadership table, it's no accident that Sen. Judd Gregg (N.H.) has been at the center of nearly every major floor fight this Congress.

In fact, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) voiced his frustration with Gregg last week, noting that the three-term New Hampshire Republican seemed to be "the designated 'see-if-we-can-mess-up-the-legislation' guy this year."

Reid likened Gregg to "somebody who comes into a basketball game, not to score points, just to kind of rough people up, just to kind of get the game going in a different direction."

In response, Gregg said on the floor, "I appreciate the Senator's comments. I take them as a compliment. I have been active legislatively. That is, obviously, our job."

While more junior Republicans have independently mounted floor fights that won praise from their leadership, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has been regularly turning to Gregg to help him find ways to tie the Democratic majority in knots.

"He's arguably our best sort of idea guy," McConnell said in an interview Friday. "I rely on him heavily. He's a major player in the Senate whether he sits at the leadership table or not."

But Gregg does sit at the leadership table, because McConnell has asked him, along with Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), to join the weekly Republican leadership meeting as an informal "senior adviser."

Gregg said he acts as a "freelance idea person" in leadership meetings at McConnell's request.

Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said Gregg brings to the table previous leadership experience as Chief Deputy Whip under both Lott and former Senate Republican Whip Don Nickles (Okla.). But that position does not require election by the Senate Republican Conference.

"I've always wondered why he didn't run for a leadership position," said Lott, who speculated that Gregg would find it too "restrictive."

No matter how he got to the table, Gregg's ideas appear to carry a lot of weight with McConnell, who has twice in the past month and a half drawn the proverbial line in the sand over Republicans' right to have a vote on a Gregg proposal.

"I think of him not as the guy sent into the game to kind of rough people up," said McConnell. "He's the smart-guy point guard, the one who's good at ideas that will benefit the overall team."

Gregg's proposals also have won the broad support of his GOP colleagues, who have stood with him and McConnell on tough votes that have not always played well in the media but have established the new Republican minority as a force to be reckoned with.

One Senate Republican aide said Gregg's ideas have been well-received because, "He's viewed as a thinker. ... He's definitely known for being stubborn, usually with good reason."

Gregg said he thinks his ideas have caught fire with his colleagues because, "Most of the issues I tend to push are things I think are at the essence of Republican governance."

A good example of that was Gregg's ultimately successful attempt to get a vote on an amendment designed to give the president line-item rescission authority over earmarks in spending bills.

Lott said Democrats opened up debate about the abuse of earmarks in spending bills during consideration of a lobbying and ethics bill in early January and then tried to prevent Gregg from getting a vote on his proposal by claiming it was not germane.

Lott said Gregg pleaded his case to the entire Republican Conference and the majority agreed that it was reasonable to band together to try to force Democrats to vote on the amendment. While the proposal was defeated, Republicans did secure an agreement to have a vote on the line-item plan during debate on a bill to increase the minimum wage.

While the line-item rescission amendment rose to the top through an organic process, Lott said Republicans made a more calculated decision last week when they insisted that the Senate vote on Gregg's nonbinding resolution in support of U.S. troops as a foil for the Democrats' preferred resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"That was a situation where sometimes he's asked to put on his thinking cap and come up with ideas," Lott said.

McConnell said Reid's insistence that Republicans get only one vote on an alternate Iraq resolution spurred more interest in Gregg's bill.

"All of our Senators agreed that if we were only to have one amendment, that that summed up where we were," McConnell said.

Indeed, Gregg's proposal supplanted a popular resolution by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would have refrained from criticizing the president but set benchmarks for success in Iraq.

Gregg said the Senate Republican Conference's decision to rally around his resolution "was sort of a surprise to me. I didn't expect it to become such a cause celebre."

And even though Republicans were roundly criticized in the media — and by Democrats — for derailing debate on the nonbinding Iraq War resolution, Republicans say they have no "buyer's remorse" about standing by Gregg and blocking the Senate from bringing debate on the resolution to a close.

"The deck was stacked against us," said the Senate Republican aide. "There's no way in hell that the liberal media was going to paint us as anything but obstructionist."

While Republicans may have lost the public relations battle on the Iraq debate, Democrats acknowledged Gregg's savvy use of Senate rules.

Said one Democratic leadership aide, "We don't know if this is a unique set of circumstances or if this is going to continue."

A Star-Quality Pal for the Ex-Prez

More insight into the surprising friendship between George H.W. Bush and Teri Hatcher: She baked oatmeal cookies for the Bush family during a Kennebunkport, Maine, visit! He taught her daughter how to ride a Segway! They've gone fishing and golfing together!

Those details came to us in e-mails the "Desperate Housewives" star sent yesterday in response to our colleague Korin Miller's inquiries about Hatcher's chummy Los Angeles lunch last week with the former prez, captured by leering paparazzi. Miller reported Saturday that the two have been pals since meeting at a gala in Las Vegas a few years ago. Hatcher responded late but in great detail, seemingly concerned that someone might interpret this all, you know, the wrong way.

Hatcher, a "registered independent," wrote that she befriended Bush 41 -- and his wife, Barbara, mind you! -- in "hope of being involved in their many charities," praising his work on disaster relief and other causes. "He is wonderful to my family but more importantly I believe at this time in his life the most important thing for he and Mrs. Bush is to be involved in giving back to the world . . . and I am proud to be a part of that."

As for the friendly peck on the cheek and pat goodbye captured on video: "There was nothing inappropriate. . . . We all had a good laugh about it."Some Loaded Comments at 'Abu Ghraib' Screening

When the lights go up after most documentary screenings, you usually can expect a politely snoozy lovefest at the "panel discussion to follow." So the folks who turned out for the preview of HBO's "Ghosts of Abu Ghraib" at the Ronald Reagan Building last night were unusually lucky.

Among the VIPs on hand to discuss the Rory Kennedy project (set to air Feb. 22) were Uncle Ted Kennedy and Sen. Lindsey Graham. The latter livened things up in a big way when he denounced Army Col. Janis Karpinski, who was demoted from brigadier general after the prison torture scandal.

"Karpinski should have been court-martialed," said the South Carolina Republican, who sits on the Armed Services Committee. "She was not a good commander."

Awkward! For who was in the audience but Karpinski herself. "I consider you as cowardly as [Lt. Gen. Ricardo] Sanchez or [Donald] Rumsfeld or [former Guantanamo Bay commander Geoffrey] Miller," she shot back. "You're saying I should be court-martialed -- they didn't want me in a courtroom because I would tell" the truth. Graham sputtered clumsily until moderator Jeffrey Toobin jumped in.

Afterward, Karpinski told our colleague Michael Cavna: "Ninety-nine percent of the story is still covered up. . . . Miller and Sanchez and Rumsfeld should be in those cells" with the Army guards who were found guilty.Chew Confessions! The First Lady Spills the Beans

Laura Bush sat down to dish with cook/talk-show host Rachael Ray on yesterday's program. A few crumbs:

Â· The first lady admitted she loves to cook but hasn't been in the kitchen for years. (She brought carrot muffins made by White House chef Cris Comerford.) Instead, she reads cookbooks and watches cooking shows "a lot."

Â· Jenna and Barbara rarely eat meat, like fish and vegetables, and love beans -- especially Cuban black beans and pinto beans.

Â· She just finished reading "The Glass Castle," a memoir by gossip columnist Jeannette Walls of her dysfunctional childhood (alcoholic father, neglectful mother), which she got from her mother-in-law and then passed it on to Sheila Martin, wife of Canada's former prime minister.

Â· The president: "Not very good" at remembering Valentine's Day, so the White House florist always sends up flowers; he signs the card. Last year, one of the gardeners fashioned a heart topiary. "But, of course, the president didn't think of it, the gardener did," she told the audience. Busted!HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· A fellow who certainly looked like LL Cool J having an early dinner and signing autographs at Chadwick's in Georgetown Saturday evening. "He was everything you wanted him to be," sighed one star-struck diner -- black Yankees cap, huge diamond-stud earrings and a fur-trimmed coat over arms the diameter of his platinum records, and he told restaurant staff he was Cool James himself. But a publicist denied that the veteran rapper was in D.C. A colleague of ours, who happened to be interviewing the star by phone yesterday, asked. He sort of denied it and laughed; she asked again, and he noted that he has family here and said, "Well, I'll let you decide."

OTHER NEWS:

'I'm Doing Fine,' President Tells Worried Father (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

As the House gets ready to begin debating the Iraq war today, President Bush has a piece of advice for his father: Turn off the television.

It seems that former president George H.W. Bush has been getting agitated watching all the attacks on his son -- so much so that the current president said yesterday that he is worried for his father's well-being.

"I am actually more concerned about him than I have ever been in my life, because he's paying too much attention to the news," the president told C-SPAN in an interview to be broadcast this morning. "And I understand how difficult it is for a person who loves somebody to see them out in the political process and to kind of endure the criticism. My answer to him is: 'Look, don't pay attention to it. I'm doing fine.' "

That is advice he apparently intends to follow himself. Bush has no plans to watch the House debate his decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"You know, I've got a full day," he said. "I mean, it's not as if the world stops when the Congress does their duty."

Besides, he added: "I already know what the debate is. I hear a lot of opinions."

Bush's comments were not the first hint at frustration inside the Bush family over his political troubles. After the November elections, which ousted Republican majorities from both houses of Congress, the elder Bush bristled at those disparaging his son. At a conference in the United Arab Emirates, he responded to Arab critics. "When your son's under attack, it hurts," he said. "You're determined to be at his side and help him any way you possibly can."

The president's travails may have brought father and son closer in some ways. In the interview yesterday, the younger Bush said he thinks his father is underestimated. Bush has identified politically more often with Ronald Reagan and Harry S. Truman. But he offered the 41st president as his first example when asked by C-SPAN's Steve Scully who is the most underrated president.

"Well, George H.W. Bush is one of them," the 43rd president said. "He followed President Reagan, who was such a really strong president that people have yet to take a look at my dad."

Beltway Support Could Boost Romney (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

— Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor who had a limited national profile just a few years ago, is matching the better-known Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) step-for-step in the race to round up support from an important audience: members of Congress and Washington lobbyists.

Call it the "insider primary."

Today, as Romney formally launches his bid for the White House with a speech in Michigan, what might have been a longshot campaign can boast that many influential GOP lawmakers and lobbyists have judged him best able to go the distance.

More members of Congress have announced support for Romney than for McCain: 26, including former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

And though some Washington hands backing Romney are not household names, they include luminaries of key Republican constituencies, such as former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.), revered by economic conservatives and antiabortion activists; Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), his chamber's standard bearer for gun-rights advocates; and John J. Castellani, a Beltway lobbying powerhouse with ties to the top echelons of American business.

The support of these insiders has positioned Romney to raise money and build a campaign organization in the early-voting primary states. It says much about the problems facing McCain, who despite a national profile is finding challenges in building the impression that his victory in the GOP primary is inevitable.

Where Romney is a relative newcomer to national politics after one term as Massachusetts governor, McCain is a 20-year Senate veteran and war hero already tested in a presidential campaign. But McCain's style and frequent departures from party orthodoxy, on such issues as campaign finance to tax cuts, have alienated many party colleagues in Congress.

"He's hurt himself with the Republican rank and file," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who is leaning toward supporting Romney and who invited the former governor to speak to a group of House Republicans in January. Many times, "McCain is the spoiler on legislation. House members have gotten tired of it over the last six years."

Polls show that Romney is running a distant third among GOP presidential hopefuls, behind McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, and that the vast majority of Americans do not know enough about him to form an opinion. Romney's Washington endorsements, coming from lawmakers and lobbyists whose own political clout depends on backing a winning candidate, may help confer legitimacy on his campaign.

With many Republicans doubtful that Giuliani can win the party's nomination because of his relatively liberal stands on social issues, Romney is trying to establish himself as the strongest alternative to McCain. Like Giuliani, Romney in the past had endorsed abortion rights and gay rights.

But he now is aggressively repositioning himself as a conservative on those issues, and is courting conservative lawmakers — as well as evangelical and social conservative leaders — who can validate his transformation.

Romney's effort is also paying off in help in fundraising and field organizing in key states. For example, he has secured the endorsement of popular Republican Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina, an early primary state; the other senator from the state, Lindsey Graham, is backing McCain.

McCain is concerned enough about being seen as defeated in congressional endorsements that he touts his own list of 21 backers.

"He enjoys a lot of support in both chambers," McCain spokesman Danny Diaz said. "We're going to continue to reach out to elected officials across the country."

Endorsement dynamics are akin to schoolchildren choosing teams: Some influential people are on everyone's wish list.

Weber, a Republican lobbyist, is one of those first-round picks. He is a respected political strategist with close ties to the White House and Congress. (He served on Capitol Hill from 1981 to 1993.)

Weber supported McCain in 2000, but Romney pursued Weber's support assiduously. In one-on-one meetings in Washington and Boston, Romney impressed Weber with his command of major policy issues, such as energy and healthcare. Weber eventually decided to back Romney, in part because he believed the message of the 2006 election was that voters were disillusioned with Washington insiders.

"The Republican Party badly needs a face from outside Washington," Weber said.

His endorsement also provides a window into how Romney is managing to win support from social conservatives — Weber strongly opposes abortion — though he has not always sided with them.

Weber said that in talking to Romney, he was persuaded the former governor had undergone a conversion as authentic and durable as that of Ronald Reagan, who did not declare his opposition to abortion until he ran for president in 1975.

Benjamin Ginsberg, a Republican election law expert who has counseled presidential candidates and party organizations for decades, was another backer sought by the major GOP campaigns. After reviewing the candidates, he chose Romney. Ginsberg's endorsement provides a stamp of GOP tradition, power and competence, particularly in the fundraising area.

Another Romney backer, Castellani is president of the Business Roundtable, an organization of chief executives of the top U.S. corporations. He is considered among the half a dozen or so most influential lobbyists in Washington, with experience in raising money, organizing issue campaigns and getting business engaged in national politics.

In a measure of what Washington insiders can do for a candidate, lobbyist Ron Kaufman and other Romney backers arranged a fundraiser for his political action committee in October. The $100-a-head event drew a crowd of 400, large enough that the fire marshal almost closed it down. Kaufman and a host committee of 21 lobbyists are now planning a $2,300-a-head fundraiser for Feb. 27 in Washington.

Romney moved to expand his lobbying-community reach in mid-January, inviting a group of K Street figures to a meet-and-greet breakfast. Among his catches: Jade West, a lobbyist for the National Assn. of Wholesaler-Distributors, a leading trade group representing nearly 40,000 companies. West, a former Senate GOP leadership aide, has promised to use her ties to build support for Romney on Capitol Hill.

The House is a target-rich environment for Romney because it is a conservative bastion home to many Republicans who dislike McCain. The Arizona senator has infuriated GOP colleagues with his failure to support Bush's tax cuts in 2001 and 2003; his support for an immigration plan that would allow illegal immigrants a path to citizenship; and his signature campaign finance law, which many Republicans believe put their party at a disadvantage in 2006. During debate on the bill in 2002, McCain insulted many colleagues by saying the existing campaign system corrupted everyone in it.

"When he said we're all corrupt, I said, 'Speak for yourself,' "said Rep. Howard "Buck" McKeon (R-Santa Clarita), a Romney backer. "It would be tough for him to work with members of Congress on the things the president has to work on."

People close to Hastert were surprised that he endorsed Romney so early. But they were not surprised that he turned his back on McCain. Hastert and McCain had a bitter public spat a few years ago in which Hastert questioned the senator's credentials as a Republican.

To David Norcross, a lobbyist and one of New Jersey's representatives to the Republican National Committee, the early endorsements have established the validity of Romney's candidacy.

"Early on, there are questions about whether a candidate is real," Norcross said. "This list lays that question to rest."

McCain, Romney Vying For Support Of Conservatives (WP)

By Alan Cooperman And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

As a former Iowa state Republican chairman, head of Iowa Right to Life and political director of Rep. Jim Nussle's losing gubernatorial campaign, Marlys Popma is an experienced political operative as well as an evangelical Christian.

So when the phone calls started from Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, Republican presidential candidates eager for her help in the crucial Iowa caucuses next year, she knew this was not an election she could sit out. "You're never going to find the perfect candidate," she said.

For many social conservatives, that is an understatement. Twelve years ago, Romney said he would be a more effective proponent of gay rights than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.); seven years ago, McCain said the Republican Party had no place for "agents of intolerance" such as Jerry Falwell.

Popma, however, felt she had to make a choice, and it was McCain.

For McCain, it was a hard-won endorsement in a fierce competition with Romney to exploit the absence of an obvious social conservative front-runner in the Republican race. Both candidates are working hard to line up key supporters such as Popma, and much to the distress of former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee and Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.), candidates with stronger ties to party conservatives, they are succeeding.

"Winability is a bigger issue in this campaign because of the Darth Vader-like specter of a Hillary Clinton presidency," according to the Rev. Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's policy arm. Evangelicals "want the most socially conservative candidate they can find, who can win," he added.

Romney, who is expected to formally enter the presidential race today in Dearborn, Mich., has been particularly aggressive. In October he held a casual gathering at his Boston home for a who's who of social conservative leaders. Falwell and evangelist Franklin Graham munched on sandwiches and sipped soup alongside former presidential candidate Gary Bauer and pastor Richard Lee of First Redeemer Church in Atlanta.

Romney will also host a private reception for Christian radio and television hosts during the National Religious Broadcasters' annual meeting next week in Orlando, and he is expected to be the commencement speaker at the Rev. Pat Robertson's Regent University in May.

Not to be outdone, McCain will be feted by Falwell at a reception at the religious broadcasters' convention, the latest sign of detente between onetime adversaries. Last May, McCain delivered the commencement address at Falwell's Liberty University.

McCain and Romney have also done significant spadework to recruit well-regarded social conservative operatives to their cause. McCain has inked Marlene Elwell, who oversaw Robertson's 1988 presidential campaign in Michigan, and Judy Haynes, a former senior official in the Christian Coalition. Romney's team includes Gary Marx, a former head of the Virginia Christian Coalition who was the day-to-day coordinator of evangelical support for President Bush's reelection campaign.

But McCain and Romney have significant hurdles to overcome if they are to win the support of conservative Christians, who by one estimate make up a quarter of the electorate and at least 40 percent of the Republican base.

McCain has backed expanded stem cell research, blocked the "nuclear option" that would have allowed the Senate to hold up-or-down votes on the appointment of judges, and sponsored campaign finance legislation the Christian political community loathes because of its restrictions on election-related activity by grass-roots groups.

In endorsing McCain, Popma said she had her own checklist that he satisfied: The candidate had to be against abortion, in favor of defining marriage as between a man and a woman, and committed to appointing conservative judges to the federal bench. "This man is a social conservative," she said, "and he is the leading social conservative in the race who is consistent."

But James Dobson, founder of the Christian broadcasting powerhouse Focus on the Family, is not convinced. He told a Dallas radio station last month he prays that evangelicals will not "get stuck with" McCain as the Republican nominee. "Speaking as a private individual, I would not vote for John McCain under any circumstances," Dobson said.

Romney faces a dual challenge in wooing social conservatives. First, he is Mormon -- a religion many evangelical voters view skeptically. Second, during his campaigns for the Senate in 1994 and for governor in 2002, he expressed support for abortion rights and gay rights, positions he has reversed since it became clear he would pursue the presidency in 2008.

According to several attendees of Romney's luncheon last fall, his Mormonism was not a major problem for the evangelicals in his den. What the assembled evangelicals really wanted to know, and what they mostly focused on, was whether Romney's recent stance against abortion is sincere, said Jay Sekulow, director of the American Center for Law and Justice, which frequently represents conservative Christians in church-state cases.

Romney told them he changed his mind about abortion during the debate over embryonic stem cell research, and he recounted a discussion with stem cell experts from Harvard in which he was offended by the casual, clinical way in which they spoke about the destruction of fetuses.

"He said it just hit him, suddenly and powerfully, that we are dealing with life," said Sekulow, who decided at the lunch to back Romney's campaign. "Some say this is flip-flopping. It's not. He just flipped. . . . I think it's from the heart."

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, a Texas-based Baptist preacher, is more skeptical. Scarborough, who runs the conservative advocacy group Vision America, was invited to the luncheon at Romney's house but used a scheduling conflict as an excuse not to attend. "I'm not prepared to get too terribly close right now, because I want to wait and see what the nature of Mitt Romney's conversion to social conservative issues is," Scarborough said.

In light of that skepticism, the Huckabee and Brownback campaigns hope they can overcome the perception that they cannot win, arguing that "we're viable if you make us viable," according to Land, the Southern Baptist leader.

Amid the near-constant pitches for support by the aspiring presidential candidates, some social conservatives are urging peers to refrain from any choice.

Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Christian Alliance, said he has been approached by several campaigns but has chosen to stay out of the endorsement game for now.

"Anytime you side with a candidate and work for them, you alienate people and you are not able to talk about the issues as much as you would like," Scheffler said.

Jewish Group Blasts Romney Over Launch (AP)

By Joan Lowy

AP, February 13, 2007

Republican Mitt Romney's choice of a museum honoring auto pioneer Henry Ford as the site of his presidential announcement was strongly criticized Monday by Jewish Democrats, who noted Ford's history of anti-Semitism.

The former Massachusetts governor, who is scheduled to formally launch his presidential candidacy from the Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn, Mich., on Tuesday, was taken to task by The National Jewish Democratic Council.

The council "is deeply troubled by Governor Romney's choice of locations to announce his presidential campaign," executive director Ira Forman said in a statement.

"Romney has been traveling the country talking about inclusiveness and understanding of people from all walks of life," Forman said. "Yet he chooses to kick (off) his presidential campaign on the former estate of a well-known and outspoken anti-Semite and xenophobe."

Forman said Romney's "embrace of Henry Ford and association of Ford's legacy with his presidential campaign raises serious questions about either the sincerity of Romney's words or his understanding of basic American history."

Ford was bestowed with the Grand Service Cross of the Supreme Order of the German Eagle by Adolf Hitler.

Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Romney, said the candidate will go ahead with his announcement as planned.

"Governor Romney believes our country needs to put innovation at the forefront if we are to ensure a stronger, safer and more prosperous America," Fehrnstrom said. "The Ford Museum embodies that bold, innovative spirit."

Fehrnstrom noted that other political leaders have praised Ford in the past. He cited a 1999 speech on small business development in which former President Clinton quoted Ford and praised the "power of enterprise and the strength of the human spirit" of American entrepreneurs.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Tom Vilsack will seek to cancel out his campaign's contribution to global warming through investments in "clean" energy.

The campaign will monitor its so-called carbon footprint — the carbon dioxide created by his travels, energy use at his offices and other activities, said communications director Josh Earnest. Carbon dioxide is one of the greenhouse gases blamed for rising earth temperatures.

To offset that carbon dioxide production, the campaign will pay a Vermont company, Native Energy, that invests in renewable fuels such as wind power, Earnest said. The campaign will also invite donors to contribute specifically to offset those costs.

Vilsack planned to announce the initiative during a speech on energy policy in San Francisco on Tuesday. "He will pledge to make his presidential campaign the first presidential campaign in history to be carbon-neutral," Earnest said.

"No question that this is one of the, if not the most important issue in this presidential campaign," Earnest said. "It affects national security, the economy, even the health care system."

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Key New York political leaders indicated Monday that they favor moving the state's presidential primary up a month to Feb. 5 — a shift that could help the 2008 campaigns of Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican Rudy Giuliani.

It "would be the right thing for the state," an aide to the Legislature's top Democrat said.

A top aide to the Legislature's most powerful Republican said making such a shift was also on the GOP's radar screen.

Several other big states, including California, are already considering shifting their primaries to Feb. 5. Such a move could create a new Super Tuesday showdown just days after the first-in-the-nation Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary and the follow-up South Carolina primary.

"The speaker is favorably inclined to move the date. He thinks it would be the right thing for the state and will be speaking to the governor about doing it," said Charles Carrier, a spokesman for state Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver, a Manhattan Democrat and key backer of Clinton's bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination.

New Democratic Gov. Eliot Spitzer had no immediate comment Monday about the plan, first reported in Monday's editions of the New York Post.

"It's something we're taking a look at," said John McArdle, a spokesman for Joseph Bruno, the state Senate's Republican majority leader. Bruno has close ties to both Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, and to Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican who polls show is Giuliani's main competition for the GOP presidential nomination.

In Alabama, Republicans and Democrats are trying to move up the date of the state's presidential primary from Feb. 5 to Feb. 2, 2008, which would avoid a conflict with a Mardi Gras holiday. Party leaders said Monday they are working on legislation to move the primary.

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — Former South Carolina first lady Iris Campbell and one of her two sons have signed onto Republican Mike Huckabee's presidential campaign.

Iris Campbell was widowed in 2005 when former Gov. Carroll Campbell died after a public battle with Alzheimer's disease. The former governor, who served two terms from 1987 to 1995, is credited with making the Republican Party a powerful force in South Carolina, and Iris Campbell remains influential throughout the state.

"I think that if Carroll were here, he'd do the same," Iris Campbell said.

Her son, Mike Campbell, who ran unsuccessfully last year for lieutenant governor's office, was tapped to run the former Arkansas governor's South Carolina campaign as a senior national adviser.

Will Mormon Faith Hurt Bid For White House? (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 13, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY — It's easy to find Mormons who have run into misconceptions about their faith. Take Jeff Hartley, executive director of the Republican Party in Utah, a state that's 70% Mormon. "I only have one mom. I only have one wife," he says. "That's not the understanding that a lot of people have."

The emergence of former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, a Mormon waging a strong campaign for the GOP presidential nomination, spotlights a religion often viewed as odd despite its rapid growth and attempts to go mainstream. Hartley and others say they welcome the scrutiny. For Romney, set to announce his candidacy today, it may be less than a blessing.

In a diverse 2008 presidential field that includes a woman and an African-American on the Democratic side, polls show being Mormon is a handicap. In a new USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, 72% say they would vote for a qualified nominee who is Mormon. That compares with 94% for a black nominee and 88% for a female nominee.

POLL RESULTS: Is race, sex or religion a factor?

In 1960, John F. Kennedy gave a major speech to ease fears about his Catholicism. Joe Lieberman shed light on Orthodox Judaism in 2000 during his vice presidential campaign.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS), the official name of the Mormon church, has an unusual theology and a past scarred by racism and polygamy. A national political race that conveys its focus on family life and traditional values could improve its image.

"The more people learn about the Mormon faith and culture, the more comfortable they will be," Hartley says. He and others say the same is true for Romney. "A lot of concerns are dispelled once people actually get to know him and his capabilities," says LaVarr Webb, a Mormon and GOP consultant here who plans to donate money to Romney.

There are nearly 6 million Mormons in the USA. Among them are politicians such as Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate majority leader; Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, who ran for president in 1999; and Romney's late father, George, a Michigan governor and 1968 presidential candidate.

With his Harvard degrees, his success in business, politics, fundraising and as CEO of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, Romney draws a new level of attention to his faith. "It's a floodlight," says political scientist David Magleby, a Mormon and a dean at Brigham Young University in Provo.

Mormons got a taste of intense publicity during the Olympics. "We had literally hundreds of sports reporters writing about theology," LDS spokesman Michael Otterson says wryly. The coverage brought some changes in perception, he says, but they were incremental. "You don't change riveted prejudices overnight," he says.

America's political religion

Romney says it is not his job as a presidential candidate to educate people about his church. "I'm running for a secular position," he said in an interview. "I subscribe to what Abraham Lincoln called America's political religion. The Constitution and the rule of law are the highest promises I would make in taking the oath of office."

Willard Mitt Romney grew up in a Mormon family in Michigan. He met his future girlfriend and wife, Ann Davies, in elementary school.

At 19, after a year at Stanford, Romney began the mission required of Mormon men. He was sent to France to help manage church affairs, work with young people and try to win converts. "It's a very Catholic country, and successes are few and far between," he says, "but I made a number of very good friends."

Romney did have some success at home. While he was gone, Ann started college at church-run BYU. She was "officially Episcopalian," Romney says, but wanted to learn about his church and ended up joining it. On his return from France, Romney enrolled at BYU.

The pair married in 1969, when he was 21 and she was 19, and had five sons over the next dozen years. Ann Romney serves on community service boards, including the New England chapter of the MS Society. She was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis in 1999.

The ex-governor says questions about his faith are fair to ask. Some queries he answers directly. "I don't drink alcohol, I don't smoke, I don't drink coffee or tea. I also do a tithe," he says, meaning he donates 10% of his income to the church. All are church requirements.

Romney responds more generally when asked if he has participated in an endowment ceremony, in which men and women take vows of secrecy about temple rites and of obedience to the Lord, and begin the daily practice of wearing a sacred "temple garment" resembling abbreviated long underwear.

"I do attend the temple of my church … and people can learn about that by contacting the church," he says, adding: "I'm sure on the Internet you can find every single aspect of what's entailed."

'A Mormon problem'

Lieberman's vice presidential campaign amounted to a "national seminar" on orthodox Judaism, says Alan Wolfe, a religion and politics expert at Boston College. People asked questions, such as whether Lieberman could work on the Jewish Sabbath, and learned from his answers. "Whether we can have the same discussion about Mormonism, I don't know," Wolfe says. "It's going to be harder because it is a more controversial religion."

Conservative Hugh Hewitt, a law professor and talk-show host, says one big speech won't be enough. "Mitt Romney has a Mormon problem, as does the rest of the country. It's much bigger than I thought, and it's going to require a lot of conversation and focused study," says Hewitt, author of A Mormon in the White House?: 10 Things Every Conservative Should Know about Mitt Romney, due in March.

Joseph Smith, an unschooled diviner in western New York, founded the LDS church in 1830. He said the angel Moroni had directed him to two golden plates engraved with scripture and Christian history. The text he dictated became the Book of Mormon.

Romney describes LDS as similar to other U.S. churches: "My church teaches first and foremost that there's a God who is our heavenly father, that all the children of the world are his, that humanity is one great family, that we have a duty to serve one another and that we should try and live better lives."

There are several distinctive aspects of Mormonism, however, that shape public perception and may affect Romney's political fate:

·Theology. Historian Jan Shipps, author of Mormonism: The Story of a New Religious Tradition, says Mormons hold beliefs that "people always find sort of strange." Among them: People are on a journey toward godhood, the dead can be baptized, and God speaks to man today through living apostles and prophets, such as LDS president Gordon Hinckley. Mormons also believe the Book of Mormon is the word of God while the Bible is "the word of God as far as it is translated correctly."

·Polygamy. The Mormon church banned polygamy in 1890 and punishes it with excommunication. Yet any time a tiny sect is charged in a polygamy case, says Richard Ostling, co-author of Mormon America, people recall Mormon history, and some think the church still sanctions the practice.

The situation is aggravated by Big Love, an HBO television series about polygamists who live in Utah but who are not Mormons. "They have tried to make it plain in their publicity and their scripts," Otterson says. "The trouble is that any time you mention Utah and polygamy, then you draw the association."

·Racial history. All devout Mormon men are ordained as priests, but blacks were excluded until 1978 when church president Spencer Kimball said he had a revelation from the Lord that "every faithful, worthy man in the Church" may receive priesthood. "Since then the church has made a tremendous effort to appeal to black members," Shipps says.

·Secrecy. Ostling calls the church "unusually secretive for an institution of its size." Financial and administrative matters are closely held, he says. Chapel services are open, but temples and worship ceremonies, including weddings, are closed to non-Mormons. The Romneys were married in a civil ceremony attended by Ann's parents and hundreds of guests, followed by a small temple ceremony for Mormons only.

·Discipline. Mormons are free to disagree with their church but can be excommunicated by local authorities for heretical teachings or open challenges to theology and practices. They can't attend temple, take communion or tithe but can go to chapel services and stay active. "There is no shunning," Shipps says. Author Laurel Thatcher Ulrich, a Harvard historian and practicing Mormon, says she "deplores" the excommunications but adds that they are not unique to her faith.

·Proselytizing. Mormons energetically seek members from other faiths. Sometimes they perform proxy baptisms of deceased Jews and other non-Mormons, in case they want to convert in the afterlife. Ulrich says the Mormon view is "we're the truth, and we want to convert you." Asked to square that with a president's duty to a diverse nation, Romney says that "almost every faith I've ever encountered tends to make people better people and draw them closer to their creator. I respect and admire almost every faith I've encountered."

Does he disagree with any aspect of LDS? "I wouldn't take it upon myself to try in any way to distance myself from my faith. I love my church. I am not going to pick and choose doctrines and beliefs."

Romney pitches himself as a competent manager; a successful entrepreneur; a conservative governor who fought gay marriage and passed a universal health-insurance plan; a turnaround artist who saved the 2002 Olympics from financial ruin and ran an unprecedented security operation for the games just a few months after 9/11.

He's also running as a social conservative whose views have evolved rightward, most dramatically from support for abortion rights to opposition. His evolution is one cause for wariness among some of the Christian conservatives who are influential in early primary states such as Iowa and South Carolina. His religion is another.

Magleby, who is a Democrat, says religious conservatives know Mormons are "rock-solid" allies on values issues such as gambling, pornography and same-sex marriage. "But the religious doctrines of the church are often found unacceptable to the religious right. To some, Mormons are seen as a sect and a threat," he says.

The North American Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention has produced The Mormon Puzzle, a video that highlights "extra-biblical scriptures … unorthodox doctrines and aggressive missionary efforts" by Mormons. The Arizona-based concernedchristians.org instructs Mormons on how to resign from their church.

Magleby and Wolfe say Romney should heed Arizona Sen. John McCain's experience in South Carolina's 2000 primary. McCain was accused, among other things, of having illegitimate children, betraying veterans and being brainwashed while a prisoner of war in Vietnam. Magleby predicts polygamy will be "a major attack point below the radar and maybe above." Wolfe says such attacks will start "the minute you get into the Republican primaries and somebody gets desperate."

Romney says that's the nature of politics and "not something that scares away a person who cares very deeply about the country." He says he's met with evangelical Christian pastors and found them receptive: "We acknowledge that our theology is quite different, but our values are the same."

Is there any political benefit to being Mormon? The church occasionally weighs in on values issues, such as the Equal Rights Amendment, gay marriage and gambling and liquor laws, but it avoids party politics. No endorsements. No candidate appearances. No use of membership lists by campaigns.

Still, Magleby envisions a surge of money and support similar to what Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis received from Greek-Americans in 1988: "There was a sense of connection and pride that many Mormons will have for Romney."

Litmus Test For Hypocrisy (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Why is it that abortion, a subject on which political candidates often claim to be expressing their most deeply held moral convictions, is often the issue on which they seem especially opportunistic and unprincipled?

Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor who is seeking the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, has, in a little over a decade, moved from strong support of abortion rights (when he was running for Ted Kennedy's Senate seat in 1994) to a point where he says he makes "no apology for the fact that I am pro-life."

Rudy Giuliani's support for abortion rights seems more constant, but his position, too, has evolved over the years, as Ray Rivera reported in the New York Times on Saturday.

Reappraisals and conversions are not confined to Republicans. Both Al Gore and Richard Gephardt altered their positions on abortion over the years to bring their views into line with Democratic primary voters who predominantly support abortion rights.

I don't mean to pick on four public servants who are certainly not alone in doing some version of the abortion shuffle. All of them may be thoroughly sincere in rethinking their old positions.

But there is something systematic about the willingness of politicians to adapt their views on abortion to suit the preferences of whatever electorate they are facing at any given time. The reason: Our political system has created strong incentives for candidates to be less than candid about what they really think.

To begin with, candidates are rarely willing to say outright what's true for so many of them: that they do not consider abortion the most important issue in politics and that it is not the reason they entered public life.

Of course there are exceptions such as Rep. Chris Smith, a New Jersey Republican who began his political career as executive director of the New Jersey Right to Life Committee. Plenty of Democrats entered politics primarily because of a mix of commitments related to social justice, poverty, labor rights, health care, civil rights and the environment. Many equally principled Republicans were animated largely by skepticism of government interference in the marketplace, support for lower taxes and, in many cases, a belief in an assertive foreign policy.

Yet politicians who acknowledged that abortion was not one of their driving concerns would be denounced, oddly enough, as unprincipled.

Opponents of abortion would argue, properly from their point of view, that failing to see abortion as a central issue now is akin to denying the importance of slavery in the 1850s. Supporters of keeping abortion legal, again properly from their side, would see such a politician as shamefully defective in his or her commitment to women's rights. As a result, politicians pretend to be deeply committed to a view even when they're not.

Making abortion a party issue has also encouraged dissembling. In Britain and Australia, a politician's stand on abortion is accorded "free vote" status, disconnected from party discipline. After all, it's perfectly consistent for a progressive committed to broad public provision for the poor to believe that abortion is wrong. It's equally consistent for a conservative opposed to government meddling in the marketplace to support a woman's right to choose.

In theory, our parties do not enforce a single line on abortion, and there are many pro-life Democrats and pro-choice Republicans. Last fall's campaign represented a modest but healthy loosening of informal discipline on the subject. But presidential candidates searching for primary votes know they must hold to each party's version of political correctness. Giuliani's moderately pro-choice stand will test whether this is as much of a straitjacket as the demands of a party whip.

Finally, we don't make it easy for politicians to admit, as most voters do, that abortion is an agonizing question. It's not hard to share the concern of right-to-lifers for the value of human life from the moment of conception. It's not hard to share the concern of abortion rights advocates that a legal ban could endanger the health and the lives of women by driving abortions underground without much reducing their number.

My own imperfect solution to this dilemma is to favor public efforts to cut the number of abortions by encouraging contraception and offering much more support to women who want to bring their children into the world.

But it's easy for me to take this less-than-pure position. I don't have to run in a primary. As for the politicians, we have created a system that encourages many in their ranks to adjust their convictions to their political needs. And then we denounce them.

Does Hillary Have Something To Be Sorry About? (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 13, 2007

Running for president means never having to say you're sorry. Or at least Hillary Clinton thinks so.

She steadfastly refuses to admit that her vote to authorize the Iraq war was a mistake. She refuses to say she was wrong.

I will make a prediction: Before we get to the Iowa caucuses, Hillary will say she was wrong. She will admit she made an error. Because if she doesn't, she risks losing.

John Edwards, Chris Dodd and Joe Biden voted for the war also. But all of them now say that was a mistake.

"I was wrong," Edwards says. "It was a mistake to vote for this war in 2002. I take responsibility for that mistake."

Here is what Hillary says: "Knowing what I know now, I would never have voted for it."

She says that President Bush "should not have been trusted with the authority we gave him."

Which is her way of saying, "I should have never given him the authority. It was a mistake."

But she won't say it. She will not admit human error on this issue. And it is affecting her campaign.

When she was in Iowa, she refused to make Iraq part of her stump speech, hoping, I guess, that nobody would ask her about it. And the first time a voter did ask, she didn't answer him. Later in the day, she gave versions of her "knowing what I know now" position.

You can't expect Hillary to turn back time. She cannot change history. She cannot put the toothpaste back in the tube.

But she can fess up instead of dodging.

Hillary Clinton can be open, charming, funny and warm on the stump.

When she talks about her Iraq vote, however, she sounds closed, guarded, calculating and defensive.

Her refusal to say a mistake was a mistake also feeds the impression that she is a divisive figure. Some voters will grow tired of all this and ask why she doesn't simply put the matter behind her by admitting the vote was wrong.

Think I'm exaggerating the magnitude of her problem? Here is an exchange that took place Sunday between Claire Helfman, a retired nurse who attended a house party in Nashua, N.H., and Clinton: "I've heard your explanation for your vote: 'I didn't think I was voting for the war, I was voting for inspections.' It doesn't fly. It just doesn't fly," Helfman said.

Then, according to the Associated Press, "The New York senator repeated her long-standing mantra -- 'If we knew then what we know now, I would never have voted to give this president the authority.' And she again batted down calls for her to describe her vote as a mistake."

(And when the Associated Press calls your position "a long-standing mantra," it is a sign of how serious things have gotten.)

"I'm sorry, what I say is what I believe," Hillary said to Helfman. "I understand that some people disagree or think it's not adequate, but it's what I believe."

Such sincerity can be gutsy and appealing. But to some it does not sound like sincerity, it sounds like arrogance. The same kind President Bush displayed when in April 2004 he was asked at a news conference to name a single mistake he had made and he could not think of one.

The Democratic National Committee recently held its winter meeting in Washington, and all the 2008 candidates spoke over two days. Anyone who showed up for both days (and very few reporters did) learned that virtually any of the second-tier candidates could swiftly move up to the first tier.

"Iraq is a symptom," Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico said. "The disease is arrogance."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said, "Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war, those who voted to continue funding the war, can surely vote to stop the war."

Neither one ever had to vote on the Iraq war. Nor did Barack Obama.

That could give them an advantage in the Democratic Iowa caucuses, which are dominated by liberal activists, and in the New Hampshire primary, where voters have a history of sending a message with their votes.

"She has a very nuanced explanation, and it's a pretty good explanation. But many people want to hear her clearly say that her vote was a mistake," Paul LeBlanc, a Clinton supporter and president of Southern New Hampshire University, told a reporter Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0131653

"I don't think this issue is going to subside anytime soon," Dean Spiliotes, director of research at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics, said. "There is a lot of pressure on her now to explain her vote and almost do a little penance for it."

I know Hillary's campaign hopes that the press will tire of writing about this and the public will tire of asking about it and it will all go away.

But I doubt that will happen. Front-runners don't get many breaks, and Hillary is the front-runner. For now.

David Nagle, former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party, said recently: "Anybody who raises a real banner against (the war) is going to do well. Anybody who tries to toe-step around it is going to have a real problem."

I am aware of the political calculation Hillary is making. She is trying to play it safe by not saying she is sorry. She doesn't want to go too far to the left in the primaries, so she can get back toward the center in the general election.

But before she can win the general election, she has to win the Democratic nomination.

And to do that, safe is not better than sorry.

Read about Barack Obama's New Hampshire town hall meeting.

Every time Hillary opens her mouth she sounds like she's been briefed by a flock of consultants. Every time Hillary opens her mouth she sounds more and more like a slick politician that has had an ingrained group of consultants script her every word.

She's never heard the adage that "she who stands in the middle-of-the road gets his by trucks coming from both directions." And she is.

I'd hate to be the poor Starbucks employee who takes her order...it would probably contain an esteric combination of flavors so as to please everybody and offend nobody, so that the poor employee would be hard-pressed to produce such a concoction.

Whe she finally admits that she made a "mistake" by voting to authorize the Iraq war, it, too, will have been based on polls showing that she's losing ground to Obama by not admitting it. Once again, polls and a political machine will dictate her covering-the-spectrum position.

Hillary...speak plain English based on your heart-felt positions (if you actually have any!)

You're looking pretty shallow {You go, girl!).

by GGPSmith on 02.12.2007 at 11:45 PM

Did you ever hear W apologize for anything when he was campaigning for President? Either time? I've heard him contradict himself in back-to-back news clips on The Daily Show so many times that everyone in the real news business not calling him that other L-word on a daily basis should just admit they are actually in the PR business and call it a news career. The only thing Hillary should apologize for is not owning up to her feminist ideals in not divorcing Bill. But as far as I remember, all she had to go on for her vote were the intelligence reports W The L's administration cooked up. So, Roger, how about a daily tirade demanding Bush's apologies for his unapologetic behavior for saying and doing things he really should be resigning, much less apologizing, for. But then again, Hillary can't throw any of us in jail without a lawyer, trial, or charges, for as long as she pleases, can she? Not yet anyway.

by Bueller on 02.12.2007 at 11:02 PM

Hillary bears responsibility for her vote and support for this military action And just like our president, she has shown neither leadership nor contrition. And she wants our vote, I'll pass.

by Jerry in Boston on 02.12.2007 at 09:51 PM

What complete and utter garbage.

This is like saying the villagers should apologize for believing the boy who cried wolf.

by tnproud2b on 02.12.2007 at 09:41 PM

The Democrats are going to be ruined if the war starts going well before Nov 2008.

by Chenrossii on 02.12.2007 at 08:41 PM

Did you hear the meager applause that accompanied Mrs. Clinton's response; "Knowing what I know now, I would have never voted for it."

I think she is in trouble over the war.

I won't vote for anyone that voted to authorize President Bush to go to war. Not for Senator Clinton, former Senator Edwards, Representative Hunter, Senator Biden, Senator Dodd, or Senator McCain.

by B Frank on 02.12.2007 at 08:33 PM

They are all sorry for what they did - not just Hillary. And deep down what they all are most sorry for was playing politics instead of doing their job and doing what was right. They were all so afraid of being labled by the Bush admin and Republicans as unpatriotic and supporting the "evildoers" that they gave Bush a blank check instead of acting like the congresspersons and senators they were elected to be. No one questioned the Bush cabal on their rush to war. Now they can't run away fast enough. They all need to be held accountable. No one was brave enough to stand up. They were all thinking about the next election and they all wanted to come across to the American people as tough on terrorism. None of them realized how incompetent Bush, Cheney, Rumsfeld, et al., would be and no one expected Bush to botch this whole operation so badly with his arrogance and stubborn refusal to recognize how badly things were going and change course.

That's what we need to hold them accountable for, a lack of courage, conviction and leadership. If someone in either party will come forward and show the American people that actually stand for something and not wave in the wind everytime there is a vote to be chased, they will win.

by Lucas V. Earl on 02.12.2007 at 07:52 PM

Hillary's response is unsatisfying to anti-war activists because what they want to hear (or at least want to believe they are hearing) is a "confession" that it was wrong to authorize the Iraq war even based on what we thought we knew in 2002 (i.e., that Iraq allegedly had WMD and allegedly had connections to Al Qaeda). The implication of such a confession, of course, is that it would also be wrong to use military force in the future against an enemy that had the intention and capability of attacking the United States unless they attacked first.

by Mimi11 on 02.12.2007 at 06:58 PM

Mr Simon,

If you had spent this much time and energy parsing Bush's words in the run up to the Iraq war maybe he would not have been able to lie the country into a ruinous war.

Why aren't you demanding accountability from Bush? Why aren't you demanding that he apologize to the country and the Congress for all the lies, deceptions, manipulated intelligence?

This is yet another example of "Clinton rules of journalism". Just beat up on the Clintons and blame them for Bush's disasters.

Senator Clinton made a decision based on the doctored intel Bush sent to Congress. You want her to apologize for it? What's wrong with you Washington journalists?

by Leftcoast on 02.12.2007 at 06:30 PM

I understand Hillary's answer regarding the Iraq war. She voted for the resolution that at the time was also going to use the WMD inspectors. She's owned up to what she voted for - being responsible and a grown-up. What a 'real' press should do is see if the questioners are Republican activists in disguise because frankly how many times does she have to answer the question. Meantime, she has answered multitudes of other pertinent questions but they don't seem to get the press coverage. Again, something is 'TOO' coordinated about these questions. Why doesn't the press, including a POLITICO EDITORIALIST on Meet the Press today, start putting simple pieces of the puzzle together. The Main Stream Media backed by its corporate elitist companies, have no intention of the truth behind VP Cheney, Saudi 9/11 conspiracies, the rip off elections of 2000 and 2004, and the fake war in Iraq for oil war to ever come to light. The online community will become stronger and defeat the enemy within - it just takes knowing who the enemy is, including this POLITICO blogshere.

by Rustyk4 on 02.12.2007 at 06:25 PM

Mr. Simon, You're right. The public IS sick and tired of wall to wall Hillary and Obama! For the love of God, give it a rest!

Here's a clue for you Mr. Simon: neither Mrs.Clinton nor Mr.Obama invaded another country and slaughtered tens of thousands of people on false pretenses. The people know who did. Do you? Maybe you could look into it, if you have the time.

by JSteele on 02.12.2007 at 06:15 PM

Yeah!

by tnproud2b on 02.12.2007 at 05:21 PM

I must have missed it. What exactly is Hilary's plan for victory in Iraq? What is the Democrats' plan?

by exocet on 02.12.2007 at 04:52 PM

I think Hillary should say it was a mistake to go to war, but I do not think she should apologize. I think she should be apologetic in tone but not in content. This fixation on an apology is mindless and childish. Hillary should say it was a mistake to go to war but also describe the litany of mistakes that followed: It was a mistake for the media to cheer Bush on, it was a mistake for Bush to allow looting, it was mistake for Bush not to fire Rumsfeld, it was a mistake for Bush to put cronies in charge on ministries, it was a mistake for voters to choose Bush instead of Kerry, there were mistakes everywhere. HIllary should say, now that we have got the mistakes off our collective chests, here is how I'm going to fix things. If America wants to choose its presidents on who does the best apology like some American Idol contest or televangelical crusade, then don't complain when you end up with presidents like Bush.

by Tangible on 02.12.2007 at 04:49 PM

Perhaps Mrs. Clinton needs to borrow a phrase from Mr. Clinton: "That depends on what the meaning of 'sorry' is." That sure worked for him!

by JSteele on 02.12.2007 at 04:39 PM

For all of you that support Hillary, shame on you. We live in a democracy, not a monarchy. Having Bush I, Clinton I, Bush II, and now Clinton II is problematic. A HUGE reason for the American Revolution was to get away from monarchs and rulers. Our current system appears to be heading toward dynastic rule, just like our old-time British counterparts. Wake up and REVOLUTIONIZE the system and don't become one of the SHEEPLE. Vote for change..vote for someone like Obama, Richardson, or Edwards....even Vilsack... Giuliani seems good too. Don't sell out to the Oligarchic system.

by edofarrell on 02.12.2007 at 04:07 PM

Hillary didn't make a mistake. Bush did. Let's try and keep the spin off the topic. The 'Decider' is the guy who made all the bad decisions up to and going into this misguided war. Hillary has a better take on this than anyone else. Put the blame where it belongs.

by PhillyGuy on 02.12.2007 at 03:23 PM

Hillary has more than adequately explained her position on the war. Obviously, she regrets the outcome of this military operation. However, it was not her decision to wage the war. It was an effort of the president and the Republican-controlled Congress to invade Iraq without adequate planning and support. Republicans bear ultimate responsibility for leading and mismanaging this war. The Democrats and Hillary should not have to accept blame or guilt for Bush's obvious incompetence. She stated very clearly before the war in her Senate speech that she did not believe in preemptive strikes and wanted the vote to further government's diplomatic leverage in negotiating with Iraq and coalition building. Her reasoning was clear and logical.

by Nancianne on 02.12.2007 at 03:12 PM

It will be a sad day for America if that disingenuous, pandering, windmill politician, Mrs. Clinton manges to worm her way back in the White House. She is not to be trusted.

by Janesays on 02.12.2007 at 03:11 PM

Regarding Barack Obama, while Roger Simon is correct that Obama did not have to vote on the war, what Mr. Simon fails to mention is that Obama did make public statements of opposition to the invasion prior to it, and for that he should get credit for being gutsy - this was a time when all the major media was cheerleading for the war and Bush's public support was sky-high - and for being right.

I do agree with the NH voters who expressed dissatisfaction with Hillary's attempt to finesse her war vote without admitting a mistake. As was noted in the Washington Post this morning, this will give many Democratic primary voters an unpleasant reminder of Bush-style stubborness, while reinforcing the reason why it's so hard to make the short commute from Capitol Hill to the White House: her answer makes her sound like one of 100 and that's just not good enough to ace the interview to be the future Decider.

The Explanation Hillary Clinton Owes (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Yet another man has betrayed Hillary Clinton. This time it's George W. Bush, who not only deceived her about weapons of mass destruction but, when granted congressional authorization to go to war in Iraq, actually did so. This, apparently, came as a surprise to her, although in every hamlet and village in America, every resident who could either read or watch Fox News knew that Bush was going to take the country to war. Among other things, troops were already being dispatched.

Somehow, Bush's intentions were lost on Clinton, who then as now was a member of the United States Senate. This was the case even though she now rightly calls Bush's desire to topple Saddam Hussein an "obsession."

"From almost the first day they got into office," Clinton said last weekend in New Hampshire, the Bush administration was "trying to figure out how to get rid of Saddam Hussein." If that was the case -- and indeed it was -- then how come she now says she did not think Bush, armed with a congressional resolution, would hurry to war?

I certainly did. It was about the only thing I got right about the war, which, the record will show, I supported. If I were running for the presidency, I might call my position "a mistake" and bray about being misled. But it was really a lapse in judgment. For reasons extraneous to this particular column, I thought the war would do wonders for the Middle East and that it would last, at the most, a week or two. In this I was assured by the usual experts in and out of government. My head nodded like one of those little toy dogs in the window of the car ahead of you.

So I do not condemn Clinton and other Democratic presidential candidates -- Chris Dodd, Joe Biden and John Edwards -- for voting for the war because I would have done the same. I fault them, though, for passing the blame to Bush as the guy who misled them. They all had sufficient knowledge to question the administration's arguments, and they did not do so. Not a single one of them, for instance, could possibly have believed the entirety of the administration's case or not have suspected that the reasons for war were being hyped. If they felt otherwise, they have no business running for president.

The odd man out in this debate is Barack Obama, who was not in the Senate in October 2002 when Congress passed the war resolution. He has been on record from that time as always being opposed to the war. That is to his credit. But we will never know how he might have voted since, clearly, being in the Senate and having presidential ambitions work wonders on the mind. (Indeed, once Obama got to Washington, he made only one Senate speech on Iraq.) Can it only be coincidence that all the other Democratic senators now running for president voted for the war? Can it also be a coincidence that they, in fact, voted as a majority of the American people at the time wanted? Not a single one of them bucked the zeitgeist, yet other Democratic senators -- 21 of them, in fact -- voted against the resolution. They were the ones not running for president.

The zeitgeist has reversed course. A clear majority of Americans and a preponderance of Democrats now oppose the war and have no confidence in Bush's handling of it. Is it yet another coincidence that, aside from Obama, all the Democratic presidential candidates from the Senate have also reversed course, arriving at their opinions after excruciating thought, or have they merely put their finger to the wind? In other words, have they changed their minds or merely their positions? It's hard to know. In Clinton's case, she is dead center in American public opinion, foursquare for what's popular and courageously opposed to what's not. Most Americans oppose a precipitous pullout from Iraq and -- surprise! -- so does Clinton.

Too often when a candidate throws his hat into the ring, he tosses principle out the window. Yet this is precisely what we want in a president -- principles and the courage to stick to them. Instead of Clinton saying she had been misled by Bush and his merry band of fibbers, exaggerators and hallucinators, I'd like to hear an explanation of how she thinks she went wrong and what she learned from it. I don't want to know how Bush failed her. I want to know how she failed her country.

Clinton Reminds New Hampshire, I'm With Bill (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

As she made her first outing to New Hampshire as a presidential candidate last weekend, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton left her husband at home, yet she tried to tap his old political magic at nearly every turn.

Mrs. Clinton, Democrat of New York, mentioned Mr. Clinton at least eight times on Saturday — at one point talking about "Bill's heart surgery" to illuminate her own travails with health care bureaucracy — and a few times on Sunday, most memorably when she said of Republicans, "Bill and I have beaten them before, and we will again."

For the first time in her bid for the White House, Mrs. Clinton directly laid claim to the legacy and popularity of former President Bill Clinton — and did so in a crucial primary state where her husband showed his resiliency in 1992, when he finished second despite weeks of troubles.

"It helps her because we know Bill Clinton and we love Bill Clinton. We know him and his foibles. We know he loves his Dunkin' Donuts; we know his love for burgers," said State Representative Patricia M. McMahon, a longtime ally of both Clintons. "It shows that she's human, too, and appreciates her husband and likes him as much as we do."

This latest chapter in the Clinton political relationship is still a work in progress. Twice as a candidate for the Senate, and during her six-year term, Mrs. Clinton has kept a measure of professional distance from her husband, partly to keep the spotlight on "the politician in the family," as he has called her. Where the two have appeared together — for example, at the funeral of Coretta Scott King last year — his skills as a speaker have overshadowed hers.

Now that Mrs. Clinton is a presidential candidate, however, her advisers say it would be folly to minimize Mr. Clinton's role in her life: as a potential first gentleman, as her "full-time political counselor" (as she called him on Saturday) and as a source of emotional support.

Mr. Clinton is an asset in particular with his fan base, which was obvious as Mrs. Clinton drew smiles and laughter by recalling their White House days, "what Bill did" with the government in the 1990s (which she said she would try to replicate) and his famous tardiness, which, she noted with humor, she has endured with everyone else.

"The way she talked about him gave me a better feeling for her warmth," said Karen Ryan of Concord, who attended a question-and-answer forum with the senator there on Saturday. "And the Clinton administration is a much better memory than the one we have now."

Yet Mr. Clinton is also a potential liability because of the questions he provokes, as both a polarizing former president who could return to the White House and as a husband whose behavior in the Monica Lewinsky affair lingers in the some minds.

"It's nice that she stayed with him, but as strong as she is, I think she should've dumped him after Monica," said Karla Frasse, a dental assistant in Concord. "I want to see her in her own right and not really be reminded of the two of them together."

Mr. Clinton stepped in for Mrs. Clinton on Sunday for the first time since she announced her candidacy, speaking at a breakfast of Westchester County Democrats in New York. It was not an official campaign event, though he did say that her huge re-election victory in November helped catapult her to New Hampshire. It was a reminder that Mr. Clinton will be a chief surrogate at fund-raisers and political events through November 2008, Mrs. Clinton's advisers said.

There are no plans for Mr. Clinton to campaign on his own or to appear with his wife at events right now, though they will eventually campaign together, said Howard Wolfson, a senior campaign adviser.

Mr. Wolfson said that Mrs. Clinton's references to her husband were not scripted, and that he did not know whether the couple had cooked up a Dunkin' Donuts joke — in which she said, a few times, that Mr. Clinton had gained 20 pounds from his pit stops there, and that she would need voters' help to keep off the pounds.

"I think it's hard for her to think about New Hampshire without thinking about him," Mr. Wolfson said.

Mr. Clinton finished second in the New Hampshire primary in February 1992 despite a winter of controversy over his draft record and other problems, and he declared himself "the comeback kid."

Today he is exceptionally popular among Democrats in the state; in interviews this past weekend, several New Hampshire Democrats recalled their first conversations with him in 1992 as if they had just happened.

Mrs. Clinton's informal references to "Bill" turned off a few Democrats, who said they found it distracting or informal. Yet political analysts said her casual references showed a certain assuredness, since many politicians, particularly women, are careful about saying or doing anything to suggest they are under the sway of their spouses.

"I think the way she was teasing about him, and not shying away from their years together, projected a nice confidence," said Dante Scala, an associate professor of politics at Saint Anselm College in Manchester. "It helps engender early good will that can help build a candidacy."

Out-of-style Thinking (USAT)

By Annette Fuentes

USA Today, February 13, 2007

If some things have changed, the news media's take on female politicians has a tendency to recycle the same old clichés about them. Coverage of first female House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's fashion sensibility in the media is Exhibit A.

First there was a Washington Post article published shortly after the elections on the presumptive new House speaker, "Muted Tones of Quiet Authority: A Look Suited to the Speaker." It offered the information that "Pelosi's suit was by Giorgio Armani — the Italian master of neutral tones and modern power dressing — and she wore it well." The article at least appeared in the newspaper's Style section, but was chock-full of psychoanalytic forays into Pelosi's wardrobe choices, asserting that "an Armani suit, for a woman, is a tool for playing with the boys without pretending to be one." I would wager that Pelosi is one woman who doesn't play around with anyone.

Then there was a New York Times article in January in its Thursday Styles section titled "Speaking Chic to Power." While noting that Pelosi, barely in her new job a month, had brought the House to votes on a minimum wage increase, stem cell research and Medicare drug prices, the article said "she did it looking preternaturally fresh, with a wardrobe that, while still subdued and over-reliant on suits, has seldom spruced the halls of Congress."

Similar articles appeared in the Baltimore Sun and Chicago Tribune. Mentioned were other women politicians and their fashion choices, such as Sen. Hillary Clinton's hair style and preference for black pantsuits or Florida Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz's haircut. The question is whether focusing on the clothing choices of serious female political players risks rendering them less than serious. Another question is whether such reports warrant precious space. After all, with rare exceptions, male politicians are seldom scrutinized for their choice of suits.

Some reporters and editors haven't figured out a way to cover female politicians that doesn't rely on the old stereotypes, says Gail Dines, sociology and women's studies professor at Wheelock College in Boston. "To be a woman politician, you have to strategize and work hard, and yet what matters is what designer you're wearing. It's a way to make women in power less scary," Dines notes. "It's putting women into a comfort zone for those who are still baffled by how to treat strong women."

The articles seem a throwback to a time when women were only spouses, not players, says Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. "To focus on their attire, the cut of their clothes … is to be in danger of trivializing who they are, the important role they play and the meaning behind women's advancement to positions of power: That is, we're moving to a true democracy of shared leadership."

The problem is the media haven't quite caught up. "A woman who rises to a leadership position at any level is going to dress appropriately," says Kathleen Hall Jamieson, professor at the Annenberg School of Communications at the University of Pennsylvania. "It underscores her competence and is not a distraction. You take for granted that it would not be worthy of comment any more."

Jamieson thinks the underlying motivation for reporting on female politicians' style is "the natural news interest in talking about what changes, and men don't look different. There is a uniform for men in power and we all know what it looks like. The only thing to change is the color of the shirt or tie."

Because women have greater fashion options, changes they make are more obvious and invite analysis. Now that Pelosi's "uniform" has been established, that should be the end of it. Ditto for Clinton. "Clinton now has a range of what she wears," Jamieson says. "She hasn't been changing hairstyles or her pantsuits. That is our definition of what she wears, and that should end it."

Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, thinks reporting that describes women politicians' appearance is justified in profiles of them. "Beyond that, there comes a point where it reflects badly on the press," he says. "The only way the appearance of a politician is really politically relevant is if they are so dazzlingly charismatic or strange looking that people can't look at them. Whether it's Condoleezza Rice, Madeleine Albright or Nancy Pelosi, they all fall into the same zone as their male counterparts. They all look like regular people, none is a runway model or the elephant man."

Female politicians will certainly survive such silly coverage, and some argue the stories are harmless. But these women are role models for young women and offer an alternative to the fashion model and celebrity in setting the standard for female beauty and worth.

Dines worries that when the media emphasize the appearance of women, it perpetuates attitudes in the larger world that devalue and limit women. "These are fortunate, privileged women," Dines notes of politicians, "but for young women trying to make it in the world, how they look can affect their opportunities."

Obama Hits New Hampshire (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, February 13, 2007

NASHUA, N.H. -- Bringing his opening campaign swing to the site of the influential first-in-the-nation presidential primary, Sen. Barack Obama on Monday sharpened distinctions with rival Democrats on the Iraq war even as he offered an apology to military families who might have been offended by a comment he made a day earlier in Iowa.

A local New Hampshire reporter asked Obama (D-Ill.) if military families deserved an apology for a comment the senator made during a speech at Iowa State University on Sunday criticizing the war in Iraq as a conflict that had "wasted" more than 3,000 American soldiers' lives.

Obama had backtracked from the comment immediately after the speech, telling a reporter for the Des Moines Register that the remark was "a slip of the tongue" and that soldiers' "sacrifices are never wasted."

Speaking to a group of reporters in the kitchen of a Nashua, N.H., home after a gathering for Democratic party activists, Obama said he had misspoken in Iowa, adding that his opposition to the war was grounded in a desire for soldiers to return home safely to their families.

"I would absolutely apologize if any of them felt that in some ways it had diminished the enormous courage and sacrifice that they'd shown," Obama responded.

In 10-hour stopover that was only his second visit ever to New Hampshire, Obama drew enthusiastic crowds, with thousands of students and local residents filling an auditorium at the University of New Hampshire at Durham for an evening rally.

He spent two hours mingling with lunch-time coffee house customers and pedestrians on a street near the State Capitol in Concord and later stopped at a party in Nashua hosted at a passive-solar heated home owned by Bette Lasky, the Democratic assistant majority leader of the State House of Representatives.

The Illinois senator stressed his calls to begin troop withdrawals from Iraq as he moved through New Hampshire, a state where the war in unpopular and particularly so among the activist Democrats most likely to vote in the presidential primary.

His chief rival, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), was dogged with questions about the Iraq war as she campaigned in New Hampshire this weekend.

Clinton was repeatedly pressed by local Democratic activists to say whether she now believed she made a mistake in voting for the 2002 Senate resolution authorizing the Iraq war; Clinton declined to do so and instead repeated past statements that she would not have voted for the resolution had she known what she does now.

Both Clinton and Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards were members of the Senate in 2002 and voted in favor of the war authorization. Edwards has said his vote was a mistake and has challenged the Senate to use its power over federal spending to end the war.

Obama was not a member of the Senate in 2002 but spoke out publicly against the war resolution.

Obama, who has recently been focusing attention on that difference in their records by regularly noting in campaign speeches that the war should "never have been authorized," suggested in answering a reporter's question that his rivals and other senators who voted yes are partly responsible for the situation in Iraq.

"I think all the decisions we make in Washington have consequences. So obviously if the Senate had voted down the authorization, we wouldn't be in the situation that we're in now," he said.

Obama also underscored his differences with Clinton's more cautious approach on Iraq. He contrasted as "pretty substantial" the difference between a Senate bill he recently authorized to pull combat troops out of Iraq by March 2008 and a bill that Clinton has introduced to cap troop strength in Iraq at the level in January.

But Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson noted that she had joined Obama in favoring a phased withdrawal of US troops in a 2005 Senate vote.

Speaking at the University of New Hampshire, Obama also questioned the Bush administration's motive in releasing evidence this month that Iranian-built weapons may have been used in Iraq against U.S. forces.

He said much of the evidence was months old and questioned the timing of the release.

Obama campaigned in a blue blazer and open-collar white shirt in a town-hall style meeting at a field house at the university. He drew loud cheers from the crowd, several of whom said they were impressed by his manner.

"He's not stiff. He's not stuffy," said Eric Diamond, 25, a high school teacher from Concord, N.H., who came to see Obama. "He's come up from the grassroots, from the ground up in Chicago. That I admire a lot, anyone who's done hands-on community organizing."

"He's a fresh face. He's not been in the political machine long enough to be jaded," said Stephanie Ashbaugh, 44, a family practitioner from Hollis, N.H.

Obama Restructures A Remark On Deaths (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

DURHAM, N.H., Feb. 12 — Senator Barack Obama of Illinois said Monday that he had misspoken when he suggested that the lives of more than 3,000 American soldiers killed in Iraq had been “wasted.”

As he arrived in New Hampshire, Mr. Obama said he would “absolutely apologize” to military families if they were offended by a remark he made in Iowa while criticizing the Bush administration’s Iraq policy.

“What I would say — and meant to say — is that their service hasn’t been honored,” Mr. Obama told reporters in Nashua, N.H., “because our civilian strategy has not honored their courage and bravery, and we have put them in a situation in which it is hard for them to succeed.”

A New Hampshire reporter asked Mr. Obama whether he regretted the remark, made at a rally on Sunday that “we ended up launching a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged, and to which we now have spent $400 billion and have seen over 3,000 lives of the bravest young Americans wasted.”

“Even as I said it,” Mr. Obama said Monday, “I realized I had misspoken.”

Obama: Senators Made Mistake On War (NHUL)

By John Distaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 13, 2007

NASHUA – Illinois Sen. Barack Obama says the U.S. senators who formally authorized President George W. Bush to invade Iraq in 2002 are at least partly responsible for "the situation we're in now."

Wrapping up his first house party in the first-primary state, the newly announced Presidential hopeful told reporters that senators who voted to authorize the war should "make their own assessment on how they would do things differently or not."

Fellow Democratic candidates New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards were members of the Senate when the historic vote was taken and voted in favor of the war authorization resolution.

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama reaches out for a handshake during a campaign visit in Concord yesterday. Obama also appeared at a house party in Nashua and a town hall meeting at the University of New Hampshire Field House in Durham. (AP)

Edwards has apologized for his vote. Clinton has not but has said her vote was an expression of support for sending weapons inspectors into Iraq, not a vote for "pre-emptive war."

Obama was not yet in the Senate at the time but spoke out against it as an Illinois state senator.

"I do not believe the war should have been authorized," he said. "As a consequence of that authorization, the administration was able to take this country down a path that's been very damaging for our national security. And I leave it up to those senators to make their own assessment on how they would do things differently or not.

"All the decisions we make in Washington have consequences," Obama said. "Obviously, if the senators (had) voted down the authorization, we wouldn't be in the situation we're in now."

Obama apologized to military families for saying in Iowa on Saturday that the lives of those who have died in the war had been "wasted."

"It's not what I intended to say and I would absolutely apologize if any of them felt in some way it diminished the enormous courage and sacrifice that they've shown," he said.

"Even as I said that, I realized I had misspoken," he said. "That's not how I ever describe this because their service is unbelievable. When somebody gives up that last measure of devotion, it represents everything that's best about this country. What I would say and meant to say is their service hasn't been honored because our civilian strategy has not matched their courage and bravery and we have put them in a situation in which it is hard for them to succeed."

Obama made his second visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state two days after announcing his candidacy in Springfield, Ill. He walked through downtown Concord shaking hands, ordered a sandwich at a delicatessen, and then signed autographs and talked issues with about 125 activists at the home of state Rep. Bette and Dr. Elliott Lasky.

He arrived fewer than 24 hours after Clinton wrapped up a two-day swing that took her from Berlin to Keene.

At the packed Lasky home, where the hosts gave him a jar of pumpkin butter and a traditional bottle of maple syrup, Obama said the past 20 years, many Americans have taken the view that "the power that is in Washington is always trumping principle. But there has always been another tradition of politics based on a simple idea that we are all connected as a people and that what binds us together as Americans is more important than what divides us."

Obama said his campaign is reaching beyond the usual pool of political activists. "The moment is now to re-energize the people to solve problems," he said.

Asked by Gloria Henry of Nashua asked about the Patriot Act, Obama said the Bush administration has "distorted" a balance between civil liberties and public safety. He said the law has some "sensible" provisions but others "are clearly in violation of the basic principles of due process that we believe in."

He also said the next President should say, "We don't do torture and mean it," and should provide for a system of military courts "that provides for habeus corpus."

Henry said later she liked his answer and said, "At this point, I'm supporting him. I like his freshness of his message. It's not the same old, same old." She cited "a purity of thought that I haven't seen in a politician before."

Obama also called for the health care coverage for all Americans, equal pay for women and a new energy policy. He said teachers need to be paid much more.

"He's consistent," said Bette Lasky." He doesn't duck anything. I liked him," but she wants to "still give it some thought" before endorsing anyone.

Inevitably, questions returned to Iraq.

Obama told reporters he will press for a Senate vote on his bill to begin redeployment of U.S. forces by May 1 with a goal of removing all combat troops by March 31, 2008. He will need 60 votes.

"We probably won't succeed the first time," he said. "But I think you're going to see a ratcheting up of concern on the part of Republicans, and I think there will be a lot of Republican legislators who will feel pressure."

Clinton's plan, he said, "calls for a cap on troop levels, but does not begin a phased redeployment. So that's a pretty substantial difference" between his plan and hers.

Obama said Republicans do not "have a monopoly" on being influenced by special interests in Washington and reducing such influence should be a priority issue in the campaign.

Earlier, Obama also took a lunch-hour walk around Concord, talking with patrons at the Eagle Square Deli and other shops downtown.

"I like him, I just haven't made up my mind right now," said Jane Winslow of Greenfield. But she liked that he "came up to four old ladies and made us feel special."

With Campaign Underway, Obama Now Must Show More Than Potential (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

DURHAM, N.H., Feb. 12 -- The opening days of Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign have displayed all the promise of his candidacy, with large crowds, pulsating energy and a charismatic leading man. But the Illinois Democrat faces several serious challenges if he hopes to convert potential into a winning campaign.

The most significant hurdle will be overcoming questions about whether the first-term U.S. senator, who only three years ago was a member of the Illinois Senate, has the experience and readiness to serve as president at a time of war abroad and major unmet problems at home.

Next will be striking the balance between demands of political elites for Obama to flesh out the details of his ambitious policy agenda without disappointing the many thousands of Americans who have been drawn to him for his appeal as a fresh contrast to traditional politicians.

Ultimately, the race could hinge on his ability to overcome the power and resources of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's battle-tested operation. It is already flexing its muscles on behalf of the New York Democrat and is looking to profit from any missteps by Obama's smaller and less experienced organization.

Day 3 of the Obama campaign brought the candidate to New Hampshire, the state with the nation's first primary and a rich tradition of citizen participation in the presidential process. He ordered the "presidential pastrami" sandwich at a deli in Concord, spoke to activists in Nashua and ended with an enthusiastic rally at the University of New Hampshire.

Along the way, he "absolutely apologized" for saying Sunday the lives of U.S. servicemen and -women killed in Iraq had been "wasted," and he argued there are "pretty substantial" differences between his position and Clinton's on the war in Iraq, the clearest early line of demarcation between the two.

Obama said his biggest difference with Clinton involves the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. He favors pulling out all combat troops by March 31, 2008. He said Clinton "does not begin a phased redeployment." She has said she favors the start of such a redeployment but has not set a timetable.

Asked if senators who voted in favor of authorization bear some responsibility for the war in Iraq, Obama said the authorization allowed the administration to wage a war that has damaged national security. "I leave it up to those senators to make their own assessments in how they would do things differently or not," he said.

Obama's advisers expressed general satisfaction with the initial campaign swing. Still, they do not underestimate the difficulties ahead. Asked Monday what they regard as the most significant question Obama must answer in the coming months, communications director Robert Gibbs answered without hesitation: "People want to know if he can handle this."

Their hope is that the judgment of Obama's readiness will not be reached only through the customary measures of experience on the national stage or as a governor, the route taken by most successful presidential candidates.

Obama has had little time to develop a Senate record of great significance. His advisers count on the public to use a broader definition of readiness, one that they hope will prize the candidate's unusual biography as a community organizer and a professor of constitutional law at the University of Chicago as much as his record in the state Senate.

Obama raised the issue of his policy agenda during a news conference in Ames, Iowa, on Sunday, chiding reporters for concentrating more on how he looks in a swimsuit than on what he has said about health care or energy or ending the Iraq war.

Still, a speech to the Democratic National Committee, in which he seemed to dismiss the significance of policy white papers, has rippled through party circles as a sign that he believes other characteristics carry more weight with voters than coming off as a policy wonk.

Obama's advisers say his comment at the DNC was misunderstood, that it was a rhetorical way of saying leadership is needed more than new ideas to break the stalemate in Washington on domestic and international issues, and that he possesses that kind of leadership. He will talk at length about policy, they say, but as Gibbs put it: "I don't think you veer out of your way to all of a sudden make him this superman of white papers."

The trade-off of delving too deeply into the details of policy was evident at Obama's Cedar Rapids town hall meeting on Saturday. The energy drained out of the room quickly as the candidate responded to questions about himself and his views.

Part of the blame, campaign advisers say, fell on the meeting's moderator, but some in the audience said they had not seen enough of the inspirational leader they had first glimpsed in 2004 at the Democratic National Convention in Boston. They pointed to Obama's speeches elsewhere, particularly in Chicago on Sunday night, in which the candidate exhorted an audience in his adopted home town to use his campaign as the vehicle for a national movement to change the politics of the country.

At this point, Obama will be compared with Clinton in almost everything he does, from the level of his performance on the campaign trail to the effectiveness of his operation in building organizations in the early states and his ability to raise money in amounts large and small.

The campaigns are in fierce competition for activists, organizing talent, endorsements and money. Clinton's weekend trip to New Hampshire included public and private events that touched most parts of the state and many of its political elite. Obama's venture Monday was far more limited, and he said repeatedly that he will be back often. How well he wears over time will be the ultimate test.

Obama Has Easy Trip To New Hampshire (WP/AP)

By Philip Elliott

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

DURHAM, N.H. -- Sen. Barack Obama's first trip to New Hampshire as an official Democratic presidential candidate came Monday with packed audiences, enthusiastic crowds _ and scant scrutiny.

Obama, who entered the race on Saturday in his home state of Illinois, came to New Hampshire on the heels of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton. She faced criticism last weekend for not saying her vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq was a mistake.

Obama, by contrast, faced little of that skepticism. Even his sharpest questioners began by offering praise and support.

"He hasn't gotten into specifics, but that'll come," state Rep. Jeffrey Fontas said after a Nashua house party with 60 activists. "It's early, so we'll see more and more."

That house party in Nashua brought questions about:

_An Equal Pay Act. Obama helped a state measure during his time in Illinois but didn't commit to a national version.

_Childcare. Obama said it was a problem; he didn't offer specifics.

_The USA Patriot Act. Obama is against parts of it but didn't offer an alternative.

Even while the first-term senator from Illinois didn't have specific solutions, voters in this first-in-the-nation primary state gave him a pass.

"He takes time, he answers fully," said state Rep. Melanie Levesque. "I think we need people who can bring people together. He can do that. We're going to have a tough decision to make."

Obama called for a national solution to health care but stopped short of endorsing or rejecting proposals for mandatory insurance. He said more young people should consider teaching but stopped short of specific incentives.

Later Monday, at the University of New Hampshire in Durham, Obama discussed Iraq. "Unless we bring that war to a close, we cannot deal with all those other problems I just mentioned," he said. "Not only has it resulted in the tragic loss in our brave soldiers, but it means we're spending $400 billion rebuilding Iraq with money that could have been used here."

Obama did outline an energy plan _ a reduction in emissions, cap-and-trade plans for polluting industries, and development of biofuels including ethanol. He also repeated his stance on gay marriage _ that civil unions are fine, but marriage is a religious bond.

"I believe that every American has basic rights that have to be respected," said Obama, who noted that his parents perhaps broke the law when they entered into a biracial marriage in the 1960s.

A member of the university audience asked about his appeal to social conservatives. Obama said one of the best lessons he learned in politics was that he couldn't make 100 percent of voters happy. He then noted his friendship with the Rev. Rick Warren, who leads one of the nation's largest megachurches.

Michelle Obama Weighs In On Husband's Smoking (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

CHICAGO, Feb. 11 -- Michelle Obama says she agreed to help her husband run for president on one condition: That he finally quit smoking. For good.

"I hate it," she said on CBS' 60 Minutes, according to a transcript released Sunday. "That's why he doesn't do it anymore. I'm proud to say. I outed him -- I'm the one who outed him on the smoking. That was one of my prerequisites for, you know, entering this race, is that, you know, he couldn't be a smoking president."

DOJ_NMG_0131663

Obama has struggled to quit smoking for years, but friends have said he finally stopped several weeks ago. At the end of a press conference on Sunday, the Illinois senator returned to the podium when a reporter shouted out asking whether he was still smoking.

"No," he said. "I've been chewing Nicorette all day long."

And indeed, he was spotted chewing away on board "Obama One," as the chartered flight between Illinois and Iowa was called.

Might Obama sneak a puff in between trips on the road, as he has done in the past?

Less likely these days, his wife said.

"Please, America, watch," she said. "Keep an eye on him, and call me," she said laughing, "if you see him smoking."

The Obama Card (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

RECENT POLLS INDICATE that black voters favor Sen Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) by a substantial margin over Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), so political pundits are all a-titter, asking how this can be. The assumption, apparently, is that black support should cleave to the black man.

But then, is Obama really black?

Of course he is. But that fact has done nothing to prevent the awkward dissection of Obama's cultural and racial affinities. Is he half black? Is he African American? African and American? And, if he's black, is he black enough? It's tempting to shrug off these questions — most recently aired with grave concern Sunday on CBS' "60 Minutes" — as outdated, but they're not. They are instructive and revealing.

The question of whether the rising Democratic star is black enough really translates to: Whose side is he on? Whose agenda will he favor? By definition, those agendas are distinct. Obama's family history — his father was a black Kenyan, his mother a white Kansan, and he spent his childhood in places such as Hawaii and Indonesia — makes him the personification of post-racial, melting-pot America; he straddles races and communities commonly described as opposites — black or white, native or immigrant.

And, as he stands in that intersection fielding queries about his identity, he is really answering the question Americans are too afraid to ask one another: Can we trust each other yet?

Concrete issues around race and equality in America remain unresolved. One of the reasons Clinton has substantial black support is that her husband was adept at recognizing America's unhealed racial wounds, appointing a record number of African Americans to key positions during his presidency and earning the famous (if ridiculed) nickname from writer Toni Morrison as our "first black president."

Obama's challenge in luring blacks away from the former first lady will hinge not on his racial authenticity but on his ability to demonstrate that, despite his inexperience, he would be a better president. But since his political star began to shine as a state senator in Illinois, that authenticity has been under scrutiny, often by blacks.

In 2004, conservative commentator and former GOP presidential candidate Alan Keyes said Obama did not share the black experience because his heritage did not include slavery, the unifying experience for most African Americans. And last weekend, the Rev. Al Sharpton told 10,000 people gathered at Hampton University in Virginia that "just because you're our color doesn't make you our kind."

One person who is clear about Obama's identity is Obama himself. "If you look African American in this society, you're treated as an African American," he said on "60 Minutes."

As for blacks' support, he'll still have to earn it — just like he'll have to earn anyone else's.

A Blogger For Edwards Resigns After Complaints (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Days after Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards decided against firing two liberal bloggers with a history of inflammatory writing, one resigned last night with a blast at "right wing shills" for driving her out of the campaign.

Amanda Marcotte, whose writings were assailed as anti-Catholic, wrote yesterday on her blog that the Edwards camp had accepted her resignation. She blamed her most vocal critic, Bill Donohoe, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, writing that he "and his calvacade of right wing shills don't respect that a mere woman like me could be hired for my skills, and pretended that John Edwards had to be held accountable for some of my personal, non-mainstream views on religious influence on politics," which Marcotte described as being "anti-theocracy."

Marcotte charged that Donohoe had been running a "scorched earth campaign" against her and that he "made no bones about the fact that his intent is to 'silence' me. . . . It was creating a situation where I felt that every time I coughed, I was risking the Edwards campaign. . . . Bill Donohue doesn't speak for Catholics, he speaks for the right wing noise machine."

After days of indecision, Edwards said in a statement last week that he was "personally offended" by the writing of Marcotte and a second blogger, Melissa McEwan, but that he was keeping them on in the interest of giving everyone "a fair shake." The statement was coupled with carefully worded apologies from the two women toward anyone who may have been offended.

The former North Carolina senator was caught between conflicting pressures. On one hand, Marcotte and McEwan, like many writers in the freewheeling blogosphere, had written profane and offensive attacks on their detractors, using language that no presidential candidate would be comfortable defending. On the other, liberal bloggers were embracing their cause, depicting them as victims of an orchestrated conservative campaign to discredit them.

Every major presidential candidate has hired one or more bloggers as a way to tap into the network of online activists who can generate considerable buzz, and donations, in a campaign. But many of these bloggers have a long cybertrail that leaves them vulnerable to criticism in the more buttoned-down environment of national politics.

Among other things, Marcotte had written: "The Catholic church is not about to let something like compassion for girls get in the way of using the state as an instrument to force women to bear more tithing Catholics." She also questioned, in explicit language, what would have happened if the Virgin Mary had taken the emergency contraceptive called Plan B.

Last month, Marcotte wrote of the Duke University rape case: "Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair."

McEwan, whose status with the Edwards campaign is apparently unchanged, has referred to President Bush's conservative Christian supporters as his "wingnut Christofascist base."

In a statement last week, Donohoe said: "John Edwards is a decent man who has had his campaign tarnished by two anti-Catholic vulgar trash-talking bigots."

On her blog, Pandagon, Marcotte posted a letter from a group called Catholics for Free Choice, assailing Donohoe as, among other things, anti-woman and anti-gay.

Word of Marcotte's resignation came as Fox News Channel commentator Bill O'Reilly was leading his program with a full-throated attack on the two bloggers.

A conservative blogger, Michelle Malkin, wrote recently: "Seems that everyone but the Edwards campaign has tracked Marcotte's foul-mouthed nutroots diatribes. Or perhaps the Edwards team is well aware of her lunatic blogging and can't wait for her to unleash her unbridled anger on their spiffy website to give him a gritty, 'progressive' edge."

But a liberal blogger, Chris Bowers of MyDD.com, wrote that "Republican attempts to make Democrats look bad though guilt by association with us crazy bloggers were a miserable failure."

Donohoe and the Edwards campaign did not return calls seeking comment last night.

Permanent Campaign? It's A National Tradition (WP)

By Michael Kazin

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

How much American political history do political journalists know? Take the ubiquitous claim, or complaint, that the presidential campaign is starting earlier than ever. Today's candidates, marveled one reporter, are subjected to "longer, more intensive scrutiny" than in the past. Why can't they emulate their predecessors and wait until election year to make their pitches and raise their millions?

Like most evocations of a golden age, this is a myth. In fact, the nearly permanent campaign has been a feature of American politics since before the Civil War, when mass parties first emerged to contend for the votes of a mass electorate, albeit one then composed almost exclusively of white men. In a nation of ambitious entrepreneurs and furious battles for market share, the race for the presidency -- as with most sales efforts -- has rarely taken a break.

It began with Martin Van Buren. Two years before the 1828 vote, "The Little Magician" began to build the first modern party, soon named the Democrats, in part to avenge Andrew Jackson's unjust defeat in the previous election. Van Buren secured the allegiance of influential pols up and down the East Coast and helped establish pro-Jackson newspapers from New England to Louisiana. A decade later, William Henry Harrison, who hoped to be the new Whig Party's first nominee, began touring key states more than a year before the 1836 election. Soon after losing that race (to Van Buren), the 64-year-old military hero took to the road again. After all, his party rivals Henry Clay and Daniel Webster were doing it, too.

During the final decades of the 19th century, the pace of campaigns accelerated. Fast trains, fierce competition among big-city papers and two closely matched national parties all produced a bull market for candidates seeking press attention and needing to develop a network of loyalists.

The prize for the earliest start probably goes to William Jennings Bryan. A month after his loss to William McKinley in 1896, Bryan and his wife, Mary, issued a thick account of the campaign whose title -- "The First Battle" -- made his intentions clear. The book was a bestseller, and the post office in Bryan's home town of Lincoln, Neb., was flooded with letters from thousands of admirers. Bryan's wife and brother used the correspondence to start a huge card file of supporters. By the spring of 1897, Bryan was wooing Democratic insiders at state party conventions.

John F. Kennedy launched his presidential campaign with a different kind of book. "Profiles in Courage," an eloquent octet of senatorial portraits that JFK edited more than authored, helped lift him into contention for the vice presidential nomination in 1956. It won a Pulitzer Prize and turned Kennedy into a modern-day Bryan -- one of the country's most coveted speakers. By the time he officially declared his candidacy in 1960, JFK was leading in the polls.

Kennedy was also responsible for a critical innovation in the permanent campaign. Since Andrew Jackson's day, major candidates and their allies had built personal organizations long before any votes were cast. But once nominated, a man depended on the party apparatus to finance his race. In 1896, the Democrats spent all of $250,000 on Bryan's campaign. Not surprisingly, he lost to McKinley, for whom the redoubtable Mark Hanna raised at least 10 times as much money.

But Kennedy was graced with a wealthy father who'd been bankrolling him since his first run for Congress. A year before the 1960 Democratic convention, Joe Kennedy had already spent a million dollars on his son's campaign -- including a nine-room office near the Capitol where staffers called potential delegates and party bosses and entered the results on oversized wall maps.

For the past half-century, nearly every serious candidate has followed the Kennedys' lead. Launching a presidential bid became akin to starting a mid-size firm, complete with accountants, lawyers and a communications team whose "rapid responses" many old-line corporations would envy. The Internet has only made it easier and quicker to contact voters; the essentials of the campaign business were in place long before the first candidate hired the first webmaster or reprimanded the first controversial blogger.

Whether or not this nonstop sales effort is good for representative democracy, it would take a galvanic reform movement to divorce them. Several years ago Richard Gephardt, who knew the rules of the game as well as anyone, joked about a poll that found "Seventy percent of Americans neither consume nor wish to consume politics." For now, perhaps all one can do is demand that the quality of the goods live up to the hype on the packaging.

It's His Party, He'll Dish If He Wants To (WP)

By Peter Baker
The Washington Post, February 13, 2007
WHAT A PARTY!
My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators, and Other Wild Animals
By Terry McAuliffe,
with Steve Kettmann
Thomas Dunne Books,
416 pp., $24.95

At the very least, there is one totally true statement in Terence R. McAuliffe's new memoir: "This is my book," he writes, "and obviously I've done my best to make myself look good."

As for the rest, even the author warns that he's an Irish storyteller given to blarney. But taken with that caveat, "What a Party!" is a rollicking ride through the world of celebrity, fundraising and politics that certainly entertains if not illuminates.

It's hard not to imagine downing beers in a bar as McAuliffe tells war stories about how a boy from Syracuse grew up to become President Bill Clinton's running buddy and the Democrats' most fabled fundraiser. To say he would do anything for a political donation would be putting it mildly. He once wrestled an alligator for a contribution and later belted out "Will You Love Me Tomorrow?" from a casino stage for another.

By the time he found himself inside the Clinton orbit, he was traveling in rarefied circles -- and he makes sure to document them all. There's Terry lunching at the Palm with Jack Nicholson, vacationing with Oscar de la Renta and hunting with the king of Spain. There's Terry dining at the White House with Elizabeth Taylor and Sophia Loren. There's Terry watching a movie with the Clintons at Camp David while Ben Affleck and Gwyneth Paltrow make out on a couch.

Most of all, there's Terry bashing the Republicans over and over while saving the Democrats from certain ruin. This is, in the end, a partisan's book in a partisan age, perhaps explaining why it debuted at No. 1 on the Washington Post bestseller list.

Those who think that Bill and Hillary Clinton walk on water and that President Bush and Vice President Cheney are demon seed will find it heartening. Those seeking nuance should look elsewhere.

As Hillary Clinton launches her own campaign for the White House, McAuliffe offers little insight into the most fascinating and complex political family of a generation. He recounts in loving detail endless golf outings and all-night board and card games with Bill Clinton -- he spent so many late hours in the president's hotel suite during a trip to Seoul playing a form of Scrabble that South Korean security agents suspected they were gay lovers.

But McAuliffe reveals nothing new about what makes either Clinton tick, nor does he explore any shades of gray in these Shakespearean political figures. Whitewater, the Lincoln Bedroom fundraising, the Monica Lewinsky saga, the last-minute pardons? Really all just Republican perfidy. The most inside moment he discloses is watching television with the Clintons as the first lady channel-surfs, unable to find a station not broadcasting something about her husband's misdeeds, until she finally settles on ESPN.

If unflinchingly loyal to the Clintons, though, McAuliffe vents about other Democrats, particularly the party's last two presidential nominees. No doubt he is channeling the Clintons when he grouses about Al Gore sidelining Bill Clinton in 2000 and John F. Kerry not fighting back harder against Bush in 2004. As chairman of the Democratic National Committee, McAuliffe was never invited to a Kerry strategy session and discovered only afterward that the campaign had not spent $15 million, a decision he called "gross incompetence."

He also dishes on Barbra Streisand, who once held a fundraiser for the Clinton library but hates dogs so much that she would not allow even the Secret Service bomb-sniffers onto her property.

"No dogs are coming on my property," she insisted.

"No dogs, no Bill Clinton," McAuliffe replied.

So she relented. And then screamed at him when she stepped in the inevitable byproduct.

An all-too-common experience in politics these days.

Oliver North's Tiff With The Smithsonian (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

The Smithsonian Institution rejected a request from Oliver North to film a stand-up in front of the Enola Gay, the B-29 that dropped the first atomic bomb. This is the latest flap in the Smithsonian's development of programming for a cable television network.

North, who hosts a Fox News Channel series called "War Stories," returned fire, condemning the Smithsonian's decision. He said in an opinion column that the museum's action raises questions about the propriety of the contract between Showtime Networks and the Smithsonian, which limits access of film crews.

Claire Brown, a spokeswoman for the National Air and Space Museum, which displays the Enola Gay at its Northern Virginia annex, said she held a series of discussions with North's producers and thought the door was open to more talks. "We were surprised to read the column because we consider the request to be pending," Brown said. She said she received the request Jan. 22.

North's column first appeared on Fox's Web site and was reprinted by the Washington Times on Sunday. North, a retired U.S. Marine and a key figure in the Iran-contra episode during the Reagan administration, is now a highly successful commentator and author.

"In a series of written, e-mail, telephone and personal exchanges with Smithsonian officials we explained what we wanted to do, how we would do it and offered to compensate the museum for any expenses incurred," North wrote in his column. "What we didn't know was that the institution's management had concocted a secret, backroom deal with Showtime -- granting the premium cable TV channel, owned by media giant Viacom, exclusive rights to control all but 'incidental usage' of all video footage shot at the Smithsonian."

The museum did turn down the request initially, Brown said, explaining that the application was asking for "more than incidental use" of the site and the plane. The Showtime contract, which limits such use, has angered many independent filmmakers.

After North's producers appealed the first decision, Brown said she "offered the producer the alternative of shooting film at Air & Space's Udvar-Hazy Center [near Dulles Airport]. We also asked the producer to contact us in writing with any questions. We have not heard back."

In essence, the Smithsonian was telling the show they could film the plane but couldn't film a commentator talking in front of it.

"We were commencing production of a documentary on nuclear weapons tentatively titled, 'From the Manhattan Project to Tehran' and wanted to shoot a few minutes of the videotape of the Enola Gay . . . . Our requests fell into a bureaucratic black hole," North wrote.

The Courage Of Others' Convictions (NYT)

The music industry awarded an armload of Grammys to the Dixie Chicks on Sunday night, in what was celebrated as a blow for freedom of speech as much as tunefulness. The endorsement was about three years too late. The awards — including for the trio's fittingly titled album "Taking the Long Way" and the song "Not Ready to Make Nice" — ended a desolate period in which their music was boycotted and banned by country music stations, their CDs were burned and smashed, and group members' lives were threatened.

The Chicks' offense was geographic but labeled unpatriotic. The lead singer, Natalie Maines, told a 2003 London concert crowd that she was ashamed that President Bush was from her home state, Texas. She briefly apologized to fans, then quickly took it back, reclaiming her right to oppose the Iraq war and criticize the president.

Had Ms. Maines been a senator at the time, she might now be a shoo-in candidate for president.

The gutsy group beat back the campaign by conglomerate radio chains to obliterate them and did it with little support from fellow artists, who apparently feared getting Dixie-Chicked themselves. The band reinvented itself, taking on a pop style, reclaiming some old fans and finding new ones — a lot of them. Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's polls plummeted to Nixonian levels. Suddenly, the industry found the courage to really, really like them again.

We've seen this sort of political calibration by the arts before. Lillian Hellman scalded an Academy Awards ceremony in 1977, 25 years after she defied the House Un-American Activities Committee. The film industry, she said, responded to Washington's red-baiting and blacklisting with all the "force and courage of a bowl of mashed potatoes."

There must be a Dixie Chicks song in there somewhere.

Democratic Tax Cutter (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

Arkansas Governor Mike Beebe may not be a man from Hope, but the newly elected Democrat is becoming a voice for tax relief within his party.

Last year he campaigned on cutting in half his state's 6% sales tax on groceries. Last week he made good on the promise by striking a deal with a reluctant Democratic legislature. His compromise also repeals income taxes on the poor and cuts sales taxes that manufacturers pay on their utility bills. All told, taxpayers will save $319 million over two years, or what the Governor calls "the largest tax decrease in the history of the state."

The Arkansas Policy Foundation estimates that a family of four will save $234 a year on grocery bills alone, a significant savings in a state where the average taxpayer shells out $3,088 a year in state and local taxes. And it's all the better that the Governor also resisted the legislature's impulse to lard up the state's tax code with tax credits.

The Tax Foundation reports that Arkansas is the 27th most taxed state in the nation with a heavier tax burden than neighboring Texas and Tennessee, neither of which has an income tax and rank 44th and 47th. The state is expected to have an $840 million surplus this year and could therefore afford additional cuts in its 6% general sales tax and 7% tax on income over $30,100. The state's last Governor -- potential Republican Presidential candidate Mike Huckabee -- is best known for losing 100 pounds while in office. That Mr. Beebe is turning his attention instead to curbing the state's appetite is a sign of progress.

Pace Demurs On Accusation Of Iran (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said yesterday that he has no information indicating Iran's government is directing the supply of lethal weapons to Shiite insurgent groups in Iraq.

"We know that the explosively formed projectiles are manufactured in Iran," Pace told Voice of America during a visit to Australia. "What I would not say is that the Iranian government, per se, knows about this."

"It is clear that Iranians are involved, and it's clear that materials from Iran are involved," he continued, "but I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit."

Pace's comments came a day after U.S. military officials in Baghdad alleged that the "highest levels" of the Iranian government have directed use of weapons that are killing U.S. troops in Iraq. No information was provided to substantiate the charge. Administration officials yesterday deflected requests for more details, even as they repeatedly implied Tehran's involvement.

In an interview yesterday with ABC's "Good Morning America," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the administration is "pointing fingers at others" when its troop presence in Iraq is the source of most of the country's problems.

While not denying that Iranian weapons may have been found in Iraq, Ahmadinejad implied that if they were, it was not his government's doing. "Can Americans close their long borders?" he asked, noting that "millions" of Iranians cross the border into neighboring Iraq each year. "The position of our government . . . and the position of the Revolutionary Guard is also the same: We are opposed to any kind of conflict in Iraq."

On Sunday, in a briefing for reporters, U.S. military officials in Baghdad offered a slide show and examples of armor-piercing explosives that they said bore writing and serial numbers from Iran. Briefers, speaking anonymously for what they said were security reasons, said the weapons had caused the deaths of 170 U.S. soldiers in the past two years. No cameras were allowed in the briefing room, and a transcript of the session was not provided.

The officials also showed what they said were false identity cards of Iranians whom U.S. forces had recently detained in Iraq. The men were described as members of the Quds Force, an elite unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard that U.S. officials believe is under the control of Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

"We have been able to determine that this material," especially sophisticated roadside explosives called explosively formed penetrators, "is coming from the IRGC-Quds Force," said a briefer, identified only as a senior defense analyst. Direction for operations using the weaponry, he said, came from the "highest levels" of Iran's government.

Asked by reporters yesterday to provide more information on the charge, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "The Iranians are up to their eyeballs in this activity." He called the Baghdad presentation a "very strong circumstantial case," saying he was "not going to try to embellish that briefing" and "any reasonable person . . . would draw the same conclusions."

White House spokesman Tony Snow offered similar responses. "Let me put it this way," he said. "There's not a whole lot of freelancing in the Iranian government, especially when it comes to something like that."

Pressed repeatedly, Snow answered, "Look, the Department of Defense is doing this. What I'm telling you is, you guys want to get those questions answered, you need to go to the Pentagon."

A call to the Defense Intelligence Agency brought a referral to the main Pentagon press office. That office referred a caller to the Washington office of the Multi-National Force-Iraq, which responded with an e-mailed copy of Sunday's briefing slides -- containing no mention of the "highest levels" allegation and a request for questions in writing. Written questions brought no response. An official from the Pentagon Joint Staff said last night that Pace had seen the briefing slides but had "no personal knowledge of any senior involvement by senior Iranian officials."

Members of Congress have repeatedly asked whether the administration is planning a repeat in Iran of its 2003 invasion of Iraq. Intelligence findings that Iraq's Saddam Hussein had stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction and had close ties to al-Qaeda turned out to be almost entirely false.

Sunday's briefing on Iran, originally scheduled for last month, had been delayed as officials said they were trying to avoid "overstating" what they could prove.

"There are certainly those who are in favor" of war with Iran, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) said Sunday of the Bush administration on CBS's "Face the Nation." "We've seen that in the past that they would like nothing more than to build a case for that."

In recent weeks, the administration has denied any war plans, saying it is committed to a strategy of pressure and diplomacy against Iran's nuclear activities, operations in Iraq and other aggression.

In an interview yesterday with C-SPAN, President Bush described his policy as "comprehensive" and complained that charges he is planning to attack Iran are politically motivated and "typical Washington."

Bush Softens Rhetoric On Iran Relations (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, February 13, 2007

President Bush on Monday sought to dampen speculation about a U.S. military strike on Iran as the Islamic republic's president softened his tone, too, and said he wanted dialogue rather than confrontation.

Bush, in an interview at the White House with C-SPAN, dismissed talk of a U.S. military strike on Iran as political chatter. He also said there is still a chance to resolve, through diplomacy, the standoff over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

Still, Bush called Tehran a "belligerent" regime with nuclear ambitions that will lead Iranians into isolation.

"The Iranian people are good, honest, decent people and they've got a government that is belligerent, loud, noisy, threatening — a government which is in defiance of the rest of the world and says, 'We want a nuclear weapon,'" Bush said. "So our objective is to keep the pressure so rational folks will show up and say it's not worth the isolation."

The United States and Iran are at odds on two fronts: the standoff over nuclear weapons and U.S. accusations that Iran is meddling in Iraq.

The U.S. claims Iran has been arming Shiites in Iraq with sophisticated, armor-piercing roadside bombs, which have killed more than 170 troops from the U.S.-led coalition. Tehran denied it gave sophisticated weapons to militants to attack U.S. forces.

In recent weeks, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, known for his inflammatory anti-Western rhetoric, has taken a milder approach to diplomacy. He insisted on Monday that turmoil in Iraq is bad for his country and that dialogue — not force — was the solution to the region's conflicts.

"We shy away from any kind of conflict, any kind of bloodshed," Ahmadinejad told ABC's "Good Morning America." "As we have said repeatedly, we think that the world problems can be solved through dialogue, through the use of logic and a sense of friendship. There is no need for the use of force."

The change in tone comes at a time when domestic criticism of the controversial leader has increased, with both reformers and fellow conservatives complaining that Ahmadinejad spends too much time criticizing the United States and Israel, and not enough on internal issues such as Iran's struggling economy.

In a nearly half-hour interview on a range of subjects, Bush also was asked how he thinks Iraqi children will view the United States in 15 to 20 years.

"If we can help this government be able to create the conditions so that a mother can grow up — raise their child in peace, I think people will look back and say they'd be thankful of America," Bush said. "If America leaves, however, before the job is done, I think there will be great resentment toward America."

Joint Chiefs Chairman Sees No Evidence Of Meddling By Iran's Regime (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - A day after the U.S. military charged Iran's government with shipping powerful explosive devices to Shiite Muslim fighters in Iraq to use against American troops, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said Monday that he hasn't seen any intelligence to support the claim.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace's comment could make it harder for the Bush administration, its credibility about Iran questioned because of its false pre-war claims about Saddam Hussein, to make its case that Iranian meddling in Iraq is fueling sectarian violence and causing U.S. casualties.

At a briefing Sunday in Baghdad, U.S. military officials said the al-Quds Force, an elite Iranian paramilitary organization, is sending arms into Iraq that include bombs that shoot molten metal jets through the armor of American tanks and Humvees.

They said these "explosively formed projectiles," or EFPs, have killed 170 U.S. troops and wounded more than 600 others and are "coming from the highest level of the Iranian government."

Asked about the briefing during a visit Monday to Canberra, Australia, Pace said he couldn't substantiate the assertion that the clerical regime in Tehran is shipping such devices to Shiite militias in Iraq.

"We know that the explosively formed projectiles are manufactured in Iran. What I would not say is that the Iranian government per se knows about this," Pace replied. "It is clear that Iranians are involved and it is clear that materials from Iran are involved. But I would not say based on what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit."

Neither the White House nor the Pentagon responded to requests for an explanation of the apparent contradiction between the nation's highest-ranking military officer and his subordinates in Baghdad.

A senior U.S. intelligence official told McClatchy Newspapers that U.S. intelligence agencies believe the al-Quds Force, a component of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, couldn't conduct such a major undertaking without the knowledge of top leaders.

"Based on our understanding of the Iranian system and the history of the IRGC (Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps) operations, the IC (intelligence community) assesses that activity this extensive on the part of the Quds Force would not be conducted without approval from top leaders in Iran," the senior intelligence official said.

The official requested anonymity because intelligence on Iran is highly classified. But his remarks, translated from intelligence parlance, indicate that the U.S. has no conclusive evidence that Iran's leaders have directed the arms deliveries, as one briefer in Baghdad conceded on Sunday, but instead has concluded that they probably approved them.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denied Monday that Iran is supplying weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq or stirring up violence by majority Shiites against minority Sunni Muslims, contending that the U.S. military presence is to blame for the bloodshed.

"We are asking for peace, we are asking for security," he said on ABC's "Good Morning America." "We are opposed to any kind of conflict and also the presence of foreign forces in Iraq."

"The U.S. administration and Bush are used to accusing others. The fact that you are showing us some pieces of papers and you call them documents - they do not solve any problem," said Ahmadinejad. "There should be a court to prove the case and verify the case."

President Bush and his top lieutenants contend that Tehran is supporting Shiite militias that have seized control of much of southern Iraq, attacked American forces and driven minority Sunnis out of large areas of Baghdad in response to Sunni insurgent attacks.

In response, U.S. forces have detained at least seven Iranian operatives in Iraq, and Bush has ordered a second U.S. aircraft carrier task force into the Persian Gulf.

Democratic lawmakers and other administration critics, including some former senior U.S. officials, are worried that the White House may be exaggerating its case against Tehran to justify a military strike on Iran's suspected nuclear weapons facilities.

White House spokesman Tony Snow reiterated on Monday that the United States has no plans to attack Iran.

"I don't know how much clearer we can be: We're not getting ready for war in Iran," said Snow. "What we are doing is protecting our own people."

The administration and its European allies believe that Iran's nuclear facilities are being used to develop nuclear weapons. Iran insists that its program is strictly for civilian power generation.

Skeptics Doubt U.S. Evidence On Iran Action In Iraq (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 — Three weeks after promising it would show proof of Iranian meddling in Iraq, the Bush administration has laid out its evidence — and received in return a healthy dose of skepticism.

The response from Congressional and other critics speaks volumes about the current state of American credibility, four years after the intelligence controversy leading up to the Iraq war. To pre-empt accusations that the charges against Iran were politically motivated, the administration rejected the idea of a high-level presentation, relying instead on military and intelligence officers to make its case in a background briefing in Baghdad.

Even so, critics have been quick to voice doubts. Representative Silvestre Reyes of Texas, the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, suggested that the White House was more interested in sending a message to Tehran than in backing up serious allegations with proof. And David Kay, who once led the hunt for illicit weapons in Iraq, said the grave situation in Iraq should have taught the Bush administration to put more of a premium on transparency when it comes to intelligence.

“If you want to avoid the perception that you’ve cooked the books, you come out and make the charges publicly,” Mr. Kay said.

Administration officials say their approach was carefully calibrated to focus on concerns that Iran is providing potent weapons used against American troops in Iraq, not to ignite a wider war. “We’re trying to strike the right tone here,” a senior administration official said Monday. “It would have raised the rhetoric to major decibel levels if we had had a briefing in Washington.”

At the State Department, the Pentagon and the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, officials had anticipated resistance to their claims. They settled on an approach that sidelined senior officials including Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, and John D. Negroponte, who until last week was the director of national intelligence. By doing so, they avoided the inevitable comparisons to the since-discredited presentation that Secretary of State Colin L. Powell made to the United Nations Security Council in 2003 asserting that Iraq had illicit weapons.

The White House and the State Department both made clear on Monday that they endorsed the findings presented in Baghdad. Asked for direct evidence linking Iran’s leadership to the weapons, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said: “Let me put it this way. There’s not a whole lot of freelancing in the Iranian government, especially when its comes to something like that.”

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said: “While they presented a circumstantial case, I would put to you that it was a very strong circumstantial case. The Iranians are up to their eyeballs in this activity, I think, very clearly based on the information that was provided over the weekend in Baghdad.”

In Australia, however, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters that he “would not say” that Iran’s leadership was aware of or condoned the attacks. “It is clear that Iranians are involved, and it’s clear that materials from Iran are involved, but I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit,” according to an account posted on the Voice of America Web site.

An Iranian government spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, has sought in denying the charges to exploit the lingering doubts about American credibility. “The United States has a long history of fabricating evidence,” Mr. Hosseini, a Foreign Ministry official, told reporters in Tehran.

The administration’s scramble over how to present its evidence started in January, after President Bush accused Iran of meddling in Iraq. Iran’s ambassador to Iraq, Hassan Kazemi Qumi, demanded that the United States present its evidence, and Mr. Khalilzad, the American ambassador in Baghdad, responded that America would “oblige him by having something done in the coming days.”

That set Bush administration officials racing to produce a briefing that would hold up to scrutiny. Military officials in Baghdad developed the first briefing, a wide-ranging dossier that contained dozens of slides about Iranian activities inside Iraq, which was then sent to Washington for review, administration officials said.

But after a careful vetting by intelligence officials, senior administration officials, including National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, concluded that there were aspects of the briefing that could not be supported by solid intelligence. They sent the briefing back to Baghdad to be shored up, a senior official said.

The evidence that military officials presented Sunday was a stripped-down version of the original presentation, focusing almost entirely on the weapons, known as explosively formed penetrators, and the evidence that Iran is supplying the weapons to Shiite groups.

Both Democratic and Republican officials on Capitol Hill said that while they do not doubt that the weapons are being used to attack American troops, and that some of those weapons are being shipped into Iraq from Iran, they are still uncertain whether the weapons were being shipped into Iraq on the orders of Iran’s leaders.

Several experts agreed. “I’m not doubting the provenance of the weapons, but rather, the issue of what it says about Iranian policy and whether Iran’s leaders are aware of it,” said George Perkovich, a nonproliferation specialist at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

Philip D. Zelikow, who until December was the top aide to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said American politics and the increased unpopularity of the war in Iraq is obscuring the larger issue of the Iran evidence, which he described as “abundant and so multifaceted.”

“People have lost their moorings,” Mr. Zelikow said. He said the administration was trying to overcome public distrust by asking, in essence, “Don’t you trust our soldiers?”

Iran Seen As Key To Untangling Iraq (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

TEHRAN — Iranian officials Monday called U.S. accusations that Tehran is arming Shiite militias in Iraq with tank-piercing explosives "unfounded," and said that Iran was committed to joining a regional effort to halt the tightening spiral of violence.

But the back-and-forth charges between Tehran and Washington highlight a growing recognition of Iran's substantial influence on its next-door neighbor and its ability, if nothing else, to prevent the U.S. from untangling the political conflicts that have plunged Iraq into mounting sectarian warfare.

Here in the capital of the Islamic Republic, it is an open secret that Iran is operating a quiet network of influence in Iraq that it can use either to help settle the conflict or to prevent the U.S. from reaching its goals there. Iranian officials say they are committed to quelling the instability they see as a threat to their own security.

Indeed, Iranians say, their image of an ideal settlement in Iraq looks remarkably like America's: a strong, democratically elected government in Baghdad — that would, by dint of Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority, be a natural ally of Tehran — an end to the violence, and preservation of territorial integrity.

But with one important exception.

"The difference is Iran doesn't want to see the U.S. claim victory. The U.S. shouldn't come out of this battle victorious. And Iranians perceive that the dominant part of that objective has been achieved," Tehran political scientist Nasser Hadian said. "It is no longer plausible for the U.S. to claim victory in Iraq."

American defense and intelligence officials' claims to have found Iranian-manufactured weapons in Iraq, including armor-piercing projectiles believed to have killed about 170 troops from the U.S.-led coalition, have placed a heightened focus on the Bush administration's long-standing allegations of Iranian involvement in the war.

In Washington, a U.S. official acknowledged Monday that the U.S. material formed a "circumstantial" case, but said military commanders in Baghdad provided solid evidence of Iranian involvement.

"So while they presented a circumstantial case, I would put to you that it was a very strong circumstantial case," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "The Iranians are up to their eyeballs in this activity, very clearly, based on the information that was provided over the weekend in Baghdad."

In Australia, the Voice of America reported, U.S. Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters Monday that there was no proof that Iran's government was involved in providing bomb-making materials to Iraqi militants.

"It is clear that Iranians are involved, and it's clear that materials from Iran are involved, but I would not say by what I know that the Iranian government clearly knows or is complicit," Pace was quoted as saying.

In Iran, the dispute serves to spotlight a belief that America is using what Tehran views as its natural influence on its neighbor as an opportunity to use Iran as a scapegoat for U.S. failures in its Iraq policy.

"Right now, I think the United States wants to find someone to share this loss. Because they have indeed lost," said Mosayeb Naimi, a Tehran newspaper editor with long experience in the Arab world.

"The problem in Iraq is not just the Mahdi army militia or Al Qaeda or any of the other military groups. It's [that] the Americans lack a strategy to govern Iraq," he said. "Today, many of the groups of Iraq are making war against each other, and it's clear that Iran is more worried about security and safety in Iraq than the United States is. Because when violence increases in Iraq, it means the violence comes to Iran also. So it's not unreasonable that Iran is increasing its [presence] there."

Iranian officials went out of their way to discount the evidence of weapons without issuing a specific, direct denial.

"They condemn us for making problems in Iraq, but they don't have any documentary proof," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hossaini told reporters.

"Lots of this evidence is fake, artificial. For example, when they wanted to start a war in Iraq, they made plenty of evidence that there were lots of weapons in Iraq, though the investigators of the International Atomic Energy Agency said they couldn't find any weapons in Iraq," he said. "Right now they're using weapons [with certain markings], but it doesn't prove where these weapons came from."

But political scientist Hadian said it was relatively well known that Tehran had developed a substantial network of support and resources in Iraq for use as a deterrent should the U.S. threaten aggression against Iran.

"Iran has developed an important infrastructure in Iraq. Intelligence, security, organization, people, weapons, networks, resources," he said. "But these are principally for deterrence. In case anything happens. In case of a U.S. attack, these are there. And in fact they would like very much for the U.S. to know about it. If the U.S. doesn't know the infrastructure is there, it's not going to play the role it's supposed to play."

At the same time, Hadian said, it is not credible to believe that Iran has engaged in large-scale weapons deliveries to the Sunni-led insurgents in Iraq who have been responsible for the bulk of U.S. casualties, when Iran's primary goal is to prevent instability and protect the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad.

"They're not going to support Al Qaeda and the Baathists in Iraq," he said, noting that both these groups are Sunni. "Because they're the ones who are killing the Shia. Yes, they're killing the Americans. But they're killing the Shia. By no means is it acceptable for Iran to support groups in Iraq who want to destabilize a friendly government and kill Shias." Nor is it likely that any large-scale weapons supplies are being provided, he added.

"I just cannot buy the argument that Iranians are systematically [supplying these weapons]," Hadian said. "Maybe one here and there, one Shia individual or somebody from here sent some stuff to the Shia who kills Americans or Sunnis. That's not systematic, that's not a policy, that's not a decision at the highest level of government to do that."

In Baghdad, a lawmaker close to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said the Iraqi leader visited Tehran several months ago and asked Iranian officials not to allow arms and support to cross the border into the hands of militants.

Officials there, he said, are surprised that Washington is only now bringing it up. "These are not new allegations," said Sami Askari, a Shiite member of parliament close to Maliki. "I am sure that the Americans are escalating this matter with Iran during this interval because of domestic pressures in the U.S."

Askari and other government officials accuse the Bush administration of using Iraq as a battlefield to settle old scores with Iran and prevent implementation of the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan U.S. panel that in December advocated diplomacy to deal with Iran's regional ambitions.

Iran has frequently said it is willing to be part of a regional effort to end the conflict in Iraq and prevent it from spilling into neighboring countries. Analysts here said Iran has valuable cards to play, without which a lasting settlement may not be possible — namely, helping achieve a better deal for the minority Sunnis in Iraq, who dominated the government before Saddam Hussein was toppled in the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"Iran can persuade the Kurds and Shias to accept a deal with the Sunnis which would give Sunnis, disproportionate to their population, the wealth and power. That's what Iran can do," Hadian said.

Naimi, the newspaper editor, said Iran's clerics, in conjunction with senior Muslim clerics in Saudi Arabia and Egypt, could also order an end to sectarian violence in a manner that might stand a reasonable chance of limiting Sunni-Shiite warfare.

As for the U.S., Iranians say, it should establish a fixed timetable for withdrawing from Iraq, not necessarily immediately, and convene a regional conference that, ideally, would tackle not only Iraq but the Iranian nuclear issue and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"One way to look at our whole nuclear issue is that the United States has not been successful in Iraq," said Abbas Maleki, a former Iranian deputy foreign minister. "One way to solve it is to change the question from Iran to another part of the world — to arrange a new front for battle."

Iran's Leader Disputes U.S. Charges On Militias (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 12 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday dismissed American accusations that Iran was arming Shiite militants in Iraq, saying Iran was opposed to "any kind of conflict" in Iraq.

"Our position for Iraq is very clear," he said in an interview with Diane Sawyer on "Good Morning America" on ABC. "We are asking for peace, we are asking for security and we will be sad to see people get killed, no matter who they are."

In a news briefing on Sunday, American officials in Iraq showed journalists the kinds of weapons they said had been made by Iranian factories and had been used to kill 170 Americans in the last three years. They accused Iranian leaders of authorizing the smuggling of such weapons into Iraq.

Mr. Ahmadinejad refused to address the accusation directly in the interview, but he rejected the charges by saying the Americans were trying to find a scapegoat for their problems in Iraq.

"I think that Americans have made a mistake in Iraq and unfortunately are losing, and this is a shame for Americans of course, and that's why they are trying to point their fingers to other people, and pointing fingers to others will not solve the problem," he said.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, was more direct in denying the accusations on Monday at his weekly news conference. He called the charges baseless and said the evidence had been fabricated.

"Such accusations cannot be relied upon or be presented as evidence," he said. "The United States has a long history of fabricating evidence. Such charges are unacceptable."

Tensions between Iran and the United States have increased in recent months over Iran's nuclear program and its role in Iraq. The United States has accused Iran of having a secret nuclear weapons program and of arming Shiite militants in Iraq. Iran says that its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes and that it favors stability in Iraq.

Iran, which is governed by Shiite clerics and like Iraq has a Shiite majority, has close ties with Iraqi Shiites, many of whom lived in Iran in exile when Saddam Hussein was in power in Baghdad.

In the interview, Mr. Ahmadinejad said it was the Americans, not the Iranians, who were destabilizing Iraq, and called on them to leave. "We are opposed to any conflict and also the presence of foreign forces in Iraq," he said, "and that's why we are opposed to the Americans."

As for American assertions that serial numbers linked weapons in Iraq to their origins in Iran, he seemed unconcerned, suggesting that there was more overt evidence of American force in Iraq.

"I can give you figures and numbers, which are known: more than 160,000 American troops are in Iraq," he said, adding, "What are they doing in Iraq?"

Mr. Ahmadinejad also referred obliquely to American raids in Baghdad and the northern city of Erbil in which Iranian officials were picked up and accused of working with extremist groups to plan attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

"It was childish for the U.S. government to do something like that to arrest defenseless people," he said.

He said Iran was willing to provide "intellectual support" to the Iraqi government and to the Americans to help end the conflict in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0131674

Mr. Ahmadinejad brushed off the possibility of a military strike by the United States against Iran. "There are wise people in the U.S. that would stop such illegal actions," he said, "but our position is clear. Our nation has made it clear that anyone who wants to attack our country will be severely punished."

Iran Denies Sending Explosives To Iraq (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

Iran on Monday rejected US accusations that it had supplied armour-piercing explosives used to kill American troops in Iraq.

President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad said Washington was trying to find "excuses" to prolong the presence of US forces.

"There should be no foreigners there in Iraq – and then you will see that you have peace in Iraq," he told ABC television in Tehran. "There should be a court to...verify the case," he told the station's Good Morning America. "The position of our government...is also the same – we are opposed to any kind of conflict in Iraq."

The president was responding to claims from a senior US defence official in Baghdad on Sunday who said that armour-penetrating explosives that had killed 170 "coalition forces" were of Iranian manufacture. A second US official said the US assessment was that the supply and training of Iraqi insurgents by Tehran was decided by the "highest levels of the Iranian government".

Mohammad-Ali Hosseini, the foreign ministry spokesman, said the US had a "long history in fabricating evidence" and that the charges were "unacceptable".

He added that Iran opposed "any intervention in Iraq's internal affairs...[as] a weakening of the popular Iraqi government".

American officials have long suggested that Iran was involved in supporting violence in Iraq, but Sunday's announcement, supported by the presentation of bomb fragments, came after a stepping-up of US rhetoric against Iran and the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier, the John G Stennis, to the waters off southern Iran.

The UN Security Council deadline for Iran to suspend most of its nuclear programme runs out later this month.

Mr Hosseini reiterated on Monday that Iran was ready for negotiations, even over the suspension of uranium enrichment. Officials in Tehran critical of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad suspect the US allegations over Iran's role in Iraq are designed to thwart any possibility of compromise.

A senior reformist told the FT in Tehran that "everything in the region...[was] now overshadowed by US-Iran tensions". "The wise men must increase their efforts," he said. "I was alarmed when I heard the US accusations on the television – they were very direct. My fear is that this is all part of preparation for at least keeping open the real option of attacks on Iran."

The explosively formed penetrator, or EFP – the device that US officials say is evidence of Iranian support for Iraqi militants – is one of the most feared weapons for US forces in Iraq. It is also a device that US soldiers say is exclusively associated with Shia militias.

The device is a refinement of the shaped charge technology which has been used to destroy tanks and other military vehicles since the second world war. US officials said the weapons found in Iraq created a deadly slug of molten metal that could tear through armour.

They said the signature part of the weapon linking it with Iran was the machining process but did not provide any further detail.

Too Late To Halt Iran's Nuclear Bomb, EU Is Told (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Fidelius Schmid

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

Iran will be able to develop enough weapons-grade material for a nuclear bomb and there is little that can be done to prevent it, an internal European Union document has concluded.

In an admission of the international community's failure to hold back Iran's nuclear ambitions, the document – compiled by the staff of Javier Solana, EU foreign policy chief – says the atomic programme has been delayed only by technical limitations rather than diplomatic pressure. "Attempts to engage the Iranian administration in a negotiating process have not so far succeeded," it states.

The downbeat conclusions of the "reflection paper" – seen by the Financial Times – are certain to be seized on by advocates of military action, who fear that Iran will be able to produce enough fissile material for a bomb over the next two to three years. Tehran insists its purposes are purely peaceful.

"At some stage we must expect that Iran will acquire the capacity to enrich uranium on the scale required for a weapons programme," says the paper, dated February 7 and circulated to the EU's 27 national governments ahead of a foreign ministers meeting yesterday.

"In practice . . . the Iranians have pursued their programme at their own pace, the limiting factor being technical difficulties rather than resolutions by the UN or the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"The problems with Iran will not be resolved through economic sanctions alone."

The admission is a blow to hopes that a deal with Iran can be reached and comes at a sensitive time, when tensions between the US and Tehran are rising. Its implication that sanctions will prove ineffective will also be unwelcome to EU diplomats. Only yesterday the bloc agreed on how to apply United Nations sanctions on Tehran, overcoming a dispute between Britain and Spain over Gibraltar.

Iran has set up several hundred centrifuges to enrich uranium, a process that can yield both nuclear fuel and weapons-grade material. But analysts say that Iran is behind schedule on plans to install 3,000 centrifuges to produce enriched uranium on a larger scale.

Last year Ernst Uhrlau, the head of German intelligence, said Tehran would not be able to produce enough material for a nuclear bomb before 2010 and would only be able to make it into a weapon by about 2015.

The EU document is embarrassing for advocates of negotiations with Iran, since last year it was Mr Solana and his staff who spearheaded talks with Tehran on behalf of both the EU and the permanent members of the UN Security Council.

The paper adds that Tehran's rejection of the offer put forward by Mr Solana "makes it difficult to believe that, at least in the short run, [Iran] would be ready to establish the conditions for the resumption of negotiations".

European Officials Agree To Widen Economic Sanctions Against Iran Over Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 — European negotiators, yielding to pressure from the United States, have agreed to widen a ban on financial transactions with Iran and the export of materials and technology that Iran could use to develop nuclear weapons.

European officials said a resolution embodying the wider ban was negotiated over the last week and should go far toward satisfying the Bush administration, which has been pressing European governments for firmer action against Iranian individuals and companies as part of a campaign to isolate the Tehran government because of its suspected nuclear arms program.

"This is a very positive initiative because it takes the European Union beyond where they were until recently," said R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs. "It's not everything we would like to see happen. But the trajectory is good and the momentum is good, so we think this is a positive event."

A text of the resolution, released Monday evening by officials of the European Union, calls for steps to carry out a United Nations Security Council resolution adopted in December. Europeans have been slow to follow through, saying governments do not have the legal tools to act against Iranian companies.

Two European officials said that in some respects the draft complies with American wishes for a broad move against Iran, but in other respects it could fall short. If the European Union adopts the resolution, European governments will have to enact laws individually to carry it out.

"The point is that it takes time for the Europeans to work out exactly where the center of gravity is so they can do something like this," said a European official, asking not to be identified because of the delicate nature of the discussions. "It's not as if the European Union can snap its fingers and get it done right away."

In a separate development, two top diplomats from the European Union said in Brussels that their talks in Tehran over the weekend left them encouraged that negotiations might resume over Iran's nuclear program.

There was no sign, however, that Iran would be willing to suspend its enrichment of uranium, which the West has insisted is a precondition for a resumption of talks.

"We got the impression that in Iran there's a new ambition to return to the negotiating table," said the German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who has taken the lead for the European Union because Germany serves as its current president.

Both Mr. Steinmeier and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, spoke in Brussels a day after returning from Tehran, where they had held talks with Ali Larijani, the top Iranian national security official.

The Security Council resolution of Dec. 23 listed a dozen individuals and several Iranian corporations as effectively off-limits to transactions with European banks and European companies, including those that might get government-backed guarantees for loans to facilitate transactions with Iran.

Responding to the urgings of the Bush administration, the draft would seek to freeze funds of those entities and also of others that might later be designated as engaging in "sensitive" nuclear or weapons activities.

The draft would also call for a ban on visas for individuals identified as involved in Iran's nuclear programs, except for limited relief purposes. The draft would encompass anything "that could contribute to" uranium enrichment or processing of nuclear fuel that could be used for a nuclear weapon.

The draft has a bit of an escape clause, saying it does not apply to payments under contracts that were concluded or that were even discussed before Dec. 23, the date of the Security Council resolution.

It calls on European countries "in accordance with their national legislation" to take "the necessary measures" to prevent teaching or training of Iranians in their countries of any studies that might contribute to nuclear proliferation.

E.U. Nations To Impose Limited Sanctions On Iran (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 12 -- European Union foreign ministers agreed Monday that their 27 member countries will impose limited sanctions on Iran in an effort to pressure the Tehran government to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The sanctions, which include banning the sale of materials and technology that could be used in Iran's nuclear and missile programs, were recommended by the U.N. Security Council in December.

The E.U. member states, many of which have strong trade and diplomatic relations with Iran, refused to consider appeals from the United States to sever all economic ties with the country.

Monday's decision came a day after Iranian officials said they were willing to reopen stalled negotiations with Europe and international agencies over the country's nuclear program.

E.U. foreign policy chief Javier Solano met with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, in Munich on Sunday after a nearly five-month-long breakdown in talks between Tehran and Western governments.

"We are open to negotiation, but Iran knows what we want them to do," Solano told reporters in Brussels on Monday. He described the previous day's meeting with Larijani as "good and constructive," but declined to discuss specifics.

In Munich, Larijani told reporters, "Different ideas have been raised which are in need of further elaboration and examination."

The E.U. and international organizations have insisted that Iran first stop its uranium enrichment program before negotiations over the nuclear program can proceed; Iran has refused.

The diplomatic stops and starts have been a pattern between Tehran and foreign governments and international agencies for the past two years, as each side counters the threats of the other with heightened rhetoric, only to pull back and offer more negotiations.

The United States and many of its allies contend that Iran is using its nuclear program to develop a bomb, while officials in Tehran insist that the program is solely for electricity generation.

In recent months, Iran has announced that it has stepped up experiments with uranium enrichment, a process that could eventually lead to the ability to produce materials for a weapon. Outside scientists are divided over how successful the efforts have been, citing reports that the program is progressing more slowly than Iran has reported.

The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, has appealed to Iran and Western countries to take a diplomatic "timeout" in their disputes in order to resume negotiations and avoid a feared U.S. war with Iran.

In addition to banning the sale of products or technology that could assist Iran's nuclear programs, the sanctions accepted by the E.U. ministers Monday include freezing the financial assets of 10 companies and individuals said to be involved with Iran's nuclear program.

The E.U. foreign ministers also agreed to send about 150 police officers and 60 experts to assist Afghanistan in training its security forces to counter Taliban insurgents. U.S. and NATO officials have been urging European nations to increase personnel, equipment and financial commitments to Afghanistan in an attempt to stave off an expected spring offensive by Taliban fighters.

West Adds To Strains On Iran's Lifeline (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

New York Times, February 13, 2007

Western political and economic pressure on Iran over its nuclear program has chilled foreign investment to the extent that it is now squeezing the country's long-fragile energy industry, adding strains to a government that is burdened by sanctions and wary of unrest at home.

The world's fourth-largest oil exporter, Iran sits on the second-largest oil and gas reserves. But it has struggled in recent years to keep its oil production, currently running at about four million barrels a day, from falling.

Some analysts say that if this acute imbalance between stagnant production and rising demand at home continues unchecked, Iran will have no oil left over to export within a decade. Its oil exports, totaling $47 billion last year, account for half the government's revenue.

"They have a perfect storm of problems feeding into each other," said Robert Murphy, an analyst at PFC Energy, a consulting firm in Washington. He estimated that Iran might have no more oil to export by around 2015 if it did not rein in runaway consumption and reverse the long-term decline in its oil production.

"The domestic energy situation is as big as the international issue, and feeds into it in a very significant way," he said.

To curb demand, which has been driven in part by subsidies that keep the domestic pump price at a mere 35 cents a gallon, the government plans to begin rationing gasoline in March, a measure so unpopular, and potentially explosive, that rationing plans have been put off several times in the past.

Iran's energy problem is in many ways at the heart of the nuclear controversy as well. Iran's leadership says it wants to develop nuclear power generation to free its petroleum resources for domestic use or for exports. The United States and other Western countries say Iran is using the program as a front for building weapons. At a time of relatively high prices, oil is clearly providing Iran's government with enormous strength — but also with an Achilles' heel.

In December, the United Nations Security Council voted unanimously to impose limited economic sanctions on Iran until it halts its nuclear program. So far, American and European officials say they are not seeking to cut off Iran's oil exports, because that would disrupt global markets and raise prices for Western consumers.

Still, the pressure on Western energy companies not to deal with Iran may ultimately speed that outcome. Iran currently exports about 2.5 million barrels a day.

In recent weeks, senior American officials warned several European oil companies that if they invested in new energy projects, they risked financial sanctions in the United States, according to a European energy executive who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because of the delicate nature of his company's relations with Iran.

Foreign investors, who have helped promote Iran's oil development, have been scarce since the 1979 revolution, and the country's oil industry has now suffered decades of economic, political and technical problems. Iran has signed no firm oil or gas contracts with foreign investors since June 2005, when Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was elected president and began flaunting the country's nuclear ambitions and renewing tensions with the West.

At home, meanwhile, Iran has had to appease a population historically prone to unrest. It spends about $20 billion each year, or 15 percent of its economic output, to keep consumer prices low for gasoline, natural gas, electricity and other energy products, according to estimates from the International Monetary Fund and others. Those subsidies have prompted double-digit growth in consumption in this country of 70 million people.

Iran holds 11 percent of global oil reserves, second only to Saudi Arabia. But each year, Iran has to find ways to make up for natural declines in production from existing wells, which in past years has dipped by 200,000 to 500,000 barrels a day.

It has managed to hold its own, but just barely. Moreover, Iran's refining capacity lags far behind its domestic needs, so the country is forced to import 40 percent of its gasoline.

Because of delays in developing new fields, like Yadavaran, Azadegan and others, Iran has scaled back its targets; it now plans to increase oil production to 4.5 million barrels by 2010, down from 5 million barrels. But even that might prove challenging, according to analysts who cite the figures.

Iranian production is now about 3.9 million barrels. It peaked at more than 6 million barrels a day in the mid-1970s, but plummeted to 1.5 million barrels just after the 1979 revolution. During the eight-year war against Iraq that followed, Iran's oil infrastructure lining the Persian Gulf was a frequent target.

Iran currently uses 1.5 million barrels of oil a day, triple its consumption in 1980, and must import about 170,000 barrels a day of gasoline, which last year cost the government more than $4 billion.

Some Iranian fields are in dire need of foreign technical expertise to help reverse their natural decline rates, estimated at 8 to 10 percent a year. Modern methods of enhanced oil recovery, which involve reinjecting natural gas to flush out more oil from the fields, can greatly increase production rates but are both costly and difficult to perform without foreign assistance.

"Iran needs to invest more than it does," said Manouchehr Takin, an Iranian energy analyst at the Center for Global Energy Studies in London. "It needs foreign companies to bring expertise, capital and technology."

But oil companies complain that the rewards are limited. Under Iran's stringent buyback contracts, oil companies basically operate as contractors for the government for a limited time. They are not allowed to book the reserves as their own and gain little in extra profits when energy prices go up.

Iran's energy officials have already indicated they would sweeten buyback contracts. At a meeting held at a Hilton hotel in Vienna this month, they unveiled a new licensing round for 17 onshore and offshore exploration blocks. The conference was attended by dozens of European, Chinese and Russian oil executives.

For Gholam Hossein Nozari, the managing director of Iran's national oil company, continued interest from Europe and Asia is "a sure sign companies do not cower to U.S. pressure," according to Iran's official news agency, IRNA.

Fereidun Fesharaki, an energy adviser to the Iranian government before the revolution, said, "For all its faults, the Islamic Republic is very flexible."

Not all countries or international companies have bowed to American pressure. India has rebuffed Washington's efforts to cut off gasoline exports to Iran. New Delhi has also rejected American requests to cancel a planned pipeline project that would take Iranian natural gas through Pakistan to India.

But recent conversations with European energy executives and consultants, who spoke anonymously to protect their relations with Iran, suggest there is a new wave of concern about starting projects in the country. Even Chinese companies, which Iran is trying to lure with big oil and gas deals, seem to be acting with caution.

Oil companies, including Royal Dutch Shell, Total of France, Eni of Italy and Repsol YPF of Spain, are playing for time in the hope that the political situation may somehow improve, energy analysts said.

Shell and Repsol announced last month a preliminary deal for South Pars, the world's largest natural gas field. But the project, estimated at $10 billion, has been delayed for more than a year. A final investment decision is not due until at least the end of 2007.

Asked about the project at a news conference this month, Jeroen van der Veer, the chief executive of Shell, expressed some embarrassment, saying, "We have a dilemma." Iran's oil and gas reserves are too big to ignore, he said, but "we have all the short-term political concerns, as you can see."

Last year, Inpex, a Japanese oil company, agreed to sharply cut its stake in a $2 billion project to develop the Azadegan field, in the southwestern province of Khuzestan, near Iraq. Inpex cut its stake to 10 percent from 75 percent after problems with land mines left over from the Iran-Iraq war delayed development. But some analysts said the decision reflected Japan's displeasure at Iran's nuclear stance. Japan accounts for 20 percent of all Iranian oil exports.

"Oil companies are simply assessing risk, including what some see as the real risk of a military strike against Iran," said Cliff Kupchan, an analyst at the Eurasia Group, a political risk consulting firm, and a former senior State Department official. "Some are deciding it's not worth it."

The United States is pressing Europeans to trim their government-backed loan guarantees, which amounted to $18 billion in 2005. European countries have recently said they would not issue guarantees for companies that the United Nations lists as tied to Iran's nuclear or missile programs. But Washington is calling on Europe to make sure it is not dealing with front companies, possibly in the energy field.

Since opening up their energy sector to foreigners in the 1990s, Iran's clerical leaders have sought to turn their energy riches into political alliances. In the mid-1990s, they tried to persuade an American company, Conoco (now ConocoPhillips), to develop an oil field in a strategic bid to thaw relations with the United States; when that failed, after President Bill Clinton banned American investments in Iran, Iran turned to Europe and Japan. More recently, Iranian leaders have set their sights on China and Russia.

But while China's three main state-owned oil companies have been eager to sign preliminary agreements with Iran in recent years, drawing criticism from the United States, analysts say few projects have actually gotten off the ground.

Iran And The Nameless Briefers (NYT)

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

Before things get any more out of hand, President Bush needs to make his intentions toward Iran clear. And Congress needs to make it clear that this time it will be neither tricked nor bullied into supporting another disastrous war.

How little this administration has learned from its failures is a constant source of amazement. It seems the bigger the failure, the less it learns.

Consider last weekend's supersecret briefing in Baghdad by a group of American military officials whose names could not be revealed to the voters who are paying for this war with their taxes and their children's blood. The briefers tried to prove the White House's case that Iran is shipping deadly weapons, including armor-piercing explosives, to Shiite militias in Iraq.

Unlike Colin Powell's infamous prewar presentation on Iraq at the United Nations, this briefing had actual weapons to look at. And perhaps in time, the administration will be able to prove conclusively that the weapons came from arms factories in Iran.

But the officials offered no evidence to support their charge that "the highest levels of the Iranian government" had authorized smuggling these weapons into Iraq for use against American forces. Nor could they adequately explain why they had been sitting on this urgent evidence since 2004. The only thing that was not surprising was the refusal of any of the briefers to allow their names to be published. Mr. Powell is probably wondering why he didn't insist on the same deal.

We have no doubt about Iran's malign intent. Iran is defying the Security Council's order to halt its nuclear activities, and it is certainly meddling inside Iraq. But we are also certain that the Iraq war has so strained the American military and so shattered this president's credibility that shrill accusations and saber rattling are far more likely to frighten the allies America needs to contain Iran's nuclear ambitions than to change Tehran's behavior.

If Mr. Bush is truly worried about Shiite militias killing Americans in Iraq — and he should be — he needs to start showing this evidence to Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. He needs to demand that Mr. Maliki stop protecting the militias and make it clear that there will be serious consequences if he continues to refuse.

If Mr. Bush is truly worried about Iran fanning Iraq's ever more bloody civil war — and he should be — he needs to stop fantasizing about regime change and start trying to find a way to persuade Iran's leaders to help rein in the chaos in Iraq.

And if Mr. Bush is worried that Americans no longer believe him when he warns of mortal threats to the country — and he should be — he needs to start proving that he really understands who is most responsible for the Iraq disaster. And he needs to explain how he plans to extricate American troops without setting off an even bigger war.

That's the briefing the American people need to hear. And they need to hear it from the most senior American official of all, George Walker Bush.

Iran's Provocations (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

U.S. military officials finally laid out detailed evidence on Sunday that Iranian-supplied weapons are killing American soldiers in Iraq. The issue now is the lesson the Bush Administration and the American political establishment draw about dealing with Iran.

Our guess is that a large part of Washington will pretend the evidence doesn't exist, or suggest the intelligence isn't proven, or claim that it's all the Bush Administration's fault for "bullying" Iran. This was the impulse behind the Baker-Hamilton Commission's recommendation late last year that the U.S. "engage" Tehran to help us find some honorable diplomatic or political solution in Iraq.

But the evidence about Iranian-style munitions shows how wishful such thinking is. The Iranians don't want a political solution that would allow a U.S.-backed moderate Shiite government to rule in Baghdad. Their goal is to make us bleed in order to drive us home and so allow their radical Shiite allies to hold sway and Iran to become the dominant regional power. They also figure that the bloodier the defeat they can impose, the less likely the U.S. will be to ever consider promoting regime change in Tehran or Damascus.

Pentagon sources have been saying for several years that Iranian-style munitions have been appearing in Iraq, and arms smugglers have been caught coming across the Iranian border. What's new is that the Iranian-marked weapons have actually been put on display and an estimate of their toll made public: more than 170 Americans killed in action and more than 600 wounded.

The main culprit is a specially made roadside bomb the Army calls an EFP, or "explosively formed penetrator." Unlike the jerry-rigged Iraqi shells that Sunni extremists have used to inflict the vast majority of casualties against U.S. forces, the EFP is shaped to penetrate armor and hence effective against harder targets than Humvees. The U.S. Stryker brigade now in Baghdad has been finding them in the city with increasing regularity. In the past this type of roadside bomb has been used against Israeli tanks by Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon.

According to the Defense Department, Iranian officials detained recently by U.S. forces in Iraq possessed documents suggesting they might have been involved in this arms trade. One of them was Moshin Chizari, a very senior Revolutionary Guards commander arrested but later released because of his "diplomatic" status in December. "Iran is a significant contributor to attacks on coalition forces, and also supports violence against the Iraqi security forces and the Iraqi people," said a Defense official in Baghdad.

"Significant" is an important word here. Sunni extremists affiliated with al Qaeda and Saddam's Baath Party remain by far the largest threat to American forces in Iraq. And we don't believe that the news about Iran should cause anyone to lose sight of the primary U.S. mission in the coming months: securing Baghdad against Sunni terror, so that Iraqi Shiites won't turn to militias for protection.

Still, it would be nice if the Bush Administration and Members of Congress would send Tehran the message that it will not be allowed to kill Americans with impunity. President Bush has been speaking out about this of late, but the main concern on Capitol Hill seems to be deterring Mr. Bush rather than telling Iran to stop killing GIs. Won't any of the Democratic Presidential candidates speak out and say that, no matter what they think of Iraq, Iranian help for killing Americans is a hostile act?

Hitting Revolutionary Guards targets, or Iranian weapons factories if they can be located, also shouldn't be out of the question when the lives of American soldiers are at stake. If General David Petraeus, the new and hardly reckless Iraq theater commander, thinks such pressure on Iran is crucial to securing his Baghdad mission, he deserves to get the go-ahead.

The larger lesson here concerns the nature of the Iranian regime and its nuclear ambitions. Iran's provocations in Iraq have been deadly enough, but they might be far more aggressive if the mullahs no longer fear the ability of the U.S. to hit back. As a nuclear power, they may well become even more reckless in attacking the interests of the U.S. and its regional allies. Then we'll see what a real bully looks like.

Iran's Nuclear Web (NYT)

By Valerie Lincy And Gary Milhollin

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

Washington

INTERNATIONAL inspectors confirmed this month that Iran is equipping its uranium enrichment plant at Natanz, a step that brings it closer to building an atomic bomb and brashly defies a United Nations resolution passed in December. So it might seem like good news that the foreign ministers of 27 European Union nations announced yesterday that, in accord with the resolution, they will impose a ban on selling nuclear-related materials and technology to Iran and put a freeze on the assets of 10 Iranian organizations and 12 people.

However, nothing involving nuclear proliferation is ever that simple. The December resolution called for measures not only against the named entities, but also against companies that are "owned or controlled" by the culprits or that act "on their behalf or at their direction." The United States, Britain and France have been pushing to enforce this language broadly, to ensnare any subsidiaries and affiliates. But Germany, Italy and Spain, among others, have resisted, mainly because of trade interests.

Yesterday's European Union agreement muddied the issue, failing to clamp down on any subsidiaries, but reserving the right to add names of affiliates in the future. America, Britain and France must pressure the other Europeans to spread their net as wide as possible.

How important is it to include subsidiaries? Consider the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, a government entity that is on the sanctions list. It operates the Karaj Nuclear Research Center for Medicine and Agriculture, where unexplained traces of fissile material were found by United Nations inspectors; it runs the Nuclear Research Center in Tehran, which inspectors discovered had secretly produced plutonium; it uses Pioneer Energy Industries to build uranium processing plants; and, according to the United States Treasury Department, it funnels money to companies that do its nuclear bidding through an entity called the Novin Energy Company. All of these other entities should have their assets frozen as well.

Consider also Iran's Defense Industries Organization, controlled by the Ministry of Defense. It is on the sanctions list, but most of its subsidiaries are not. These include its Special Industries Group, which produces nuclear, biological and chemical weapon protection gear; its Chemical Industries Group, which makes propellant charges and explosives; and its Ammunition Industries Group, which produces mortars and grenades. And, like Russian stacking dolls, each of these groups has subsidiaries: the Ammunition Industries Group has at least eight major organizations under it.

One of the people due to have assets frozen is Ahmad Vahid Dastjerdi, the head of Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, which produces most of Iran's missiles. According to the Treasury Department, his group uses two subordinate entities — the Sanam Industrial Group and the Ya Mahdi Industries Group — to purchase missile parts and technology from abroad. All of these groups should be sanctioned because they act at Mr. Dastjerdi's direction.

If the West is truly going to keep Tehran from getting the bomb, we will have to block every asset and shun every company involved. Not only does the United Nations require it, it is elementary self-defense.

In Shift, Accord On North Korea Seems To Be Set (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 13, 2007

BEIJING, Tuesday, Feb. 13 — The United States and four other nations reached a tentative agreement to provide North Korea with roughly $400 million in fuel oil and aid, in return for the North's starting to disable its nuclear facilities and allowing nuclear inspectors back into the country, according to American officials who have reviewed the proposed text.

While the accord sets a 60-day deadline for North Korea to accomplish those first steps toward disarmament, it leaves until an undefined moment in the future — and to another negotiation — the actual removal of North Korea's nuclear weapons and the fuel that it has manufactured to produce them.

Bush administration officials said they believed that the other nations participating in the talks — China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — would consent to the tentative agreement as soon as Tuesday. The parties still await a final confirmation from the North Korean leader, Kim Jong-il. The tentative agreement was forwarded to the respective national capitals Tuesday morning.

In essence, if the North agrees to the deal, a country that only four months ago conducted its first nuclear test will have traded away its ability to produce new nuclear fuel in return for immediate energy and other aid. It would still hold on to, for now, an arsenal that American intelligence officials believe contains more than a half-dozen nuclear weapons or the fuel that is their essential ingredient.

The accord also leaves unaddressed the fate of a second and still-unacknowledged nuclear weapons program that the United States accused North Korea of buying from the Pakistani nuclear engineer Abdul Qadeer Khan in the late 1990s, in what appeared to be an effort to circumvent a nuclear freeze the North negotiated in 1994 with the Clinton administration.

Negotiations had appeared near collapse on Sunday over North Korea's demands for huge shipments of fuel oil and electricity.

Under the new tentative agreement, the oil and aid for North Korea would be provided by South Korea, China and the United States — meaning that President Bush would need to win Congressional approval. That proved difficult for the Clinton administration, which constantly fought hawks in Congress over providing fuel oil to the impoverished nation under the earlier accord.

Japan has declined to participate in providing oil or aid until it resolves separate issues with North Korea about the abduction of some of its citizens by the North, American officials said.

In Washington on Monday night, administration officials declined to call the first phase of the new agreement a "nuclear freeze." The term has echoes of the Clinton accord, which Mr. Bush had criticized because it failed to force the North to ship its nuclear fuel out of the country before it received significant aid. The officials insisted that the current agreement was different because the North will not receive light-water nuclear reactors, like the ones it was promised in the 1994 agreement, and because the agreement will also be signed by the North's immediate neighbors, including China.

Beijing was the North's ally in the Korean War and its protector for decades, but relations have been strained and the Chinese leadership was apparently pressuring the North to accept the new agreement.

"If they renege on this," said one senior administration official, who would not speak on the record because the deal had not been signed, "they are sticking their fingers into the eyes of the Chinese."

Nonetheless, some administration officials acknowledged that they had concluded that a step-by-step accord was their only choice and that it would be impossible to set a schedule for the North's disarmament without taking initial steps to build trust.

"Everybody had to make some changes to try to narrow the differences," the chief American negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, told reporters as he returned to his hotel at 2:41 a.m. on Tuesday.

Mr. Hill was expected to meet again on Tuesday in Beijing with envoys from China, South Korea, Japan, Russia and North Korea to learn if each nation has approved the deal. He said he had been in frequent contact with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during the late-night negotiations and that he believed the Bush administration would support the agreement. "We feel it is an excellent draft," he said. "I don't think we are the problem."

If Mr. Hill is correct, it marks a major change of course for an administration that has been beset by six years of virulent internal arguments over whether to negotiate with North Korea or squeeze the government of Mr. Kim until it collapses. Hawks in the administration, including many allies of Vice President Dick Cheney, have opposed any deal that would provide aid to the North before it disgorges its arsenal.

Even before the preliminary agreement was signed in Beijing, one of Mr. Cheney's protégés, John R. Bolton, who left his post as American ambassador to the United Nations just two months ago, denounced the accord. "This is a very bad deal," he said on CNN, urging President Bush to reject it. He added that "it contradicts fundamental premises of the president's policy," and he said that it made the administration "look very weak."

Gary Samore, who was the top nonproliferation official in the Clinton White House and who negotiated with North Korea, commended the Bush administration for negotiating an accord with the North, but said: "Unfortunately, it is three years, eight bombs and one nuclear test too late. But better late than never."

Under the details of the deal, as described by American and Asian officials, the $400 million in aid would be disbursed to the North as it meets its initial commitments, probably over the course of a year. The first of those must be completed in the next 60 days, including the "permanent disablement" of the country's existing nuclear facilities at Yongbyon, its main nuclear complex north of the capital, Pyongyang.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, whose inspectors were kicked out of North Korea four years ago, also would need to be invited back in. And the North would have to prepare a "complete declaration" of all its nuclear facilities, turning that over to all of the parties in the talks and the I.A.E.A.

That would pave the way for a second phase, in which “working groups” would negotiate the details of disarmament, including turning over weapons and fuel. Other groups would explore normalization of relations, a peace treaty formally ending the Korean War, and other economic aid in return for disarmament.

But the disarmament process promises to be enormously complex, far harder than dismantling Libya’s comparatively small nuclear complex three years ago. Libya never produced nuclear material. North Korea is believed to have made one or two weapons, or the fuel for them, nearly two decades ago, and perhaps a half-dozen or more since 2003. But American officials are uncertain exactly how many weapons the North possesses, and in the second phase of the accord, the North would have to explain what it did with the uranium-enrichment equipment that it is said to have purchased from Dr. Khan.

“We don’t know what state that program is in,” one senior official with access to the intelligence information said Monday. “We only know what they appear to have bought,” based in part on Pakistani interrogations of Dr. Khan.

United Nations sanctions against North Korea put into place after last year’s nuclear test are expected to remain in effect for the next year, American officials said.

Some experts doubt that the North will ever agree to turn over its weapons, which it considers its main bargaining chip with the West, and Mr. Kim’s only insurance policy against being toppled. “This is a freeze with a promise to negotiate subsequent disarmament,” said Mr. Samore. “And a North Korean promise to negotiate later is pretty worthless.”

Mr. Hill acknowledged that he had a lot of negotiating ahead of him. “This is only one phase of denuclearization,” he said. “We’re not done.”

If the deal is approved, Mr. Hill added, the new working groups could be quickly established while chief negotiators would likely reconvene in Beijing as soon as next month. He said the tentative agreement would create a succession of deadlines that would need to be met as a precondition of the deal.

North Korea had nearly scuttled the negotiations in recent days by insisting on a huge energy aid package. Varying reports in Asia suggested that North Korea had demanded two million tons of heavy fuel oil and two million kilowatts of electricity in exchange for its approval of any new agreement, far less than it got.

Tentative Nuclear Deal Struck With North Korea (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 13 -- Envoys from six nations reached a tentative agreement early Tuesday on the first steps toward North Korea's nuclear disarmament, a potential breakthrough in talks that have faltered repeatedly since 2003.

The chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, qualified the draft accord as "excellent" but declined to provide details. He said it was being submitted to all six governments and, pending their formal approval, would be ratified at a meeting scheduled later Tuesday in Beijing.

"We would like to think that we can all agree on this," Hill said at a briefing for reporters. "We feel it is an excellent draft, so I don't think we would be the problem."

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, Qin Gang, also suggested the tentative agreement was likely to gain formal approval by the six governments, including North Korea. He cited "extraordinarily strenuous efforts" in negotiations that lasted through the night, and said the delegates would gather again later Tuesday "to confirm the progress we have made."

Some observers expressed caution, noting that North Korea has proved unpredictable in the past, and that any deal would have to be approved by the country's Stalinist leader, Kim Jong Il.

The tentative agreement lays out the first concrete steps that would put into practice an accord reached in September 2005, in which the Pyongyang government pledged to dismantle its entire nuclear program. According to diplomats involved in five days of arduous talks here, the opening move would be for North Korea to close down its nuclear reactor at Yongbyon and readmit international nuclear inspectors in exchange for energy aid.

In that regard, Tuesday's accord is expected to resemble an earlier bargain with North Korea, the Agreed Framework reached in 1994 during the Clinton administration but renounced eight years later during the Bush administration. Under that deal, North Korea pledged to freeze and eventually dismantle its reactor in return for 500,000 tons a year of heavy fuel oil.

Despite a sense of achievement in Beijing, the deal was expected to face criticism in Washington, with Democrats charging the administration allowed North Korea to gain nuclear weapons through poor diplomacy in recent years and conservatives saying it shows weakness at a critical moment.

"This is a very bad deal," former U.N. ambassador John R. Bolton told CNN. "It contradicts fundamental premises of the president's policy he's been following for the past six years. And second, it makes the administration look very weak at a time in Iraq . . . when it needs to look strong."

Hill declined to specify how much aid North Korea would receive in the new bargain -- it had demanded large quantities of heavy fuel oil, reportedly up to 2 million tons -- or to detail the schedule that would presumably tie fuel deliveries to closure of the Yongbyon reactor and subsequent steps. The Chinese-sponsored negotiations, including North and South Korea, Japan, Russia, China and the United States, had faltered for several days over what Hill had described as a North Korean effort to lock in large amounts of energy aid without binding itself to corresponding denuclearization steps.

The Chinese, as sponsors and hosts, worked intensively to prevent the talks from ending in failure, Hill said, resulting in the all-night series of meetings. The Beijing government was eager to avoid a repeat of the last round of talks, in December, which ended in stalemate after North Korea refused to negotiate until a U.S.-North Korean banking dispute was resolved.

The chief Japanese envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, said the tentative agreement was the result of compromises from all six nations. In addition to seeking an end to the North Korean nuclear threat, Japan has sought to have the talks embrace the issue of Japanese citizens abducted by North Korean agents and still not accounted for. Others in the six-party talks have been eager to avoid letting it prevent progress on nuclear disarmament.

North Korea's senior nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, signaled agreement with all the draft provisions, including fuel aid, according to Chun Yung Woo, the chief South Korean delegate. But the final word had not yet come from Pyongyang, he noted.

According to diplomats' descriptions of what was under discussion, the issue of North Korea's existing nuclear weapons and the plutonium fuel already produced at Yongbyon would be left for later. U.S. experts have estimated that North Korea has enough plutonium to make eight or 10 bombs.

Similarly, a U.S. allegation that North Korea also has started a uranium enrichment program to produce nuclear fuel would not be addressed in the initial agreement. North Korea has denied it has such a program.

Based on the difficulty in moving from the 2005 agreement in principle to Tuesday's accord, those issues seemed likely to generate complicated negotiations in the months ahead. Moreover, they would force North Korean leaders to decide whether they are willing to forsake the nuclear weapons they have devoted so many resources to developing.

Nevertheless, Hill said, reaching the agreement augured well for negotiations on the subsequent steps. A new round of talks on the next steps is likely next month, he added.

Since the negotiations began, in August 2003, they have been marked by long North Korean boycotts and repeated sessions of fruitless discussions.

In addition, when the September 2005 accord was reached, North Korea had a research program but no nuclear weapons. But it exploded a nuclear device last October and swiftly declared itself a nuclear power.

Tentative Deal Struck At North Korea Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield And Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

North Korea on Monday night agreed to shut down its main nuclear weapons-related facilities in return for huge amounts of energy assistance as part of a hard-won draft deal aimed at disarming North Korea's nuclear weapons programme.

Details of the agreement were vague early Tuesday, although Japan's Kyodo news agency said Pyongyang would receive 1m tonnes of fuel oil aid for disabling its nuclear facilities. More details of the draft are expected later Tuesday.

"There was an agreement on the key differences of North Korea's actions for denuclearisation, their scope and how far they'll go, and the other countries' corresponding measures and the scale of assistance," said Chun Yung-woo, the South Korean negotiator.

"North Korea basically agreed to all the measures in the draft," he said, adding that the talks would continue Tuesday on the details.

The nuclear talks appeared headed for collapse after five days of negotiations bogged down over disagreements on energy aid. However that changed after what host China called 16 hours of "extraordinarily intensive consultations" that continued into the early hours on Tuesday.

All six parties in the North Korean nuclear talks planned to discussing the provisions with their capitals, before resuming discussions in Beijing on Tuesday.

Christopher Hill, the US nuclear negotiator, described the draft as an "excellent" first step.

"I'm encouraged by this," he said. "We might be able to take a real step towards denuclearisation."

But deals with North Korea have a habit of coming unglued, and analysts worried that it might be difficult to agree on exact terms.

After an ultimatum that the talks would end on Monday regardless of whether there was an agreement, North Korea drastically lowered its demands for outside energy aid, diplomats said.

DOJ_NMG_0131684

North Korea is understood to have been demanding 2,000 megawatts of electricity and 2m tonnes of heavy fuel oil annually – about double the aid agreed with the Clinton administration in a similar agreement in 1994 – in return for taking steps towards denuclearisation.

Mr Chun said the five parties – China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the US – agreed to shoulder equally the burden of supplying energy aid for the North, although he did not specify how much energy would be provided.

In return, North Korea agreed to "shut down" its nuclear weapons-related facilities and specify the steps for a shutdown within 60 days.

The US had been aiming for more than the simple "freeze" that Pyongyang agreed in the 1994 deal, which collapsed four years ago after the Bush administration claimed North Korea was operating a secret uranium enrichment programme.

A senior official in Washington said the US administration was "happy" with the deal but refused to speculate on Pyongyang's final response.

North Korea Says Yes, For Now, To A Freeze (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 13, 2007

The six-nation deal apparently calls for a halt to Pyongyang's plutonium production in return for energy assistance.

BEIJING — Weary negotiators from six nations reached a tentative agreement early this morning on the first steps toward dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The pending deal, coming after marathon talks and years of frustration, is believed to call for North Korea to freeze plutonium production at its main nuclear center at Yongbyon and allow international atomic energy inspectors back into the country. In return, the impoverished nation would be given energy assistance and related aid.

A second, more protracted phase would address thorny disarmament issues.

The tentative deal is based on a one-page document circulated late last week by China calling for a several-stage agreement under which both sides would take measured steps forward to ensure compliance and build trust.

Details on the apparent breakthrough were not immediately available, pending approval by the governments involved. Talks reconvened today at the Diaoyutai Guest House in west Beijing. The six-nation talks involve the United States, the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

"We think this is an excellent draft," said an obviously tired Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, at the end of 16 hours of talks. "I don't think we are the problem, or would be the problem."

Any announced agreement with the government in Pyongyang should be treated with caution, given its history of faltering compliance and broken deals. That said, some analysts expressed cautious optimism that this could be a long-awaited turning point in negotiations with North Korea's autocratic leadership, which raised concern and ire across much of the world when it announced the testing of a nuclear device on Oct. 9.

The six-party talks on Pyongyang's nuclear program began in 2003.

"There was an agreement on the key differences of North Korea's actions for denuclearization, their scope and how far they'll go," South Korean envoy Chun Yung-woo told reporters. "North Korea basically agreed to all the measures in the draft."

All six nations must still sign off on the deal reached by their negotiating teams. Questions remained over how the deal would be funded.

Assuming the accord is confirmed, attention in coming weeks will shift to working groups aimed at addressing a variety of technical issues involving denuclearization, energy requirements, diplomatic recognition, timing and financial sanctions, among others.

"This is only one phase of denuclearization," Hill said. "We're not done."

North Korea is estimated to have enough plutonium for as many as 13 nuclear weapons. According to an estimate by the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington, Pyongyang could have the capability to develop as many as 17 nuclear weapons by 2008.

Still unclear was whether North Korea would be required to give up any existing nuclear stockpiles under the agreement.

The talks hit a wall in recent days when the North demanded huge amounts of energy aid, reportedly more than 2 million tons of heavy fuel oil annually, before it would agree to begin dismantling its program. The amount compares with 500,000 tons settled upon in the failed 1994 Agreed Framework with North Korea negotiated by the Clinton administration.

That deal fell apart in late 2002 when the U.S. produced evidence it said showed North Korea was engaging in a secret uranium enrichment program, in violation of the pact. U.S. officials say North Korea admitted during talks at the time that it had such a program, but Pyongyang has since denied making such an admission.

During negotiations of the last few years, North Korea has frequently staked out bargaining positions widely seen as unrealistic in a bid to test the bottom line of those sitting across the table. The United States, Japan and South Korea responded by urging North Korea to reduce its demands, a move that apparently worked.

Japan, which has other issues of contention with North Korea related to the abduction of several dozen Japanese citizens in the 1970s and '80s, welcomed the apparent progress.

"We are closely watching the development to make sure North Korea makes the right decision toward nuclear abandonment," Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe told a parliamentary committee session this morning.

Experts said the key to any meaningful deal moving forward would be obvious, tangible progress within a matter of weeks under a structure that afforded North Korea no wiggle room to back out of its commitments.

"We must be vigilant and keep North Korea's feet to the fire throughout the implementation phase," said Don Gross, a former State Department official who is a senior fellow with the Atlantic Council in Washington. "It is critical to U.S. security to keep this all under tight control."

Also key will be ensuring that any agreement has the support of hard-liners in both Washington and Pyongyang, who in the past have resisted accommodation.

John R. Bolton, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, harshly criticized the tentative deal, arguing that it made the United States appear weak.

"I am very disturbed by this deal," he told CNN. "It sends exactly the wrong signal to would-be proliferators around the world: 'If we hold out long enough, wear down the State Department negotiators, eventually you get rewarded.' "

A key question throughout the talks has been whether North Korea really wants a deal or is stalling to sidestep sanctions.

"Whether or not the parties reach an agreement, this has been a major North Korean victory," said Zhang Liangui, a professor with the Central Party School in Beijing. "The longer they drag things out, the bigger is their victory."

The fact that the United States and North Korea have come even this far, however, reflects more flexibility and a softening of positions on both sides, analysts said.

North Korea faces growing anger from China and South Korea, two neighbors the isolated nation has traditionally counted on for financial and political support, in the wake of its nuclear test and a separate missile test last year.

The North's sense of isolation also reportedly increased after the U.N. Security Council voted unanimously to enact sanctions less than a week after the nuclear test was announced. In the past, it has counted on China or Russia to protect its flank in multilateral organizations.

Financial pressure exerted by China and the United States on North Korea's bank accounts in Macao have taken a toll. Pyongyang also may feel that its October test enhanced its deterrent against a military attack, even as the Stalinist government may be realizing that nuclear testing is more technically difficult than it thought. Its relatively small, 1-kiloton explosion was viewed outside the country as only partially successful.

The Bush administration also seems more willing to deal, given its declining popularity in opinion polls at home and the many issues competing for its attention abroad, including Iraq, Iran and Afghanistan. The U.S. softening in recent weeks has left some wary that Washington could sign a bad deal, however, in a desire to gain political points domestically.

"A deal is good for George W. Bush in the short term and good for [North Korean leader] Kim Jong Il," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations with People's University in Beijing. "But it may not be so good for legit denuclearization. If the pressure on North Korea is not kept up, the U.N. sanctions will fall away, leaving them to decide later to ratchet up their threats again."

Key points

Among the elements believed to be in the tentative accord's first phase:

North Korea would:

· Freeze plutonium production

· Allow international inspectors to return

Other nations would:

· Offer energy assistance, related aid

What comes next

Steps expected to follow the tentative deal, with the potential for breakdown at any point:

· The six nations involved in the talks — the U.S., the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia — sign off on the deal, which was hammered out by negotiators over the last five days in Beijing.

· North Korea agrees to freeze its nuclear program as a first step toward eventual dismantling, and to let international inspectors view key nuclear sites, in return for energy aid.

· Working groups are formed, perhaps within the next month, on technical issues related to denuclearization, energy aid, financial sanctions, so-called sequencing issues covering the order in which steps are taken, and broader aid and diplomatic recognition.

· North Korea agrees to end its nuclear weapons programs with the goal of creating a nuclear-free Korean peninsula and enhancing security in Northeast Asia in return for further aid, security assurances and diplomatic recognition.

North Korea Deal Could Boost Bush's Beleaguered Foreign Policy (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

North Korea's apparent decision to accept a breakthrough, aid-for-disarmament deal would boost U.S. efforts to rein in the spread of nuclear weapons and provide a victory for the Bush administration's battered foreign-policy team.

After a bargaining session that went well past midnight, delegates from North Korea, its four neighbors and the U.S. signed off on the final text of a plan to end Pyongyang's nuclear-weapons program in return for financial and energy assistance worth hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

Christopher Hill, the U.S. envoy to the talks, told reporters the final text is "an excellent, excellent draft." Senior U.S. officials in Washington said the administration has signed off on the deal and is simply waiting to hear from North Korea. The other participants in the talks -- China, Japan, Russia and South Korea -- are also likely to approve it.

A deal to rein in North Korea's nuclear program would give President Bush a rare foreign-policy success at a time when he is embroiled in a bitter debate over the war in Iraq and tensions with Iran. It would also mark a triumph for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who had to beat back skeptics within the Pentagon and Vice President Cheney's office who opposed any deal that could in any way strengthen the current North Korean regime.

But the proposed deal also exposes the administration to accusations from both conservatives and Democrats that Mr. Bush has returned to a Clinton-era arrangement with North Korea, known as the 1994 Agreed Framework, that he had disparaged and cast aside soon after taking office in 2001. Some say this refusal to bargain wasted time during which Pyongyang was able to expand its arsenal, while hawks warn the North will renege on the deal.

Critics of current U.S. foreign policy, are sure to draw parallels between North Korea and Iran, and argue the administration should now move to open direct talks with Tehran over its nuclear program. The U.S. and others claim Iran's goal is nuclear weapons, while the Iranians insist they seek nuclear technology only to produce energy for civilian purposes.

The U.S. and North Korea hammered out key parts of the pact in a two-way meeting last month in Berlin. But the deal nearly collapsed during the formal six-party negotiations that began on Thursday.

The trouble in arriving at the deal is emblematic of the challenges that are sure to lie ahead. From the start of the six-party talks in August 2003, North Korean delegates showed little willingness to compromise, wary of any action that might threaten dictator Kim Jong Il or erode his power over the country.

North Korean envoy Kim Kye Gwan hasn't spoken to reporters during the talks. But just before the latest round started, Mr. Kim expressed a new desire to reach a deal, though he didn't specify why. Some analysts suggested that, after testing its first nuclear device in October, North Korea calculated it could negotiate its best deal, but had otherwise run out of cards to play.

Diplomats involved in the latest talks say the new deal is different from President Clinton's 1994 agreement because it requires North Korea to dismantle its only nuclear plant, a small facility in the city of Yongbyon, and allow outside experts to monitor the process. The country closed the plant as part of the 1994 deal, but was able to reopen it in 2002. The Yongbyon complex includes a center to reprocess spent uranium fuel from the plant into weapons-grade plutonium. Analysts estimate North Korea has enough plutonium to make about 10 nuclear weapons. Ultimately, State Department officials say, North Korea would have to give up all of its nuclear material.

In addition, the new deal provides a mechanism for the six countries to work on broader goals beyond denuclearization. They include forging diplomatic relations between North Korea and its former enemies Japan and the U.S., and crafting a peace treaty that formally ends the Korean War of the 1950s.

U.S. officials say the agreement would reward North Korea in phases for making certain moves, with energy supplies accounting for most of the initial incentives. The U.S. Treasury Department is also preparing to lift restrictions on North Korean accounts at a Macau bank thought to amount to millions of dollars.

The six countries plan to create five working groups to handle details. One will concentrate on further steps for denuclearization, one on setting up diplomatic relations, one on the logistics of the energy and economic assistance, and another to work on a Korean War peace treaty. The fifth group will handle special issues of conflict between North Korea and Japan, particularly the fate of an estimated 13 to 17 people the North abducted from Japan in recent decades.

"We're trying to address some of the underlying problems in the region, why there are tensions on the Korean peninsula in the first place, [and] some of the bilateral problems," Mr. Hill told reporters in Beijing. "The agreement really offers a framework for proceeding with that."

Tentative Deal Calls For Halt In N. Korea Nuclear Program (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON — North Korea reached a tentative agreement with five other nations Tuesday on initial steps toward ending its nuclear weapons program, U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill said.

The agreement would shut down a program that built and tested a nuclear device and amassed plutonium for as many as a dozen other weapons. Initially, however, that plutonium and any completed nuclear weapons would remain in North Korea.

The deal, reached in Beijing by negotiators from North Korea, the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea, requires a final OK by the six governments.

Under the agreement's terms, North Korea would shut down a nuclear reactor that has been producing plutonium for four years, according to a senior Bush administration official and an Asian diplomat. Inspectors from the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency would return to North Korea within 60 days to verify that the reactor has been shuttered, they said. In return, North Korea would get a million tons of fuel oil a year.

The two officials, both of whom had been briefed on details of the agreement, declined to be identified because it has not gotten final approval from their governments.

After a fifth day of negotiations in Beijing, Hill said the agreement is only a first step toward the ultimate goal of dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program. "I'm encouraged that we might be able to make a real step forward on the denuclearization issue," he said.

North Korean diplomats made no immediate comment. The parties resume talks Tuesday in Beijing.

Supporters and opponents of the agreement both say it resembles a 1994 accord, known as the Agreed Framework, which traded economic and diplomatic concessions for a freeze of the North Korean nuclear program and a pledge of eventual denuclearization. Under that deal, North Korea received 500,000 tons of fuel oil annually.

The 1994 pact collapsed in 2002 when North Korea admitted working to enrich uranium, another potential source of bomb fuel.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the U.N. until December, said on CNN that the agreement is "a very bad deal" that would undercut sanctions against North Korea and make the administration "look weak ... dealing with Iran (when) it needs to look strong." He said President Bush should reject the deal because it is no better than the 1994 agreement: "If we (are) going to cut this deal now, it's amazing we didn't cut it back then."

Jack Pritchard, a former U.S. negotiator with the North Koreans in both the Clinton and Bush administrations, said the latest deal initially leaves North Korea "a declared nuclear-weapon state with a stock of plutonium for more."

James Kelly, assistant secretary of State for Asia in Bush's first term, said he was optimistic. "It's a mistake to prematurely trash" the agreement, Kelly said. "It's not a triumph yet. It's a first step."

David Albright, head of the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank, said North Korea has produced enough plutonium for as many as 12 bombs. It tested a nuclear device for the first time in October.

Tentative N. Korea Deal Struck (WT)

By Ed Lanfranco

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

BEIJING -- Negotiators early today announced a tentative agreement on steps to begin dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program in exchange for a package of energy assistance and other incentives.

The deal, concluded after five days of talks culminating in a 16-hour session that ended in the small hours today, remains subject to approval from the capitals of the six participating nations. Most details were not made public, and officials said they would resume negotiations later today.

Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, said the talks had "made a lot of progress -- so much so that the Chinese felt secure in distributing a final text."

A brief statement issued by China's official Xinhua news agency just before 3 a.m. Beijing time said: "The envoys of the six parties involved in the Korean Peninsula nuclear issue worked overnight in a bid to clinch a possible deal, but no agreements announced yet."

Mr. Hill said the United States was fully behind the Chinese text, but he did not rule out attempts by the North to extract more concessions or renegotiate the steps it has to take. He called the draft an implementation document of the September 2005 joint statement of principles, in which all parties committed to the denuclearization of the peninsula.

He said he had been in constant communication with Washington during the negotiations and spoken to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "on many occasions this evening." He said that "people need to look at it, including Secretary Rice" and that the text was an "excellent, excellent draft."

"I don't think we are the problem. I can't predict everything in that regard. The Chinese worked really hard, and we support what the Chinese are doing," Mr. Hill added.

He said the North Koreans "have seen every word that is in this text, and it was on this basis that all the parties agreed that this was the way to go." Nevertheless, "they'll have things that they want to get off their chest; we'll have a meeting tomorrow to see where we are."

North Korea did not comment publicly on the draft, but South Korean envoy Chun Yung-woo said he thought the proposal would be acceptable to Pyongyang. He said the five other countries agreed to evenly contribute to the energy aid outlined under the deal.

Japan and Russia, however, were noncommittal. The Japanese envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, said it was "too early to tell" whether Tokyo was satisfied. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov said there were "many questions regarding details," Russia's Itar-Tass news agency reported.

The latest round of talks began Thursday on a promising note after the United States and North Korea, which has demanded improved relations with Washington, held an unusual meeting last month in Germany and signaled a willingness to compromise.

But the negotiations quickly became mired on the issue of how much energy aid the impoverished and isolated communist country would get as an inducement for initial steps toward disarmament.

"It's always three yards, three yards, three yards, and it's always fourth and one. Then you make a first down and do three more yards," Mr. Hill said, using a football metaphor. "It's painful."

During the days of arduous negotiations, he said, "everybody has had to make some changes to narrow the differences."

Some delegates at the talks -- which also include China -- had called North Korea's energy demands excessive.

South Korean and Japanese press reports gave varying accounts of how much energy North Korea was demanding, including up to 2 million kilowatts of electricity or 2 million tons of heavy fuel oil.

The agreement calls for creating five working groups to handle technical matters related to denuclearization, normalizing North Korea's diplomatic relations with the United States and Japan, as well as easing U.S. financial sanctions imposed on the North in 2005, diplomats said.

"We don't want to miss any deadlines, because if you begin missing a deadline, other things start missing, and before you know it aren't getting done," Mr. Hill said.

In Washington, conservatives who oppose negotiations with North Korea were quick to denounce the tentative deal.

John R. Bolton, until recently ambassador to the United Nations, said President Bush should instruct Mr. Hill not to sign the text, noting that it resembles the Clinton administration's 1994 deal with Pyongyang, known as the Agreed Framework.

Hamas Government To Resign, Leader Says (USAT)

USA Today, February 13, 2007

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Monday that his militant Hamas government will resign in the coming days despite unresolved issues in an agreement to form a unity government. Haniyeh said the deal with the more-moderate Fatah Party of President Mahmoud Abbas was needed to prevent further bloodshed between the rival groups. The parties agreed to a division of Cabinet posts but have not decided on an Interior minister. A coalition government could lead to easing of Western sanctions imposed after Hamas defeated Fatah in elections a year ago.

Germany to parole terrorist held 24 years

Germany's Stuttgart state court approved parole for a Red Army Faction terrorist arrested in 1982 and convicted of involvement in nine murders. Brigitte Mohnhaupt, 57, will be released March 27 after serving 24 years of a life sentence for multiple murders. Mohnhaupt was a leader in the leftist group sometimes called the Baader-Meinhof Gang. The group carried out kidnappings, bank robberies and attacks on government and business figures from 1970 to 1992.

Italy arrests 15 alleged leftist militants

Italian police arrested 15 people in raids targeting a leftist militant group linked to the Red Brigades, which terrorized Italy in the 1970s and 1980s. The group "was a structured and highly dangerous organization," Interior Minister Giuliano Amato said, adding that other factions likely are still active. The group financed itself through armed robberies and spread propaganda in leftist clubs and in factories where some of them worked, anti-terrorism official Giovanni Calesini said.

Palestinian Authority Given Hope Of EU Aid (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

One of the European Union's top officials on Monday held out the prospect of resuming aid to the Palestinian Authority in the wake of last week's agreement by Fatah and Hamas to form a national unity government.

The 27-nation bloc has frozen direct aid to the PA since Hamas won parliamentary elections last year, but Benita Ferrero-Waldner, external relations Commissioner, suggested on Monday the Fatah-Hamas deal could transform the situation.

The EU is the biggest donor to the Palestinians, in an effort spearheaded by the European Commission. Last year, the EU delivered about €700m ($907m, £466m) in aid to the Palestinians, but bypassed the PA itself after Hamas won power.

"When it becomes possible to re-engage with a national unity government . . . we could then hopefully resume support to the Palestinian Authority, ministers and ministries and agencies from which we have had to distance ourselves in the last year," she said.

Although officials from EU member states indicated that Ms Ferrero-Waldner's comments were premature, her statement highlights a growing divergence between the EU and the US and Israel.

The EU has consistently been more enthusiastic than the US about a national unity government with which it can do business, while Washington has found it much more difficult to express support for the formation of any government with Hamas members.

Privately, EU officials often say the bloc will need to talk to Hamas eventually and that it is unrealistic to demand that a new government explicitly recognise Israel.

However, principles agreed by the "Quartet" of the EU, the US, the United Nations and Russia in the wake of Hamas's victory explicitly demand that Palestinian leaders recognise Israel, as well as abiding by past agreements and renouncing violence.

Although last week's Mecca agreement to form a national unity government addresses the last two points, it does not require that the new administration recognise Israel in any way.

Ms Ferrero-Waldner's latest proposals follow a Quartet declaration this month that calls for "international support in the areas of [Palestinian] governance, institution building and economic development".

¦J erusalem's Jewish mayor has moved to defuse a Muslim furore over construction work at Islam's third holiest site by ordering a public review that will consider objections before building begins, reports Harvey Morris in Jerusalem.

More than 30 police and Muslim worshippers were injured on Friday when Israeli security forces confronted protesters inside the al-Aqsa mosque complex that Jews also revere as the site of their second Temple.

Amid further protests in the West Bank at the weekend, it was not clear whether Uri Lupolianski's concession would be enough to cool Palestinian tempers. His office said work would continue on clearing the remains of an ancient bridge that links the Jewish Western Wall plaza to the Muslim sanctuary. Israeli archeologists would in the meantime continue a dig at the site to safeguard any historical remains.

Somali Islamists Seek Refuge In Yemen (CSM)

By Ginny Hill

The Christian Science Monitor, February 13, 2007

SANAA, YEMEN

Under cover of darkness, exhausted Somali refugees stagger onto Yemen's southern beaches at the end of a grueling and dangerous journey across the Gulf of Aden.

"We were loaded onto the boats like animals," says Adil Mokhtar Mohammed. "We were forced to squat for three days and we were tightly packed together in rows. The smugglers don't even allow you to open your bag for food and water. If you try to move, they beat you."

Since the outbreak of Somalia's civil war in 1991, each new cycle of turmoil has generated a fresh flow of refugees to neighboring Yemen. But during this past year's rise and fall of Somalia's Union of Islamic Courts (UIC), tiny fishing vessels carried 26,000 men, women, and children – a record number – from Somalia to Yemen.

Among the latest wave of refugees are rank-and-file members of Somalia's defeated Islamists, and now ousted moderate UIC leaders are also seeking refuge in Yemen, sparking concern from Yemeni officials and Western diplomats that Al Qaeda-linked radical Islamists are also using these well-worn human-trafficking routes to escape from Somalia to the Arabian Peninsula.

"We are concerned that terrorist operatives will try to escape Somalia and establish safe haven elsewhere," says one Western diplomat in Yemen's capital, Sanaa. "Governments in the region, including Yemen, share that concern. They are doing what they can to prevent suspected terrorists from setting up a base in their country."

Moderate Islamists find refuge

Last month, Yemen's Interior Minister, Rashid al-Alimi, stepped up maritime security against possible infiltration from Somalia by radical Islamists and Al Qaeda fighters. But Yemeni President Ali Abdullah Saleh is currently hosting four senior UIC moderates, who, observers say, could hold the key to a future political settlement in Somalia, which could help stem the flow of refugees.

The latest arrival, deputy UIC leader Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, flew from Nairobi, Kenya, to Sanaa last Thursday, as a guest of the Yemeni government. Sheikh Sharif joins the UIC's foreign affairs spokesman, Ibrahim Adow, and two other UIC moderates who have been living under Yemeni protection in the southern port of Aden for more than a month.

One month after Somali and Ethiopian troops ousted Somalia's Islamists in a two-week offensive, groups tied to the Islamists are stepping up deadly guerrilla attacks across Somalia. And while an insurgency appears to be gathering steam, the US and its regional allies are hoping to co-opt individual leaders from within the ranks of the UIC's diverse and scattered leadership to bolster the weak and faltering transitional government. Washington is targeting popular figures without links to terrorism who still command a strong following among many Somalis – and chief among them is Sheikh Sharif.

"The inclusion of the UIC moderates is the only way to stabilize Somalia," says François Grignon, director of the International Crisis Group's Africa Program.

The quartet of UIC moderates now based in Yemen are viewed as central to creation of a future inclusive government in Somalia with a wide, stable power base. Their endorsement is also seen as crucial to the successful deployment of African Union peacekeepers. But, first, this core group must agree to a strategy among themselves in order to present a united front at multiparty peace talks.

DOJ_NMG_0131691

"Sheikh Sharif is here as part of our efforts to encourage the moderate Somali Islamists to participate in dialogue with the transitional government," says Yemen's Foreign Minister, Abu Bakr al-Qirbi. "We are hoping he will attend Somalia's National Reconciliation Conference, as soon as the parties agree on a date."

Yemen was the first Arab nation to open an embassy in Mogadishu following the UIC's retreat last month and President Saleh boasts a credible track record in hosting talks between the leaders of all Somalia's factions. Diplomats now hope that he can use established links to overcome the reluctance of Somalia's interim president, Abdullahi Yusuf, to cede some power to his former opponents.

Refugee influx continues

In the meantime, the lucrative trade in Somali refugees continues. Yemen's extensive maritime borders and weak coast guard make thorough and effective monitoring impossible.

Trafficking routes have shifted in the last six weeks, after a December gun battle between smugglers and Yemen's coast guard. Four boats capsized close to Yemen's shoreline during the confrontation and 140 people died, 90 of those were later buried in a mass grave. Refugees are now landing hundreds of miles away from the usual drop point in Shabwa Province, making it even harder for the authorities to predict and respond to their needs.

Amina Mohammad is one of Yemen's newest arrivals. She was dropped on al-Azizyia Island in the Red Sea last week and briefly detained by Yemeni police before she was transferred to UN protection. A supporter of the Islamists, she describes how she traveled in a boat with UIC soldiers. "I knew who they were and what they did for the UIC because I recognized them. They were my neighbors in Mogadishu."

The UN High Commissioner for Refugees says there are 84,000 registered refugees in Yemen but the government estimates the true figure is nearly four times higher. Yemen is the poorest country in the Arab world, and its weak economy is struggling to absorb rising numbers of newcomers.

"There's no doubt that the Yemenis are taking this issue very seriously," says one Western diplomat. "The large numbers of Somalis here are already putting Yemen's infrastructure under enormous pressure, and the government is acutely aware of the threat to internal security."

Yemen is a fragile state itself, facing its own terrorist network. The challenge now is to respond to the potential risk from Somali extremists before they reach Yemen's shores and embed themselves in the sizable diaspora community.

As US Focuses On Iraq Turmoil, Will It Miss The Bigger Picture? (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON

In a little over a year, the US mission in Iraq seems to have narrowed dramatically. Instead of the lofty goals of fostering a democracy that could serve as a regional beacon, the US now aims to curb the violence, especially in Baghdad.

This narrowing gives the American venture in Iraq more focus, while preserving hopes that the administration's long-range goals can be achieved, analysts say. But some warn that it is also dangerous if it becomes an end in itself, causing US policymakers to lose sight of the bigger risks and objectives in the Middle East.

And some experts say the US is confusing tactical adjustments with a strategy.

"I see tactical and operational efforts that make sense – secure Baghdad, step up the fight in Anbar [Province] to disrupt Al Qaeda and the insurgent strongholds there, and all that's fine, but strategically we seem to be floundering," says Ralph Peters, a retired Army intelligence officer and Middle East specialist.

Pointing to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's efforts to encourage a bloc of Sunni powers to counter Shiite Iran's rise in the region, he says such moves raise questions of strategic coherence.

"We start with the goal of creating a regime of democracy and the rule of law that by its example will spread the rule of law and democracy in the region, and there's still a chance it will work," Mr. Peters says. "But now here we are, embracing our default strategy which is to support the devil we know, which is the Sunni regimes and, in particular, the Saudis. We are reverting to cold war form – they are our dictators, therefore they are good dictators – and falling prey to a religious war the Saudis are fighting with the Shias."

Over the short term, American eyes are going to be focused on the turn of events inside Iraq, from the trend in bombings to the pace of US casualties. That is why the immediate US aim is to reduce the violence to a level that gives Iraqis the breathing space they need to make a number of crucial political decisions, analysts say, while tamping down the risks of instability spreading to other neighboring states – or creating a vacuum for Al Qaeda to prosper.

"The objective now is not so much that the violence be ended, but that the trend lines have been altered a year from now so that instead of getting worse, things are getting better," says James Dobbins, former envoy of the Clinton and Bush administrations to the Balkans and Afghanistan and now a security analyst with the RAND Corp. in Arlington, Va. "There may be much loftier objectives people could wish for, but I think the administration, Congress, and the public would be relieved if the situation in Iraq is slightly better a year from now instead of a little worse."

But that raises questions of just how much the US is in a position to influence even short-term goals.

The National Intelligence Estimate is "spot on" when it says that Iraq's conflict cannot be blamed on any of its neighbors, says Ellen Laipson, president of the Henry L. Stimson Center, an international peace and security research group in Washington, D.C. "Whether it's Iran or Syria, they are not the determining factor in the violence there."

Even though America's involvement is very different, it is finding its role as a "determining factor" increasingly limited in Iraq, she says. "Either the Iraqis are motivated by an enduring passion to get us out of there, or they are consumed by an intra-Iraqi dynamic to such a degree that we are irrelevant to the situation going on there."

Either way, she says, the Iraqis "can't accept our influence right now, even though they desperately need help from outside actors."

That does not mean that civil conflicts are impermeable to outside influence. Mr. Dobbins notes, for example, that violence in the Balkans in the 1990s was brought to an end by external pressures.

But it does mean that the US cannot operate under "wishful thinking" of what it would like to see happen, Mr. Peters says, but must prepare "plans C, D, F, and G" for other scenarios that may unfold.

In a new report for the Council on Foreign Relations, Middle East expert Steven Simon says the US should begin planning for "after the surge," by shifting its focus to containing the conflict and strengthening US military positions elsewhere in the region. He says the US should also "engage Iraq's neighbors" in developing a stabilization plan for Iraq.

"As it prepares to withdraw military [personnel] from Iraq, the US should act decisively and creatively across the wider Middle East to offset perceptions of American weakness that our setback in Iraq has triggered," Mr. Simon says. One area for action would be the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he adds, which the White House is now taking up again.

Former Army intelligence specialist Peters agrees that the US must pay particular attention to perceptions of American weakness and to the impact a perceived military defeat in Iraq would have.

"We can afford a strategic defeat in Iraq, and a diplomatic reversal, but what we can't afford is a perception of a military defeat," he says. "Given how our security is intertwined with the region, we must at a minimum make it clear that our military has not been defeated."

Europe's Muslims Find Ally In U.S. (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 13, 2007

The State Department, concerned about a "nativist surge" in Western Europe, has created a position to coordinate efforts to reach out to European Muslims and help them better integrate into society, a senior official said yesterday.

Daniel Fried, assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said U.S. embassies and consulates in Britain, France, Germany, the Netherlands and other countries will decide what exactly they can do, instead of "Washington bureaucrats dreaming this up."

The growing Muslim presence in Europe is "a fascinating issue and one that the American government is just now trying to get its mind around," Mr. Fried told editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "It's a huge problem, we are thinking about it seriously, and we've tried to do some intellectual framing-up."

Farah Pandith, until recently a staffer on the National Security Council (NSC), moved to the State Department last week to head the new effort.

Unrest among Muslims in Europe, particularly those who have turned to extremist acts such as the 2005 London transit system bombings, has spurred a heated debate across the continent.

The French government, for example, now regrets having resettled North African immigrants in de facto ghettos, where unemployment and bad schooling led to desperation among young people, Paris' ambassador to Washington, Jean-David Levitte, told The Times last month.

"The unrest that existed in poor neighborhoods had nothing to do with jihad and much to do with social conditions," he said. "That's why we have to put the emphasis on improving the social conditions -- schools, jobs, better housing -- and hopefully all this will trigger better absorption in the social fabric of France of this minority."

Mr. Fried said that a "process of alienation" is occurring within Europe's Muslim communities, and that their host countries have "no sense of integration."

"Europe has to learn to do that," he said. "You have a weird nativist surge in Western Europe, and a kind of odd panic: Aliens are here, they don't accept our values, they are a threat to our way of life and turn to radicalism."

DOJ_NMG_0131693

One program in place in some countries brings American Muslims to Europe to meet with their counterparts and try to "break down stereotypes" and help them end their "self-isolation," Mr. Fried said.

He said he has not found strong anti-American feelings among European Muslims during his travels, even though many disagree with U.S. policies in the Middle East.

"I don't get big speeches." he said. "They say, 'We want to live in Europe. Can you help us out? Do you understand us? We want to be good Muslims and good Europeans."

Mr. Fried, a career diplomat since 1977, is a former ambassador to Poland and served as senior director for European affairs at the NSC during President Bush's first term.

Mr. Fried also spoke extensively about Russia, two days after President Vladimir Putin rebuked U.S. foreign policies as "unilateral" and "illegitimate."

The American diplomat said he does not understand why the Russians keep saying that Washington's actions are aimed at Moscow.

"The problem from an American point of view is not that the Russians are rebuilding their state," he said. "The problem is that what Putin is doing ... is not rebuilding the institutions of a modern country -- at least not yet. He's rebuilding the center, but national strength doesn't come just from a strong center."

Asked about Mr. Putin's attempts to curb some of Russia's oligarchs, Mr. Fried suggested that the president was guided by the principle, "I'll replace the guys I don't like with my own guys."

"Go down the list of senior Kremlin officials who are also chairmen of the boards of major parastatals," he said. "What does that tell you?"

Putin Visits Qatar Amid Talk Of 'Gas Opec' (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Andrew England

Financial Times, February 13, 2007

Leaders of Russia and Qatar, two of the world's largest natural gas producers, said last night they would explore the creation of an Opec-style natural gas cartel.

Vladimir Putin, Russian president, and Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani, Emir of Qatar, said experts from both countries would discuss the idea at a natural gas conference in Doha, the Qatari capital, in April. Their comments were made during a visit by Mr Putin to Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Jordan - the first by a Russian president to the three countries.

They came less than two weeks after Mr Putin told a Moscow press conference that a "gas Opec" was an "interesting idea", though adding that such a body would not be a price-fixing cartel. He was responding to a suggestion by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's Supreme Leader, that Russia and Iran should co-ordinate gas activities.

But the message from gas-producing countries remains mixed, with Mr Putin's remarks yesterday apparently at odds with his energy minister, Viktor Khristenko. Mr Khristenko last week described as a "fantasy" the idea that Russia might form a gas exporters' body.

Qatar's energy minister also said last week there was no need for a cartel of gas producers.

"Who said that we have rejected the idea of a cartel?" Mr Putin said in Doha. "I said it was an interesting idea. Whether we need a cartel, whether we will create such an organisation, is a separate conversation. But of course we should co-ordinate our activities with other producers."

Mr Putin added that he and Sheikh Hamad had agreed gas producers should "not repeat the mistakes of other cartel-type organisations". But the continued talk of a gas Opec is likely to cause ripples in the European Union, which relies on Russia for more than a quarter of its natural gas, and in the US, which is set to become more heavily reliant on gas imports.

It came days after Mr Putin delivered a hard-hitting speech criticising the US for trying to impose its will around the world, and during a Middle East visit seen as an attempt to increase Russia's diplomatic role in the region and counter American influence.

Sheikh Hamad supported the discussions on a gas exporters' organisation, but expressed doubt over whether a gas cartel could exercise the same control over the market as Opec.

Russia has the world's largest gas reserves while Qatar has the third-largest. Iran, with the second-largest, is also developing its gas export capabilities.

Energy experts have said a cartel would be difficult to create in gas because it is more difficult to transport than oil, and the market is dominated by contracts running for 20 years or more.

The Russian president had earlier rounded off a landmark visit to Saudi Arabia by meeting businessmen and urging greater economic ties between the two countries, saying Russia could help the oil-rich kingdom develop railways and atomic energy.

Mr Putin's visit to the region is also seen as an attempt to boost Russian military sales to the Middle East and bolster relations with key energy producers.

Senior businessmen including the heads of Lukoil, Gazprom and Rosoboronexport, the state arms export agency, are accompanying Mr Putin.

The Russian leader was heading last night to Jordan. All three countries - Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Jordan - are important US allies in the Middle East but American credibility has suffered from the escalating conflict in Iraq and Washington's failure to focus more on the wider Arab-Israeli conflict.

Saudi Arabia, the world's largest oil exporter ahead of Russia, is enjoying an extraordinary oil-fuelled boom and is seeking toreassert its political influence.

In December, Saudi Arabia and five other Gulf states announced they would study the possible development of a joint nuclear programme.

Putin Visits Qatar For Talks On Natural Gas And Trade (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

New York Times, February 13, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 12 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia arrived in Qatar on Monday to discuss trade, security and the possible formation of a natural gas cartel on the second leg of a three-day tour of the Middle East that is widely seen as an attempt to expand Russia's strategic role in the region.

"We seek to develop special relations between Qatar and Russia," Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, the emir of Qatar, said shortly after Mr. Putin arrived. "Relations at all levels have been developing vigorously over the past year and a half."

Mr. Putin, who came from an overnight state visit to Saudi Arabia, held talks with the emir over military and trade cooperation, the Russian news agency Itar-Tass reported. Both leaders pledged to expand cooperation to better manage the worldwide supply of natural gas, but remained tentative about the possibility of forming a natural gas cartel.

"We do not reject the idea of creating a gas cartel," Mr. Putin told reporters late Monday. "But this initiative requires more study."

Mr. Putin said he would dispatch experts in April to a natural gas conference in Doha, Qatar's capital, to discuss the creation of a cartel modeled after the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which holds sway over the world's oil prices.

"It's important to cooperate and to help each other," Mr. Putin said. "We also work together to defend the interests of gas exporters and coordinate our relations toward the consumers."

European leaders have expressed concern over even the mention of a natural gas cartel, in which Russia would likely hold significant power and could raise prices as it has over the past year for several Eastern European states.

Earlier Monday, in the Saudi capital, Riyadh, Mr. Putin met with Saudi businessmen seeking to encourage bilateral trade and technology cooperation, and pledged to assist Saudi Arabia in developing nuclear power generation capability.

The Gulf Cooperation Council, which includes all the Arab states in the Persian Gulf, announced its intention to develop nuclear technology in December, apparently a signal to Iran and the United States that the member countries could match Iran's nuclear development efforts.

In meetings late Sunday, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Mr. Putin called for joint development and cooperation in sectors like communications, technology and transportation, the official Saudi news agency, SPA, reported.

Trade between Saudi Arabia and Russia has expanded to more than $400 million in 2005 from $88.5 million in 1999.

"Russia is determined to further enhance its relations with Muslim countries, especially the Arab countries," Mr. Putin told Saudi businessmen at the Riyadh Chamber of Commerce on Monday. "We are all allies of the kingdom in working to meet the world's need for energy."

Mr. Putin will continue his Middle Eastern trip Tuesday by traveling to Amman, Jordan, where he will meet with King Abdullah II to discuss economic and political cooperation, and meet with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

Qatar Shows Interest In Natural-Gas Cartel (WSJ)

By James Herron

Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

Qatar's interest in exploring the creation of an OPEC-like cartel for natural gas adds another major producer to a group that includes Russia and Iran. Even so, industry experts say the nascent effort faces significant obstacles, ranging from a fragmented market to a history of noncooperation among the world's biggest holders of reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0131695

Russian President Vladimir Putin and Qatari Emir Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani said yesterday, at a meeting in Doha, Qatar, that they wanted competing gas producers to cooperate more. Mr. Putin said he would send a team of experts to a natural-gas conference in Doha in April, where they would discuss details of building a cartel.

The leaders of Russia, the No. 1 gas producer in terms of reserves, and No. 2 Iran have been talking recently about creating a group similar to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which manages its output in an effort to sway crude-oil prices world-wide. If such a group were formed, the inclusion of No. 3 Qatar -- a major producer of liquefied natural gas, or LNG -- would give it significant clout.

But forming such a group could be difficult. Sheik Hamad said he supported the discussions, but he was unsure whether a gas cartel would be able to command the same degree of market control as OPEC does.

Gas demand is climbing amid global economic growth and because it burns cleaner than other fuels. But gas markets are fragmented, in part because transporting gas overseas can be difficult, complicating efforts to form a single global market, like oil, in which a group of producers could hold sway. LNG, which is natural gas cooled into liquid form and shipped overseas via tanker, has moved natural gas closer to a world market, but it remains a small part of global use.

Also, gas tends to be sold through long-term contracts. That means a cartel would have little influence on such arrangements, Sheik Hamad said in a press conference in his presidential palace.

Past efforts haven't led to significant cooperation among gas producers. Russia, Qatar and Iran are members of the Gas Exporting Countries Forum, which was formed in 2001 but hasn't met since 2005.

Jonathan Stern, Director of Gas at the Oxford Institute For Energy Studies, said Mr. Putin's talk of closer cooperation among gas exporters isn't the same as a cartel and "doesn't mean a price-setting or volume-setting organization." He said Russia and Qatar, as gas exporters, don't have much in common, and they have much more potential to be competitors, especially in the European market.

A spokeswoman for the International Energy Agency said a cartel that raises prices "will encourage consumers to reduce demand or switch to other fuels. This is particularly true for gas, which can be substituted with coal and nuclear."

Julie Reside, a State Department spokeswoman, said there has been talk of a possible "gas OPEC" for many years, with no result. "I think experience has shown that free and open markets work best for both producers and consumers," she said.

Russia has sparked concern in the West that it is using its vast energy reserves as political leverage. Mr. Putin has dismissed the criticism, and he has defended moves to raise gas prices on some customers as an effort to put market prices in place after years of lower prices.

Japan Investigates Blasts Near U.S. Base (AP)

By Joseph Coleman

AP, February 13, 2007

Japanese police were investigating a suspected extremist attack on the U.S. Army after two small explosions occurred outside a military base south of Tokyo, police said Tuesday.

There were no reports of injury or damage at Camp Zama or from nearby residents, Kanagawa prefectural police spokesman Hiroyoshi Ichikawa said.

Investigators found a pair of metal tubes planted in the ground at a nearby park. They were believed to be used as rocket launchers and pointed toward the base, Ichikawa said.

He said investigators suspect an attack by leftist extremists, but cannot rule out a possibility of a terrorist attack.

The Army was investigating the blast, said an official at Camp Zama who spoke on condition of anonymity, adding that there were no reports of injuries or damage.

"A small explosion was heard in the vicinity of the base," said Maj. David Smith, a Pentagon spokesman. "It did not occur on the base."

The Army could not immediately confirm what had caused the blasts.

In 2002, two blasts were heard outside Camp Zama, and Japanese police found a metal projectile and a crude mortar made from a metal pipe nearby. Investigators blamed radical guerrillas for the explosions, which caused no injuries.

Leftist extremists in Japan have used projectile launchers against targets related to the U.S. military or on sites connected to the royal family. The attacks are usually more symbolic than dangerous, and injuries or significant damage are rare.

The United States has some 50,000 troops based in Japan under a security treaty. Residents complain of crime, pollution and noise connected to the bases, but large-scale protests of the military presence are largely confined to the southern island of Okinawa.

A Good Place To Have Aided Democracy (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0131696

By Anne Applebaum
The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

TUNIS -- "If you wanted to support democracy in the Arab world, why did you begin with your enemies instead of your friends? Why Iraq and Iran? Why not us?"

It's an excellent question, and when it was posed to me a few days ago by Mokhtar Trifi, president of the Tunisian League for the Defense of Human Rights, I at first found it hard to answer. Trifi, whose dark suit and elegant French make him seem like the statesman he ought to be, does indeed seem a far better candidate for American friendship and support than, say, the prime minister of Iraq. Because Tunisia also seems, on the surface, much closer to the West than many of its neighbors, it makes a curious example of what might have been.

Like Turkey, Tunisia is an avowedly secular Muslim state: Women here have the right to divorce and to marry as they please. Most do not wear headscarves, let alone veils. Much of the economy is private: The average income has risen in recent decades, and the middle class is relatively well educated. On a Friday afternoon in the suburbs of Tunis, every other street corner seems to feature a lycee, from which pour crowds of blue-jeaned teenagers, boys and girls, chatting and laughing. Ask them and they will tell you they feel more Mediterranean than Arab, that they have more in common with Parisians than with Syrians or Saudis.

But surfaces are deceiving, as Trifi -- whose office is haunted by omnipresent goons, whose visitors are sometimes harassed and who is occasionally beaten up himself-- can testify. One French analyst, Beatrice Hibou, has described how the myth of "reform" has been used in Tunisia to disguise from the world the deepening corruption, nepotism and stagnation of a one-party state, dominated by what is, in effect, a president-for-life. While French politicians speak of the Tunisian "economic miracle," party cadres connive to keep the best jobs. Though the United Nations held its " World Summit on the Information Society" in Tunis in 2005, Tunisia deploys an Internet filtering and control regime draconian even by the standards of the Arab world. The goons hang about the Internet cafes, too, hands stuffed in the pockets of their windbreakers.

The Tunisians have also become masters of a kind of recognizable, Putinesque, postmodern political charade, supporting a whole panoply of phony political parties, phony human rights groups, phony elections. They talk of "democracy" and "reform" and of course "anti-terrorism." But break the mold in Tunisia -- engage in genuine opposition politics -- and you might find you've lost your state health care or even your private-sector job. The tentacles of the party reach deep, though actual violence is rare. Says Trifi, "It causes too much trouble." After all, violence could damage the benevolent image that draws so many European tourists to Tunisia's beaches.

In the short term, this system has suited lots of people, not merely the president's friends and relations. Most notably, it has suited France, Tunisia's closest business partner and former colonial power. In 2003, French President Jacques Chirac proclaimed that since "the most important human rights are the rights to be fed, to have health, to be educated and to be housed," Tunisia's human rights record is "very advanced." More to the point, the French believe that the authoritarian Tunisian government is the only thing preventing a massive wave of illegal immigration to their country.

Unfortunately, the authoritarian government is also producing the potential Ã©migrÃ©s, too: For the most notable product of the Tunisian "economic miracle" is, at the moment, a lot of well-educated but unemployed young people. Once upon a time, the educated and the frustrated might have formed the backbone of a democratic revolution, just as they once did in South America and Eastern Europe. Now, Tunisians look at Iraq and see that "freedom" brings chaos and violence. Which leaves them with two options: emigration -- or radical Islam. Or perhaps both.

No one knows the true extent of radicalism in Tunisia because it is in the government's interests to exaggerate the threat. Nor does anyone know the true extent of Tunisian radicalism in the suburbs of Paris. But there have been bombs, arrests and reports of al-Qaeda copycat groups. Thus has an apparently benign authoritarianism produced in liberal Tunisia, as everywhere else in the Arab world, precisely the sort of terrorist inclinations it was supposed to prevent.

So why didn't the West interest itself in Tunisian democracy 15 years ago, back before "democracy" became a negative term, back before the not-quite-free economy went sour, back before radical Islam became chic among the blue-jeaned teenagers? The answers, as Trifi knows well, are clear: Because democracy promotion was an afterthought, never an important American goal in the Middle East. Because France, which has far more influence in Tunisia than we do, has never been remotely interested. And because no one in the West has ever been very good at thinking through what the longer-term results of the authoritarian status quo might really be.

Lift Liberia's Debt Burden (WSJ)

By Ellen Johnson Sirleaf And Paul Wolfowitz
The Wall Street Journal, February 13, 2007

For more than two decades, the people of Liberia have known little but violence and armed conflict brought on by leaders who violated the public's trust. By the time peace was realized in 2003, 250,000 Liberians, out of a population of three million, had been killed and many more had been rendered homeless. The country had become a base for warlords to smuggle diamonds and traffic in arms and drugs, activities that brought chaos to the country and destabilized the West African region.

Thankfully, this is not the Liberia of today, nor of tomorrow, due to the will of its people and the support of the international community. This support must now be broadened and deepened, particularly through the granting of debt relief, to secure a peaceful and stable future in Liberia.

In the election of 2005, the people of Liberia courageously chose peace, reconciliation and development over ethnic divisions and violence. They spoke loudly and clearly that they wanted a better future for themselves and their children -- a new, free and democratic Liberia where civil liberties, the rule of law, an accountable and transparent government, peace, security and economic development opportunities would be the norms.

Since that time, with the support of the international community, significant progress has been realized. The shattered infrastructure is slowly being rebuilt. Efforts are being made to repair roads, schools and clinics throughout the country that were almost all destroyed or damaged during Liberia's conflict. Water and electricity service has been restored to parts of Monrovia for the first time in 15 years. Economic reforms have increased government revenues by nearly 50% in the past year and the economy grew at 8%, with similar growth predicted for the coming year.

Critically, the foundations of an accountable government are in place and areas of past corruption are being reformed. The Public Procurement and Concessions Commission was established to review all contracts and concessions. The Liberia Reconstruction and Development Commission coordinates discussion with international partners on policy issues and program initiatives, and a code of conduct for public officials has been drafted. The government has taken significant steps to encourage trade and investment. In 2006, exports increased by 25%, and Liberia has been declared eligible for membership under the U.S. Africa Growth and Opportunity Act, facilitating U.S. investment and opening U.S. markets to Liberian exports. The National Investment Commission initiated a "one stop shop" approach to help reduce hurdles to investment and steps are underway to revise the investment and tax code to boost trade and investment.

But despite the progress, Liberia is a place of staggering hardship. Much of the population remains jobless, including many young excombatants outside the rehabilitation process that was designed to give them training and jobs. Three-quarters of the population continue to live on less than $1 per day and nearly half of Liberia's children are out of school.

The next 18 months will be critical in determining whether the aspirations of millions of Liberians can be translated into tangible progress, and this is an opportunity that we all must recognize and seize. Reaching a peace accord, holding an election and funding immediate humanitarian needs together represent only the first stage of rebuilding a battered country. Studies of dozens of nations that emerge from civil conflict show that many slide back into violent chaos when a clear peace dividend fails to materialize.

Emergency funding established to meet urgent humanitarian needs after peace was established is running out, and this early investment in peace must be augmented if Liberia hopes to avoid a return to chaos. The longer-term challenge of building a functioning economy and a capable state urgently requires development assistance that has been slow in arriving.

Debt relief is at the heart of future development assistance for Liberia. Debt relief is urgently needed to cut the staggering $3.7 billion in borrowings that has accumulated largely from the time of the 1980 military coup until the end of armed conflict. That is an unacceptable burden for a country of three million. Debt relief is a vital step in clearing the way for long-term development assistance and delivering results for Liberia's people. Reaching agreement on a debt relief package is a complex but necessary step in Liberia's economic recovery.

The stakes could hardly be higher. If Liberia succeeds, that success will bring hope to a region that has endured a contagion of war and displacement. If the expectations of two generations of Liberians who put their faith in a better future are not realized, the consequences for the Liberia and its neighbors could be dire. The moment to act is now, and the obligation falls to all of us -- the government of Liberia, the international community, regional partners, civil society and the private sector -- to meet the challenges ahead. Risks remain as we move forward, but the risks of not acting with conviction are far greater.

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf is president of Liberia. Mr. Wolfowitz is president of the World Bank.

America's Quiet Victories In Asia (WP)

By Michael J. Green

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Last month the leaders of 16 Asian nations met in the Philippines for the second East Asian Summit and agreed to work for better energy security and reduced poverty. The 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) signed an agreement with China on trade and services and pledged to work toward a broader free-trade agreement. President Gloria

Macapagal Arroyo of the Philippines, a traditional U.S. ally, declared that "we are happy to have China as our big brother in this region." No Americans were invited to the summit.

Is America's Pacific Century over? Is America losing Asia to China? Not yet. As with all things Asian, the appearance of harmony in the meetings in Cebu does not entirely match reality. Almost all the major leaders at the summit still trust Washington more than their neighbors, China in particular. And while China may be key to the region's economic dynamism, the political model the leaders are increasingly embracing for long-term success is the one championed by the United States.

Take the East Asia Summit itself. When China proposed hosting the meeting two years ago, many in the region reacted with alarm. Singapore and Japan pushed successfully for the inclusion of leaders from India, Australia and New Zealand to balance Chinese influence, and ASEAN won agreement that only its members could host the summits. Meanwhile, Singapore signed a strategic framework agreement granting greater access to U.S. forces, Indonesia took steps that allowed the United States to resume bilateral military contacts, and Vietnam signed an agreement allowing greater religious freedom to help ensure a successful summit with President Bush and closer strategic alignment with Washington. Arroyo's obsequious nod to "big brother" in Beijing aside, Asian leaders are not about to let the Pacific become a Chinese lake.

The regional trade agreements are also less threatening to U.S. interests than they sound. Most economists expect little trade distortion or barriers to American firms from these agreements, which are pockmarked with exemptions. To the extent that more advanced economies such as those of Japan or Singapore are using these intraregional economic discussions to increase transparency, capacity and governance in the less-developed economies, such as Indonesia's, it helps U.S. business. Ultimately, Asia still depends heavily on U.S. capital and foreign direct investment and markets to sustain economic growth.

America's greatest source of soft power in Asia is the Asian embrace of democracy. At its founding, ASEAN members were all led by authoritarian leaders or dictators; the guiding principle of the organization was "noninterference in internal affairs" -- a platitude that essentially represented a rejection of universal values. Today, China is embracing that principle of noninterference, but ASEAN is moving on. The most important document at Cebu was not about trade or energy but the draft of ASEAN's new governing charter, which says regional peace and stability rest on "the active strengthening of democratic values, good governance, rejection of unconstitutional and undemocratic changes of government, the rule of law, including international humanitarian law, and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms."

Thomas Jefferson could not have put it better, but this is the thinking of Indonesia's first directly elected president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. It is the vision of Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who has rejected decades of mercantilist thinking in an effort to define a new purpose for a resurgent Japan. It is a central theme of Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, who is moving India beyond non-alignment and championing democracy as the answer to the increasing threat of failed states and terrorism in India's neighborhood.

None of these leaders embraced democracy because it was imposed by the United States, nor are they contemplating imposing democracy on their neighbors. Many continue to have major governance and democracy challenges (Thailand's coup for one) and are torn over how to manage the undemocratic disaster that is Burma. Yet all recognize that their economic development and national security depend on the spread of democratic principles and good governance. As these values are consolidated across the region, they will inevitably affect China, Burma and even North Korea.

The United States has a winning hand in Asia and needs to play it. This means more engagement at senior levels -- with China, but particularly with like-minded leaders in India, Japan and Indonesia. It means completing our free-trade negotiations with Korea so that the United States sets the standard for trade liberalization in the region. Above all it means not abandoning our commitment to the promotion of democracy in Asia, where we are succeeding despite setbacks in Iraq and the Middle East.

The writer was senior director for Asian affairs at the National Security Council from January 2004 to December 2005. He is at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and Georgetown University.

Mr. Putin's Vision (WP)

Washington Post, February 13, 2007

BEFORE considering the significance of Vladimir Putin's address to an international security conference in Munich on Saturday, it's worth pausing to admire the astonishing nerve of the Russian president. Mr. Putin claimed the United States had "overstepped its national borders in every way . . . in the economic, political and cultural policies it imposes on other nations." This from a leader who has imposed an economic boycott on Georgia and Moldova and who interrupted energy supplies during winter to Ukraine and Belarus; who supports separatist regions in Georgia and Moldova with money and troops; and who overtly intervened in the 2004 Ukrainian presidential election in an attempt to impose a favored candidate through fraud.

Mr. Putin suggested that the United States was responsible for "a greater and greater disdain for the principles of international law," and that consequently "no one can feel that international law is like a stone wall that will protect them." Tell that to Britain's Scotland Yard, where investigators are unable to pursue their probe of the murder of one of Mr. Putin's critics because the two leading suspects are being shielded behind a legal stone wall in Moscow.

The Russian president also said that U.S. policy "stimulates an arms race." Minutes later he breezily acknowledged that Russia, unlike the United States, is developing a new intercontinental ballistic missile, the Topol-M; that it recently supplied Iran with new air defense missiles; and that antitank missiles it delivered to Syria were used by Hezbollah against Israel in last summer's war. Yesterday Mr. Putin was in Saudi Arabia, where he reportedly was finalizing a sale of 150 Russian T-90 tanks, and where he offered to help the Saudis with nuclear technology.

What's the point of such bravado? No doubt it partly has to do with Mr. Putin's tour of the Middle East: The Russian leader is doing his best to take advantage of U.S. problems in the region. (In an interview with al-Jazeera, the favorite TV station of Sunni Arab nationalists, Mr. Putin deplored the execution of Saddam Hussein and contrasted the deaths of 3,000 U.S. soldiers with the "execution of around 148 people" that he said the former Iraqi president was charged with.) Mr. Putin may also have been seeking to preempt criticism of himself by European governments that have grown increasingly disenchanted with his regime.

But the Russian president also had a larger purpose: to proclaim the return of his country as a power that would "balance" the United States. Mr. Putin, who has described the collapse of the Soviet Union as a "catastrophe," spoke nostalgically about the Cold War: "We are indebted to the balance of power between these two superpowers," he said. "This was certainly a fragile peace and a frightening one. But . . . it was reliable enough. Today it seems that the peace is not so reliable." With its soaring oil revenue and its hold over European energy supplies, its modernizing nuclear forces, and its willingness to provide weapons and nuclear technology to such states as Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia, Russia would regain a status such that the United States would be "afraid to make an extra step without consulting." That, anyway, is Vladimir Putin's clearly stated ambition.

Putin's NATO Beef (LAT)

Expanding the Cold War-era alliance to reach Russia's border was bound to color the Kremlin's view of the U.S.

LAST WEEKEND'S Cold War revival at a security conference in Munich, Germany, featured a cynical Vladimir V. Putin against a reasonable Robert M. Gates, but the Russian president still scored points with his pointed anti-American speech. Putin complained that U.S. unilateralism and disregard for international law were making the world a more dangerous place, fueling insecure nations' appetite for sophisticated weaponry, especially nukes. What made the speech so cynical was Putin's built-in rationale for Russian arms sales to unsavory clients, including Iran, because he doesn't want that nation to "feel cornered."

Gates replied to Putin's confrontational address a day later with disarming remarks about the bluntness of former spies, nostalgia for the simplicity of the Cold War and even acknowledgment that some of Washington's recent missteps (mainly in the treatment of detainees) have eroded our credibility abroad. He also raised legitimate concerns, ever so tactfully, about the Kremlin's increasingly autocratic drift.

Yet Putin's tough talk undoubtedly played well, not only among those in the West and elsewhere who oppose the Iraq war, but among his domestic constituents who have deep-seated reasons for rejecting Gates' assertion that the U.S. is a "force of good around the world." These reasons have less to do with Iraq than with U.S. moves in the last decade to expand NATO to the east, in violation of what Russians felt was an implicit, if not explicit, deal: That in the twilight of the Soviet era, Moscow would allow for German reunification and pull its forces out of Eastern Europe as long as Washington didn't stab the Kremlin in the back by enlarging NATO to Russia's borders.

That is precisely what followed. A typical NATO communique in the aftermath of the unexpectedly peaceful conclusion of the Cold War stated: "Consistent with the purely defensive nature of our alliance, we will neither seek unilateral advantage from the changed situation in Europe nor threaten the legitimate interests of any state." But within a few years, the U.S. turned vindictive victor in the eyes of Russia, allowing former Warsaw Pact members into NATO, including the formerly Soviet Baltic republics. The humiliation, and seeming encirclement, of Russia continues relentlessly to this day, with talk of someday bringing Georgia and Ukraine into the club.

NATO enlargement a decade ago was largely shrugged off in this country (though it was rightly opposed by this page), but Americans need to start realizing the extent to which this historical blunder drives how Russians interpret U.S. actions around the world. It helps explain why a hard-line nationalist such as Putin, despite his anti-democratic tendencies, remains hugely popular at home. The only surprise about his angry speech is that it took him this long to deliver it.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Padilla Claims He Is Too Traumatized For Trial. USA Today (2/14, Parker) reports, "The prisoner lived in isolation in a cell with only a steel slab for a bed. At times chained to the floor, he was deprived of light, sleep, a clock and heat. His interrogators injected him with 'truth serum' drugs to try to loosen his tongue and threatened him with execution. … That's how Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen held without charge as an 'enemy combatant,' was treated for three years and eight months at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., his attorneys allege. In court papers, they say Padilla — initially accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive 'dirty bomb' — was treated so severely that it amounted to torture and rendered him mentally incompetent to now stand trial on terrorism charges that could bring him life in prison." USA adds, "That provocative claim — disputed by the government, which says Padilla was not abused and is fit for trial — will be the focus of a mental competency hearing for Padilla, scheduled for Feb. 22 in a federal court in Miami. … The long-shot effort to have him declared unfit for trial is the latest turn in a case that has become a test of how far the U.S. government can go in limiting the civil liberties of an American in the name of national security. … It pits Padilla — the first American since the Civil War to be held by the military solely on the president's orders — against a government that, under persistent legal challenges, has taken the case on an unusual journey from military detention to the U.S. Supreme Court and then to a federal trial court." USA n otes, "Government lawyers decline to give details about how Padilla has been treated, but they flatly dispute the defense's version. 'It has no merit whatsoever,' prosecutors say in papers filed in the court where Padilla is scheduled for trial April 16. He is charged with conspiring to support terrorism overseas as part of a North American terror cell. … The government has said that however it handled the Brooklyn-born Padilla, 36, its actions were necessary to try to learn more about terrorism."

US Man Charged With Plotting Al Qaeda Overthrow In Somalia. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Stinebaker) reports, "A former Houston man arrested in Kenya last month has been charged in Texas with teaming with al-Qaida to overthrow the Somali government and form an Islamic state there. Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, was ordered held without bail Tuesday on federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device." The AP notes, "Maldonado's arrest marks the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining terrorists in Somalia, Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein said in a statement. … Maldonado told FBI agents in Kenya that he went to Somalia to fight 'jihad,' or holy war, for a true Islamic government, according to the complaint."

Fox News (2/13) reported on its Web site, "The investigation included elements of the Joint Terrorism Task Force and the Houston Police Department." Fox added, "Joseph Billy, Assistant Director of the FBI Counterterrorism Division, said, 'The FBI is working closely with our law enforcement and intelligence community partners in this country and around the world to bring all necessary resources to bear to protect Americans and its allies from terrorist attacks.'" TheHouston Chronicle (2/14, George, 530K) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Abran 'Abe' Martinez, who leads the special prosecutions unit in the U.S. Attorney's Office, which includes anti-terrorism, said the investigation originated in Houston, but declined to talk about what brought Maldonado here."

The Boston Globe (2/14, Mishra, 413K) reports, "Spurred by radical Islamic beliefs," the "Massachusetts native…journeyed from the streets of Boston to the frenzied civil war in Somalia, where he allegedly conspired with Al Qaeda militants to establish a fundamentalist regime, only to end up in the custody of FBI agents when his insurgent efforts unraveled, according to court papers released yesterday. … A conviction could mean life in prison."

AFP (2/14) reports, "Maldonado, 28, is accused of leaving his Houston, Texas home in 2005 'in search of a country where he could practice true Islam,' according to FBI documents. … A year later, he joined the Islamic Courts Union and elements of Al Qaeda to fight for the establishment of an independent Islamic state in Somalia, the criminal complaint alleged." AFP adds, "During the course of his training, the complaint added, Maldonado spoke about his willingness to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded, and also observed how bombs were made and tested with the group's bomb-maker. … He was captured by the Kenyan military on January 21 as he fled to avoid Ethiopian and Somalian forces. At the weekend, he was handed over to US authorities and escorted back to Houston. … 'This case represents the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining forces with Islamic extremist fighters in Somalia,' said Kenneth Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's National Security Division. … 'The prosecution of Mr. Maldonado demonstrates the scope of our laws and serves as a warning to others who would travel overseas to wage violent jihad.'"

Democratic Bill Would Restore Habeas Corpus For Detainees. The Washington Post (2/14, A8, White, 690K) reports a group "of Senate Democrats introduced legislation yesterday that would restore habeas corpus rights to all detainees in U.S. custody and would narrowly define what it means to be an 'enemy combatant' against the United States, a measure designed to challenge laws ushered in by the Republican-controlled Congress last year." The bill, "titled the 'Restoring the Constitution Act of 2007,' strikes at the core of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 by giving detainees access to U.S. courts. It was introduced by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination." The bill "would also prevent the executive branch from making blanket determinations about who is an enemy combatant and would restrict the president's authority to interpret when certain human rights standards apply to detainees. The legislation would limit the label 'enemy combatant' to a person 'who directly participates in hostilities in a zone of active combat against the United States' or who took part in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001."

Panel Recommends London Police Apologize For Mistaken Raid. The Washington Post (2/14, A15, Jordan, 690K) reports the Independent Police Complaints Commission says "London police should publicly apologize to two Muslim families caught up in a mistaken anti-terrorist raid in which a man was shot." The panel was "investigating the dramatic dawn raid of two homes in East London last June by about 250 officers, some in chemical protective suits. Police officials later said they believed that 'a highly dangerous explosive device that could be set off remotely' was being made there." Two men, "Mohammed Abdul Kahar, 23, and his brother Abul Koyair, 20, were arrested, and Abdul Kahar was accidentally shot in the shoulder during the scuffle. A week later, after an extensive search of the houses, both men were released without charge." Although it "admonished the police for some of their procedures, the panel did not recommend disciplinary action in connection with the raid, which soured relations between police and many Muslims."

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Launches New System For Monitoring FISA Wiretap Applications. Government Computer News (2/13, Dizard) reported, "The FBI has launched an application that monitors the preparation of requests for secret wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by using several levels of classification, ranked by the security level of the user. … An FBI special agent recently recounted the state of affairs regarding executive branch requests to the FISC for national-security wiretaps when FBI director Robert Mueller took office in August 2001. 'The director asked how many [FISA requests] were pending,' the FBI official said. 'The answer was, "The FBI didn't know." He asked, "How long does it take to approve one?" We didn't know. He asked, "What's the holdup [main delaying factor]?" We didn't know.'" GCN added, "When Mueller joined the FBI, officials transmitted FISA requests among agencies by sneakernet," and "the FBI official said, 'To give you an idea of their idea of connectivity, it was called Oasis [and wasn't connected to anything].' … Automating the system speeded the approval process from 120 days to 60 days, the official said. It also provides an audit trail of system activity, generates reminders about pending requests and has room to grow, the official said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Islamic Jihad Threatens Attacks On Americans If Shallah Harmed. In a story focusing on the Palestinian and Israeli disagreement over next week's summit with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's, the AP (2/14, Laub) reports, "In other developments Tuesday, senior members of the violent Islamic Jihad group warned in Gaza City that American citizens could be in danger if any harm comes to their leader, Ramadan Shallah. The vague threats were made after Washington offered up to $5 million for his capture."

Judge Orders Deportation Of Rhode Island Trucking School Student. The Providence Journal (2/14, Mooney, 167K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday ordered an Indian national whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school spawned a nationwide antiterrorism investigation be deported. Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala 'is not the person who he claims to be,' said U.S. Immigration Judge Matthew J. D'Angelo." The Journal adds, "'While Mullawala's 'ultimate intentions and motives have not yet been revealed in full,' the judge said, 'this court reaches a finding that mirrors the grave concern expressed by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, The Rhode Island State Police and the Rhode Island Fusion Center' — which spearheads local homeland security matters." Mullawala "remain in the custody of Homeland Security officials while officials there continue investigating his alleged suspicious behavior."

Appeals Court Upholds Freezing Of US Islamic Charity's Assets. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Hananel) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld the government's decision to freeze the assets of a Missouri-based Islamic charity with alleged links to a foreign group that supports terrorism. The Treasury Department claims the Islamic American Relief Agency-USA, of Columbia, Mo., is an affiliate of a Sudanese charity…accused of financing al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations." The AP notes, In 2004, federal agents raided the group's headquarters in Columbia, Mo., as part of a criminal investigation. No criminal charges have been filed against the charity or its employees. While the court found the unclassified evidence was 'not overwhelming,' the three-judge panel noted that its review of national security cases is 'extremely deferential' to the government." The Kansas City Star (2/14, Morris, 271K) also notes, "The FBI raided the group's office on Oct. 13, 2004, the same day Treasury agents labeled the group a terrorist supporter and froze its assets."

US Malls Seen As New Emerging Front In Terror War. Long Island Newsday (2/14, Eisenberg) reports, "The mall security guard scrutinizes the black backpack lying by the garbage bin. Should he open it? Ignore it? Call police? … In a world increasingly vulnerable to terrorism and random acts of violence like the rampage in a Salt Lake City mall Monday, security experts say that low-paid private security worker may be the front line of protection in one of the nation's most heavily trafficked places. And they question the adequacy of his training -- or of the malls' security measures -- to detect or deter an attack. … 'For suburban America, the mall is the gathering place,' said Mitchell Moss of New York University's Center for Catastrophe Preparedness and Response. 'It's much more than just a place to shop. It's where huge numbers of people gather to go to the movies, eat and socialize -- therefore, making it a potential terror target.'" Newsday continues, "Roosevelt Field, the state's largest mall, may draw as many as 100,000 people a day at holiday peak -- one reason Nassau police conducted a training exercise there a year after 9/11, based on the scenario of a plane crashing into the mall's food court. … The Department of Homeland Security has repeatedly warned that malls are potentially attractive targets for terrorists, although officials say there is no credible intelligence of imminent plots. … It cites al-Qaida training manuals that identify 'places of amusement' and 'vital economic centers' as targets and a pattern of such attacks worldwide. A Rand Corp. survey documented over 60 attacks since 1998 on shopping centers in places as diverse as Russia, Turkey and Israel." Newsday adds, "This country has seen only lone-wolf attacks -- one of the bloodiest Monday night when an 18-year-old Bosnian refugee opened fire on shoppers in a Salt Lake City mall, killing five and wounding four before being gunned down by an off-duty police officer. Police are still investigating his motive. .. .But such cases underscore how potentially vulnerable the nation's malls and shopping centers are to acts of violence, according to a recent Justice Department report, which found that while many malls have tightened security since September 2001, much more could be done. The report cited inadequate training for low-paid, high-turnover security workers, as well as insufficient drilling and coordination between mall security and first responders."

Chertoff Asks Senate Not To Delay Real ID Act, Pushes For Visa Waiver Changes. The Washington Times (2/14, Hudson, 88K) reports testifying Tuesday before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended the federalization of driver's licenses and asked a Senate panel not to block the Real ID law, but he urged members to make security changes in the visa waiver program. … 'We don't want to keep kicking the can down the road,'" said Chertoff, regarding proposals to delay the Real ID Act's 2008 implementation deadline." Chertoff "also said the Senate should legislate changes in the visa waiver program to secure international flights and ensure foreign visitors are not terrorist threats or do not overstay. 'We are not going to sacrifice security for the sake of facilitating travel among our allies,' Mr. Chertoff said."

Chertoff Says He "Will Not Apologize For Protecting Americans." Secretary Chertoff appeared on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (2/13, 8:20 pm, O'Reilly), where he was asked about Guantanamo Bay and the negative reaction that some have to the holding of prisoners there. "Because the hatred directed at you and the Bush administration for your policies of no more catch and release for illegals, and you know to keep these people in Guantanamo Bay until we fully vet them, not let them just out, the hatred direct toed you is staggering." Chertoff: "Well let me say this: I will not apologize for protecting Americans. I'm not going to apologize for putting as first priority keeping Americans safe. I don't think the administration will. Obviously we want to be humane and fair, but job one is keeping Americans safe from harm."

NYTimes Urges Chertoff Not To Appeal Dismissal Of LA 8 Case. Under the headline "A Shameful Prosecution," the New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) editorializes, "An immigration court judge's dismissal of 20-year-old deportation proceedings against two Palestinian men — and his criticism of the government's abusive conduct in the case — ought to prick the conscience of the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff. Rather than reflexively pursuing an appeal, Mr. Chertoff, a former federal judge, should see the wisdom of finally declaring an end to this sorry legal tale, which has become a big source of distrust in the Arab and Muslim community." The Times says the judge "fittingly denounced" the government's pursuit of the LA 8 case, calling it "'an embarrassment to the rule of law.' Mr. Chertoff has until Feb. 28 to file an appeal. The only decent thing to do is to drop the case."

Senate Bill Would Drop 100 Percent Screening For Shipping, Air Cargo. The AP (2/13, Lumpkin) reported Sens. Joe Lieberman and Susan Collins introduced "an anti-terrorism bill Tuesday that could spark future clashes with the House, proposing more homeland security money for smaller and rural states and dropping requirements for tougher cargo inspections." The Senate version of a bill implementing the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission "would drop House-passed provisions requiring that all containers on US-bound vessels be screened in foreign ports for radiation, and that all cargo loaded onto US airliners be screened for explosives. Both were strongly opposed by the Bush administration on grounds that they are too costly and require the use of technology that does not exist."

Report Urges More Investment To Develop Subway Bomb Detection Technology. USA Today (2/14, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page, "An ambitious test of machines for checking subway and rail passengers for bombs failed to find a technology that can reliably stop terrorists such as those who attacked trains in Madrid and London, according to a Homeland Security Department assessment." Each piece of "futuristic screening equipment" tested under the $7 million program "had significant problems," including "excessive false alarms," screenings that took too long, and one machine "'could not consistently locate the item that caused the alarm,' according to the report, which was not made public but was presented at a recent rail-security conference in Arlington, Va. The effort to screen rail passengers 'needs significant investment,' the assessment concludes. Democrats in Congress have recently pledged to boost spending on subway security systems by billions." In the face of "technological limitations,"

NFL Rejected Border Patrol Ad For Super Bowl Over Mention Of Terrorism, Illegals. The Washington Times (2/14, Dinan, Seper, 88K) reports, "The National Football League refused to run a recruitment ad for the US Border Patrol in last week's Super Bowl program, saying it was 'controversial' because it mentioned duties such as fighting terrorism and stopping drugs and illegal aliens at the border. … 'The borders, the immigration debate is a very controversial issue,'" said NFL spokesman Greg Aiello, "'and we were sensitive to any perception we were injecting ourselves into that.' The NFL's rejection didn't sit well with Border Patrol agents, who called it a snub of their role in homeland security and said it was 'more than a little puzzling.'"

Congress Concerned Contractors Given Too Much Control Over DHS Projects. The

Wall Street Journal (2/14, A16, Karp, 2.04M) reports issues with the Coast Guard's Deepwater modernization program, which has "given black eyes to Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. underscore broader concerns about the government's use of private contractors to oversee vital homeland security programs. Congress this week is scheduled to hold its third and fourth hearings in less than a month to review" the Coast Guard's "ambitious" effort, and legislators "are also scrutinizing SBInet, a Boeing Co.-led project to build a high-tech border surveillance system." The Journal adds that the concern among contractors "is that political pressure could prompt Homeland Security to revise contracts on less favorable terms. Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad Allen confirmed yesterday that the service will change the 'structure' and 'contractual relationship' with the Lockheed-Northrop joint venture, though details have yet to be worked out."

Allen Announces Management Overhaul At Coast Guard. The New York Times (2/14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports Admiral Thad Allen acknowledged that the US Coast Guard "has failed to keep up with changing times" as he "unveiled a plan Tuesday to restructure its management radically and expand its surveillance efforts along the nation's coasts." Though "intended to address mounting criticism" of Deepwater, the overhaul "is much broader, including revamping the way the Coast Guard manages its response to natural disasters and terrorist attacks, supervises its Atlantic and Pacific fleets, maintains its aircraft and ships and handles its payroll and financial systems." The Times adds that the plan outlined in Allen's speech "reflects changes that have already taken place at the service since 2001 when it assumed a broader antiterrorism mission and has had its budget grow by 50 percent, to $8.6 billion this year." The speech came "in advance of the release of another scathing report by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general on the Coast Guard's management of its ship procurement program."

WSJournal Praises Possible Sale Of Freedom Tower. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The Freedom Tower at Ground Zero in Manhattan still isn't much to look at -- a handful of beams rising from the pit roughly to ground level. But this week has brought the welcome news that private-equity funds and other investors are asking if its owner might be willing to sell the building that is supposed to replace the fallen twin towers. The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey has also hired a broker to shop the still-unbuilt tower." A sale "is far from certain," but "the twin towers were underoccupied and underutilized for at least two decades after their construction. Letting private capital take on the risks of turning a profit on the new 2.6 million-square-foot, 1,776-foot tower would ensure that history does not repeat itself at taxpayer expense."

WAR NEWS:

For House Democrats, Anti-Surge Resolution Is First Step In "Slow-Bleed" Strategy. USA Today (2/14, 8A, Kiely, 2.27M) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said yesterday that the current non-binding resolution on Iraq before the House "was only the beginning of congressional steps to try to change Iraq war policy. 'A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation, which will be coming to the House floor,' she said." Pelosi offered no explanation of what that legislation might be, and media accounts in several major news outlets didn't delve into that area either. For example, NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 4, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported "Democratic leaders say" the resolution "will be only the first step," and the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 5, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) said the measure "wouldn't force the President to change his strategy, but it could go a long way towards shaping Iraq policy in the future."

The Politico (2/14, Bresnahan) this morning offers an outline of the Democratic strategy beyond this week's House vote. "Top House Democrats," it reports, "working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to US involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options. Led by Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., and supported by several well-funded anti-war groups, the coalition's goal is to limit or sharply reduce the number of US troops available for the Iraq conflict, rather than to openly cut off funding for the war itself." The Politico adds, "The legislative strategy will be supplemented by a multimillion-dollar TV ad campaign designed to pressure vulnerable GOP incumbents into breaking with President Bush and forcing the administration to admit that the war is politically unsustainable." As "described by participants, the goal is crafted to circumvent the biggest political vulnerability of the anti-war movement -- the accusation that it is willing to abandon troops in the field. That fear is why many Democrats have remained timid in challenging Bush, even as public support for the president and his Iraq policies have plunged."

The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Weisman, 690K) interprets Pelosi's words as a warning about funding, reporting "both sides of the debate agreed that the real fight will come next month, when Democrats are to move to attach to a $100 billion war spending bill binding language that would limit future deployments to Iraq and begin to bring troops home." Another report that analyzes what the Democrats' future steps runs in the Los Angeles Times (2/14, A1, Levey, Gaoluette, 850K), under the headline "House debate: Prelude to a faceoff?" The Times says "many Democrats, including Iraq war veteran Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania, made clear that they wanted to follow the resolution vote with binding steps to force the Pentagon to begin withdrawing the more than 135,000 US forces now in Iraq." Republicans "have long tagged Democratic opposition to the war as an attack on the military. On Tuesday, Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) -- a Vietnam veteran who 34 years ago Monday was released after seven years in a North Vietnamese prisoner of war camp -- called the Democratic resolution a 'first step for them to cut funding for our troops in harm's way.'" And in another preview of that line of attack, Minority Leader John Boehner said yesterday, "We know what Al Qaeda thinks when America retreats from the battlefield. … They think we can't stomach a fight. This is why they haven't been afraid to strike us whenever they've had the opportunity." The Hill (2/14, Marre, Soraghan) runs a similar report under the headline "Pelosi: Iraq Resolution Is Just The Beginning,"

The New York Times (2/14, Zeleny, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "On its face, several Republicans conceded, the resolution was difficult to oppose. Two Republicans, John Shadegg of Arizona and Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, instructed their colleagues to make the debate about the fight against terrorism. 'If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose,' they wrote in a letter." That is why, says the Times, "many Republicans who spoke on Tuesday appeared to heed that message, framing the war as an important battleground in a global struggle against militant Islam." Democrats "sought to temper the tone of the debate, and the scope of the resolution, to avoid alienating all Republicans." The Washington Times (2/14, Ward, Hurt, 88K), meanwhile, says that "internal Republican memo that showed the minority party was…trying to avoid debating the specifics of the president's plan" was actually released by Democrats.

The AP (2/14, Davis), meanwhile, reports "many rank-and-file" Democrats, "particularly moderate newcomers who rode to Congress on a wave of public discontent about Iraq -- are wary of casting any vote that could be construed as ending funding for the mission."

ABC World News (2/13, story 2, 2:25, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Trying to seem strong on military issues, Democrats lined up veterans of Korea, Vietnam and Iraq as their first speakers in favor of the anti-surge resolution." Rep. Murphy: "Walking in my own combat boots, I saw firsthand this Administration's failed policy in Iraq." Rep. John Tanner: "The problem here is not the stomach of the troops. The problem is the competency of the civilian leadership that's gotten us into this mess." Democrats "expect at least a dozen Republicans to vote with them, including Maryland Republican Wayne Gilchrest, a Vietnam veteran and former Iraq war supporter, who says troops killed and wounded from his district have influenced his vote."

The AP (2/14, Espo) reports Democratic leaders "said they expected no more than one or two members of their rank-and-file to oppose the resolution. Republicans said that despite quiet lobbying by the White House, they expected at least two dozen GOP lawmakers to swing behind the measure, suggesting that it would command the votes of at least 250 or 260 votes in the 435-member House." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he would attempt to pass an identical measure later this month." The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Madhani, 617K) says Reid "plans to call the House resolution for a vote in his chamber Feb. 27."

McClatchy (2/14, Talev) reports that although "the White House dispatched national security adviser Stephen Hadley to advise any lawmakers who wanted to listen," lawmakers "said neither Republican congressional leaders nor the White House was twisting arms." Likewise, under the headline "Bush Stays Out Of Fight, Opts For Lighter Fare," the Washington Post (2/14, A6, Baker, 690K) says, "While the House of Representatives debated weighty matters of war and peace yesterday, President Bush headed to the YMCA." He "visited children bending paperclips into different shapes and urged Americans to volunteer as mentors. He talked not of armies in Iraq but of "armies of compassion" at home. Even the kids seemed confused. One asked why he came. 'I came to see you,' the president responded." Bush "is publicly ignoring the" House "clash -- a display that is part strategy and part concession to reality." The Post adds, "By not engaging in the debate, Bush sends the signal that it does not matter to him what Congress says in a nonbinding resolution, hoping to minimize the impact of what the White House considers the inevitable outcome. And according to strategists in both parties, he has limited influence on Capitol Hill at this point, even among fellow Republicans."

Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported, "Many House Republicans said the debate was stacked against them. Late Monday House Democrats refused to allow debate on two GOP alternatives, one to forbid future moves to cut off Iraq war funds, the other to support the findings of the Iraq Study Group. … Denying Republicans a chance to vote on an Iraq alternative violates a promise made by Democrats just last week." Hoyer was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (2/13, Matthews) why the Democrats will not allow a vote on the GOP's alternative. Hoyer answered, "We believe that the American public deserves a clear answer to the president's proposal. … We decided that unlike the Senate, which got very confused, and in gridlock on the whereas and therefore classes, that we would put a very simple proposition on the floor. And that was essentially two premises. A, we support the troops and we'll protect the troops. B, we do not support the escalation…and don't think it will work. We want a very clear vote on that issue, unconfused by other propositions. There will be time, as I have said, in the very near future on the supplemental, on the defense appropriation bill and on the defense authorization bill, all of which are coming up in the near term to make those other views known, but on this debate, we wanted a very clear question asked and a very clear answer given."

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (2/14, A2, Milbank, 690K), says, "A dazzling debate it wasn't. At the start, there were 75 members of Congress on the floor." By the time Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida, "the man in charge of Republican strategy in this week's great debate on Iraq," spoke, "about half an hour later, the number was down to 36; before long, the chamber returned to its usual, depopulated state." The Washington Post (2/14, A6, 690K) also runs several quotes from lawmakers participating in the debate, including Pelosi and Reps. Ike Skelton, Patrick J. Murphy and Peter Hoekstra."

Pelosi Quote Gets Widespread Local TV Coverage. Last night, there was heavy local TV coverage of the House debate across the nation. A significant number of reports showed footage of Pelosi saying, "No more blank checks for President Bush on Iraq. Our taxpayer dollars must go to protect our troops." Many of the reports showing the Speaker's quote also ran a clip of Minority Leader Boehner saying, "We are fighting to preserve and defend our sacred way of life." Among the stations following that pattern, quoting Pelosi and then a Republican representative who support the surge plan, were KCOY-TV Santa Barbara (2/13, 11:11 pm), WDRB-TV Louisville (2/13, 10:36 pm), WPXT-TV Portland, ME (2/13, 10:13 pm), KIII-TV Corpus Christi (2/13, 10:03 pm), KSPR-TV Springfield, MO (2/13, 10:01 pm), WRC-TV Washington, DC (2/13, 6:16 pm), and WWAY-TV Wilmington, NC (2/13, 5:18 pm).

Pence Urges Support For Surge. In a Washington Times (2/14, 88K) op-ed, Rep. Mike Pence (R-IN) writes, "I support the president's call for reinforcements and a change of our strategy because we must do everything in our power to see freedom prevail in Iraq. ... The temptation to retreat must be ignored."

In Interviews, US Soldiers In Iraq Express Anger At Democrats. ABC World News (2/13, story 2, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that it asked Army sergeants "in Ramadi what they thought of the resolution." First Sgt. Louis Barnum, US Army: "Makes me sick. I was born and raised a Democrat. When I see that, it makes me sad." Sgt. Brian Orechowski, US Army: "I don't want to bad mouth the President at all. To me, it is treason."

State Lawmakers Denounce Surge. The Washington Post's (2/14, 690K) Maryland Notebook column reports, "As Congress debates…Bush's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq, Democrats in the Maryland legislature are weighing in with a resounding no. A one-page letter signed by 83 lawmakers and sent yesterday to the delegation on Capitol Hill starts: 'The people of Maryland have not been shielded from the horrors taking place in Iraq.' ... State legislatures don't traditionally dip their toes into matters of foreign policy. But on the Iraq war, the General Assembly has a lot of company: Twelve other states, including California, Illinois, New Jersey and New Mexico, have gone even further this year, approving formal resolutions of opposition." On a similar vein, the Los Angeles Times (2/14, Slladay, 850K) this morning runs a story titled "Calif. Senate OKs resolution against Iraq."

Iraqi Government Closes Border Crossings To Iran And Syria. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported that the Iraqi government "said today that it will close its border crossings to Iran and Syria for three days as part of its new security plan for Baghdad. The closing is aimed to deter terrorists from both nations from crossing into Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Daragahi, 850K) reports Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, "the former naval officer appointed by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to oversee the much-vaunted Baghdad security plan, announced a 72-hour closure of some border crossings along the Iranian and Syrian frontiers, restrictions on civil liberties, and the suspension of all weapons licenses except for those issued to authorized security officials and contractors. 'Legal procedures will be taken and strict penalties will be imposed against all those who violate the rules,' Qanbar said, reading from a lengthy statement broadcast over state television." The Post adds, "It was unclear how some of the security provisions differed from measures already in place. Observers also questioned why Maliki left the announcement to a surrogate."

The New York Times (2/14, Santora, 1.16M) reports Qanbar "did not mention the role American forces would play in the crackdown, but his remarks were clearly timed to coincide with more aggressive efforts by American troops on the streets of Baghdad. The Americans have been establishing outposts — called joint security stations — to work alongside the Iraqi Army and police to end the sectarian bloodletting." The Times adds, "On Tuesday, senior American officers expressed surprise about the plan to resettle people who had moved from their homes amid sectarian cleansing. But they declined to be identified, saying they did not want to contradict the Iraqi general." Qanbar "indicated that the plan would be carried out evenly across Baghdad. But critics said…Maliki, who has come under intense criticism for pursuing a sectarian Shiite agenda, might be trying to appease his detractors and may not actually carry out the plan. Some feared that his government might not apply the same pressure to residents of Shiite areas." The Washington Times/AP (2/14, Abdul-Zahra) and Washington Post (2/14, A12, Ernesto Londo, 690K) run similar reports.

Iraqi Troops Appear To Meet Bush Plan's Demands. The Washington Times (2/14, Hess, 88K) reports, "Iraqi troops have passed a key test by showing up at 70 percent strength or better for President Bush's 'surge' in Baghdad, a senior US general said." Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq," said in an interview, "This movement of these three brigades and two separate battalions into Baghdad to our way of looking at it has gone very well. … We've also learned more lessons from this one, and in future deployments, we'll make it even better." Gen. Dempsey "said three brigades had shown up with between 70 percent and 75 percent of their soldiers. While a Kurdish unit from Sulaimaniyah and Kirkuk arrived with only 56 percent of its expected troops, he said, other inbound units from the Kurdish north were expected to arrive with 70 percent of their troops or more."

Insurgents Take Over Locals' Homes. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Rifai, 850K) describes, in a first-hand account, by an Iraqi architect and interpreter for the Times, how his family home was taken over and "house-jacked" by area insurgents. With his family away to escape the area's violence, little could stop insurgents from occupying the home when the area is filled with chaos- leaving little recourse for locals whose houses have been seized by insurgents and little or no policing by corrupt local authorities.

Al Sadr Flees Iraq For Iran Ahead Of Security Plan. ABC World News (2/13, lead story, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Iraiq Shiite militia leader Muqtada al Sadr "has left Iraq and gone to Iran." ABC (Raddatz) added, "He left two or three weeks ago, senior military officials tell ABC, headed straight for Tehran." His departure "coincides with the announced [US troop] surge into Baghdad." The New York Times (2/14, Mazzetti, 1.16M) says Al Sadr fled in order to "avoid being captured or killed during the crackdown. But officials also said that Mr. Sadr, who has family in Iran, had gone to Tehran in the past and that it was unclear why he had chosen to leave Iraq at this time."

USA Today (2/14, 8A, Jackson, 2.27M) notes Al-Sadr "has strong family ties in Iran," and it "was unknown whether he was on a personal visit or on business there rather than seeking a safe haven, as suggested by the Bush officials."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/14, Abdul-Zahra) reports early Wednesday that "officials linked to Muqtada al-Sadr denied Wednesday that the radical Shiite cleric had fled to Iran ahead of a security crackdown in Baghdad."

Iraq To Close Borders With Syria, Iran. The Washington Post (2/14, A12, Ernesto Londono, 690K) reports Iraqi officials Tuesday announced "the temporary closure of checkpoints at the Syrian and Iranian borders, as well as an expanded nighttime curfew in the capital, as part of the new Baghdad security plan." In a televised address, Lt. Gen.

Abboud Gambar, who is in charge of the security plan, "said the border will be closed for 72 hours, but he did not specify when."

Administration Struggles To Defend Iran Claims. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 7, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are serious new questions tonight about the Pentagon's accusation that Iran is supplying deadly explosive device targeting US troops in Iraq. The latest questions are from a surprising source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Those surprising questions about the Pentagon's case against Iran come from America's top military commander, Joint Chief's Chairman Peter Pace." Although the White House today "stuck by its claims," some Pentagon officials "say the military briefers in Baghdad went too far in blaming Iran's government."

The AP (2/14, Jelinek) reports the Bush administration "struggled Tuesday to explain what it knows about alleged Iranian interference in Iraq after the Pentagon's top general appeared to contradict a recently released military dossier on the subject." The claims of Tehran's involvement "had already drawn skeptical responses from some lawmakers and other critics still wary of an administration that based the invasion of Iraq on faulty intelligence." But those doubts "increased Tuesday after Pace said the link between the bomb materials and the government had not been definitively proven." Defense experts "said Pace's comments -- and the way the dossier had been presented to reporters anonymously -- cast doubt on how solid the administration case is against Iran."

The New York Times (2/14, A14, Mazzetti, Gordon, 1.16M) says White House spokesman Tony Snow "tried to paper over the apparent disagreement on Tuesday," by disclosing "that he had called General Pace on the matter and that he and the general were 'on the same page' with regard to Iran's role in the roadside bomb attacks in Iraq."

But the Financial Times (2/14, Sevastopulo, Aglionby) says Gen. Pace's comments "appear at odds with the White House, which on Monday repeated the line that the Iranian government was involved." The Times notes that "while some parts of the Bush administration have been raising the rhetorical pressure on Iran, others appear to be toning down the war of words."

Pentagon Denies Politics Behind Claims. USA Today (2/14, 9A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports the US military said Tuesday that its decision to go public with allegations that Iran is providing militants in Iraq with weapons "was not politically motivated or orchestrated by the White House." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the US command's top spokesman, "said the decision to air the allegations against Iran on Sunday was made by the US military and stemmed from concerns that Iran has been supplying militias with a deadly type of roadside bomb that could pierce thick armor."

Diplomacy Seen As Aim Behind Claims. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Grier, 59K) reports, "The US may be trying to achieve a difficult balance regarding Iran: pushing the Iranians hard enough so they will negotiate over their nuclear program, yet not so hard as to increase tensions in a part of the world that's already aflame. That's the conclusion some experts draw from the recent US attempt to lay out evidence that officials say links Iran to attacks against US troops in Iraq." The White House had said for weeks that it would "present proof that Tehran is meddling in Iraq by providing arms and training to Shiite militias. Yet when the presentation came, it was somewhat low-key. It took place in Baghdad, not Washington. It focused almost entirely on a type of dangerous roadside bomb that Iran is allegedly supplying to its Iraqi allies."

Memo Says Iranian Leaders Backed Talks With US In 2003. The Washington Post (2/14, A14, Kessler, 690K) reports the Swiss ambassador to Iran "informed US officials in 2003 that an Iranian proposal for comprehensive talks with the United States had been reviewed and approved by Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei; then-President Mohammad Khatami; and then-Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi," according to a copy of the cover letter to the Iranian document. Ambassador Tim Guldimann wrote in a letter that was faxed to the State Department o may 4, 2003, "I got the clear impression that there is a strong will of the regime to tackle the problem with the US now and to try it with this initiative." Guldimann "attached a one-page Iranian document labeled 'Roadmap' that listed US and Iranian aims for potential negotiations, putting on the table such issues as an end to Iran's support for anti-Israeli militants, action against terrorist groups on Iranian soil and acceptance of Israel's right to exist." The Post notes that of State Rice "was questioned about the document on Capitol Hill last week," but told congressmen "she did not recall seeing it when she was national security adviser."

Ahmadinejad Seen As Toning Down Anti-Israeli Rhetoric. The AP (2/14) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "toning down verbal attacks on Israel," said in an interview that Tuesday with ABC's "Good Morning America," that Palestinians "should be allowed to determine a resolution to the conflict with the Jewish state." Asked if he stuck by his past calls for Israel to be "wiped off the face of the map," Ahmadinejad "stopped short of addressing whether Iran would recognize Israel but said any decision the Palestinians make should be respected."

Feith Defends 2003 Intelligence Project. In a Washington Post (2/14, 690K) op-ed, former Undersecretary of Defense Feith writes, "Promoters of the 'Bush Lied, People Died' line claim that the recent Pentagon inspector general's report concerning my former office's work on Iraq intelligence supports their cause. ... In his report, [Thomas] Gimble wrote that the Pentagon briefing was not the 'most accurate analysis of intelligence.' This has been taken to suggest it was false or deceptive. But the IG said he meant only that the briefing was at 'variance with the consensus of the Intelligence Community.' Of course it was at variance! It was a critique. ... Gimble's characterization is absurdly circular. Cheered on by the chairmen of the Senate intelligence and armed services committees, he is giving bad advice based on incomplete fact-finding and poor logic." Feith adds, "Intelligence is inherently sketchy and speculative -- and historically often wrong. It is improved when policy officials freely probe and challenge it."

Zawahiri Says Bush Lost Bet On Iraq. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, A12) reports, "Al-Qaeda's deputy leader said President Bush was an alcoholic and a lying gambler who wagered on Iraq and lost, according to a new audiotape released Tuesday by a U.S. group that tracks extremist messages." In the tape, Ayman al Zawahiri says, "Bush suffers from an addictive personality and was an alcoholic. I don't know his present condition...but the one who examines his personality finds that he is addicted to two other faults -- lying and gambling."

New Plan Launched To Bring More Iraqi Refugees To US. The New York Times (2/14, A16, Swarns, Zoepf, 1.16M) reports the Bush administration and the United Nations have developed a plan "that would bring several thousand of them to the United States over the next 10 months," officials familiar with discussions of the plan say. Under the plan, which is expected to be formally unveiled this week, the United Nations "began its first large-scale screening this month of Iraqis who have fled to Syria and Jordan since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. It hopes to register 135,000 to 200,000 of them to determine which Iraqis have fled persecution at home and would be eligible for refugee status." For its part, the US "hopes to resettle at least 5,000 of that group this year, with the first arriving in late spring or summer." On Wednesday, Secretary Rice is expected to meet with António Guterres, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, to discuss the Iraqi refugee crisis. Meanwhile, Guterres and Under Secretary Paula J. Dobriansky "are expected to outline the refugee plan this week at a news conference."

Pakistan Expected To Oust 2.4 Million Afghan Refugees. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Montero, 59K) reports that "as Robert Gates, in his first visit to Pakistan as US secretary of Defense, met with President Musharraf in Islamabad this week to discuss the Taliban's expected spring offensive in Afghanistan;" Pakistan's expected attempt to expel 2.4 million Afghanis will, according to analysts, only shift "the world's largest refugee community across borders would only serve to raise tensions." Pakistan is making an effort to contain the Taliban by sending "2.4 million Afghan refugees, most living in camps…home by 2009" due to fears of "cross-border militancy" displayed by the Taliban forces. "Many disagree, however, saying Pakistan's Afghan refugees, most of whom are Pashtun and share the same tribal ethnicity as the Taliban movement, are only being made a scapegoat."

Iraq Seen As Overshadowing Dire Issues In Afghanistan. The Politico (2/14, Grim) reports that "as the House spent most of its energy debating the resolution condemning President Bush's troop surge plan for Iraq, the House Armed Service Committee's hearing on the war in Afghanistan drew only the weakest of spotlights." At the hearing, "the star witness was Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the outgoing commander of all NATO troops in Afghanistan," although the event drew little public or media interest, confusing many members of the committee, with one blaming snow for the small turn-out. After the hearing, "Gen. Eikenberry, lingering in the empty room, said he wasn't sure why the hearing had gotten so little attention. 'You'll have to ask your media colleagues why they're not here,' he mused.

The Washington Post (2/14, Tyson, A15, 690K) reports, "A senior U.S. military commander urged Pakistan yesterday to crack down on an entrenched network of senior Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders, training camps and recruiting grounds

-- a sanctuary from which fighters have tripled cross-border attacks since September and are preparing an anticipated major spring offensive in southern and eastern Afghanistan. Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the outgoing top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, also warned that an even greater threat than the resurgent Taliban is the possibility that the government of President Hamid Karzai" could "suffer an irreversible loss of legitimacy among the Afghan population" as "the Pentagon is expected to announce soon that it will keep U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan at a minimum of 27,000 into 2008, extending a temporary increase…ordered last month."

Alleged Taliban Commander Promises Biggest Offensive Yet. AFP (2/14) reports, "A purported Taliban commander has said the militia is ready for its 'biggest ever' offensive in Afghanistan this year, while a boosted NATO-led force says it also plans significant operations. ... the year is shaping up to be as violent as 2006 -- the worst in the insurgency." "We have between 8,000 to 10,000 armed men," Mullah Abdul Rahim told AFP in a telephone interview. AFP notes, "His role in the Islamist militia and his claims could not be independently verified." On the other hand, "ISAF has meanwhile swollen to more than 35,000 troops, with the United States extending the tour of duty of about 3,500 soldiers for more than four months, and it is putting in place the first 'rapid reaction unit.'"

WSJournal Optimistic About Outcome Of Spring Clashes. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Expect more terrorism in Kabul, attacks on positions in and around the key Pashtun city of Kandahar, ambushes on vehicles and attacks on European and Canadian forces, which the Taliban consider, with good reason, to be the weak link in the NATO chain. Expect, too, for the Taliban to be decisively defeated. ... The combination of more troops and a keen appreciation of last year's mistakes puts the U.S. and Afghanistan in a better position than a year ago to repulse the Taliban's expected spring offensive."

With US Military Aid, Philippines Winning Battle Against Abu Sayyaf. USA Today (2/14, 10A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports, "Thousands of miles from the bazaars of Iraq and the mountains of Afghanistan, U.S. military forces are quietly helping defeat terrorists in the jungles of the southern Philippines, a forgotten front in the global war on terrorism." Working "behind the scenes with a rejuvenated Philippine military, U.S. special forces have helped kill, capture or rout hundreds of Abu Sayyaf guerrillas who have links to the Islamic terror groups Jemaah Islamiyah and al-Qaeda, Philippine and U.S. military commanders say." The Abu Sayyaf, "responsible for 16 years of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings in the southern Philippines, has been forced to flee into the mountainous terrain here on Jolo island in the remote Sulu Archipelago." But its "numbers are dwindling and its leadership almost wiped out, says Brig. Gen. Ruperto Pabustan, commander of Philippine special forces on Jolo." Backed "by U.S. intelligence, equipment and training, Philippine forces have killed or captured 200 of the 400 Abu Sayyaf fighters on Jolo since they began Operation Ultimatum last August, Pabustan says."

Algerian Bombings Linked To Al Qaeda-Allied Group. The New York Times (2/14, Smith, 1.16M) reports, "Seven bombs exploded almost simultaneously in Algeria yesterday, killing six people and wounding more than a dozen in the worst attack in months by North Africa's most active terrorist group, which says it has allied itself with Al Qaeda." The bombs, "including at least five powerful car or truck bombs, went off before dawn, pulverizing police stations in six towns in mountainous areas east of the capital, Algiers." A group "calling itself the Qaeda Organization in the Islamic Maghreb claimed responsibility for the attacks in a telephone call to the Morocco offices of the Arabic-language satellite broadcaster Al Jazeera. The name was recently adopted by the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has operated in Algeria since 1996."

Four Top Lam Aides Interviewed For Interim US Attorney Post. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/14, Thornton) reports, "With U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's departure imminent, the Justice Department has interviewed four of her top advisers for the position of interim chief while a committee searches for a long-term replacement." The Union-Tribune continues, "Among the short-term candidates interviewed within the last two weeks are Lam's second-in-command, Stephen Clark, her third-in-command, Karen Hewitt, plus Narcotics Chief Tim Coughlin and Appeals Chief Bruce Castetter. … All are career prosecutors hand-picked by Lam who have supported her priorities of prosecuting corruption and white-collar crimes rather than routine immigration cases, which, according to Justice Department officials, led to Lam's ouster." The Union-Tribune adds, "Lam was targeted for dismissal because of 'performance-related' issues after the Justice Department received complaints from members of Congress about her handling of immigration enforcement cases, said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. … Before statements, sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam, a political independent, was asked to step down because of declining prosecutions of gun, smuggling and drug cases. … Though initially staying mum, the Justice Department confirmed under pressure from lawmakers that it recently asked at least seven U.S. attorneys, including Lam, to resign. Officials said the dismissals weren't politically motivated and were generally based on job performance." The Union-Tribune notes, "The interviews of potential temporary replacements for Lam were conducted via video conference calls by Justice Department officials in Washington, D.C. The candidates did not seek the position but were invited to be interviewed. … An announcement is not expected until Lam's final day in office Thursday. An office party is scheduled for that day so colleagues can wish her well. Lam has declined to discuss reasons for her departure or her future plans."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Johnson & Johnson Tries To Minimize Damage From Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (2/14, Bowe, Davoudi, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Carved in stone in the lobby of its US headquarters is Johnson & Johnson's credo, displaying its guiding principles and symbol for what the healthcare conglomerate regards as its most preciously preserved commodity - its reputation. … But J&J also prizes is decentralised structure - with managers nimbly running separate businesses ranging from pharmaceuticals to medical devices to consumer brands such as its iconic Band-Aid and baby shampoo. These two ideals at J&J have clashed, and now the group is trying to minimise the damage to its reputation following revelations of improper payments overseas that could violate US anti-bribery laws." The Times continues, "Late on Monday, J&J said it had notified the US legal authorities and securities regulators that it had found 'improper payments in the connection of medical devices in two small-market countries.' … J&J was not under investigation for these payments and voluntarily notified the US Department of Justice and Securities and Exchange Commission. It said the payments could violate the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), and that a senior executive had stepped down as a result. J&J declined to name the countries or the type of payments involved. … Nevertheless, J&J said Michael Dormer, 55, would retire as worldwide chairman of three of its medical device businesses - Ethicon Endosurgery, Depuy orthopaedic implants and Ortho diagnostics unit." The Times notes, "The J&J case underscores that the medical device industry is particularly vulnerable to charges under the US FCPA, an anti-bribery statute that makes it illegal to make payments or offer anything of value to a foreign government official in order to obtain business. … Indictments of companies can carry a heavy price in the US, including a potential ban on doing business with the government, a huge buyer of health products and services. Around the world, companies like J&J sell products to hospitals and other healthcare facilities that are often government-owned, increasing the risk that payments to healthcare officials can be considered bribes to government officials. Bribes between parties in the private sector are not covered under the FCPA. … Experts say the Justice Department has markedly stepped up its enforcement of FCPA violations, forcing companies to be more vigilant about any types of payments it makes to individuals or entities that may be deemed to be government controlled."

Nasdaq Says Cyberonics Is In Compliance With Filing Rules. The AP (2/14) reports, "Cyberonics Inc. said Tuesday it received a letter from the Nasdaq Stock Market confirming that the medical device maker is in compliance with all the exchange's rules, and its stock will continue to be listed." The AP continues, "The company also said that with last week's filing of its quarterly report for the period ended Oct. 27, it has now filed all previously delinquent reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission." The AP adds, "Cyberonics had received letters from the Nasdaq warning that the company was subject to delisting for failing to meet its filing requirements. … Cyberonics in November said it would restate financial results from 2000 through January 2006 to correct improper stock options accounting, resulting in $10 million in non-cash expenses. The company's CEO and chief financial officer resigned later that month." The AP notes, "Cyberonics is one of 106 companies currently under SEC or Justice Department scrutiny over its stock-option grants, and at least 94 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews into their stock options practices, according to an AP review."

Aflac To Allow Shareholder Vote On Executive Pay. USA Today (2/14, 1A, Jones) reports, "Responding to the uproar against soaring executive compensation, Aflac today will announce a move to become the first major U.S. company to let shareholders vote on executive pay packages." USA continues, "On Tuesday, Aflac's board approved allowing shareholders to vote on the pay of the insurer's top five executives. Although the vote will be non-binding, it would be hard for Aflac to ignore the wishes of a majority of shareholders, says analyst Dawn Wolfe at Boston Common Asset Management. … Other companies are under similar pressure. Shareholder proposals to approve executive pay are on ballots this year at about 50 companies, many introduced by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) union, which is a powerful institutional investor." USA adds, "Aflac, probably best known for the ubiquitous duck in its TV ads, had received a shareholder proposal from Boston Common, but the money management firm withdrew it when Aflac promised to make the move voluntarily. Aflac plans to announce today that shareholders will begin voting in 2009, the first time there will be three years of complete pay data in proxy tables under new Securities and Exchange Commission disclosure rules. .. Aflac CEO Dan Amos said in an interview that a key concern is the chance of an 'emotional vote' if Aflac's stock is depressed going into the annual shareholders meeting. … Similar shareholder proposals at other major companies have never passed, says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy at AFSCME. However, he says proposals at companies such as Sun Microsystems were supported by 40% or more of shareholders."

Congress Probes Sallie Mae Exec's Stock Sale. The Washington Post (2/14, D1, Paley, 690K) reports congressional investigators are "looking into Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord's sale of $18.3 million worth of company stock this month, just days before President Bush proposed a huge cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to nosedive." The chairmen of the House Financial Services and Education committees "sent letters yesterday to the White House counsel, the education secretary and Sallie Mae, asking for detailed information on all contact between the Reston-based student lending giant and the Bush administration over the past three months." Rep. George Miller said, "Given the timing of the Sallie Mae stock sale and the release of the President's budget, the committee is seeking more information as a matter of routine oversight."

Staggered Corporate Boards Defended. In an op-ed for he New York Times (2/14), Guhan Subramanian, a professor of business and law at Harvard, writes, "Slowly but surely, corporate America is giving up the staggered board." Subramanian continues, "Some businesses are responding to corporate governance rating agencies, which penalize companies that do not elect all of the directors each year. Some are responding to shareholder resolutions or to behind-the-scenes pressure from large shareholders. Georgeson Shareholder Services reports there were more than 90 resolutions among S.&P. 1500 companies in 2006 to abolish staggered boards, half proposed by the companies and half by shareholders. More are expected in the 2007 proxy season, and some corporate governance experts are urging companies not to fight the issue. … This would be a mistake. What shareholders object to is not staggered boards themselves, but how staggered boards block takeovers." Subramanian adds, "Most corporations have adopted or can easily adopt a 'poison pill,' a takeover defense that forbids a hostile bidder from directly purchasing a controlling interest in a target company. If the target has a staggered board, a bidder must win two proxy contests, conducted more than a year apart, to gain control of the board and jettison the poison pill. No bidder in the modern era of takeovers has had the patience and persistence to do this, so the staggered board combined with the pill presents a potent roadblock to shareholders who want to accept a hostile offer. … But there is a way to give shareholders exactly what they want without eliminating the staggered board: shift the staggered board from the charter to the bylaws. That would allow a hostile bidder to dismantle the staggered board through a bylaw amendment and put its offer to shareholders in a single proxy contest. For the 99.5 percent of United States public companies that are not subject to a hostile takeover bid in a given year, directors would continue to be elected to staggered, three-year terms. … Shareholders rightly decided that they did not like the anti-takeover effect of staggered boards, but their campaign unnecessarily casts the baby out with the bathwater. A bylaws-based staggered board meets the interests of all sides."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former CIA Official, Contractor Indicted In Cunningham Bribery Probe. ABC World News (2/13, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A congressional bribery scandal expanded today with the indictment of a former top CIA official. Kyle Foggo – who was the CIA's number three official until last May – was charged with fraud, conspiracy, and money laundering. The charges stem from the investigation that sent former Congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison. Foggo and Cunningham were linked to a defense contractor who was also indicted today." CNN's The Situation Room (2/13, Blitzer) noted Foggo is "facing some very, very serious charges." CNN (2/13, Roberts) added, "The indictment alleges that Foggo used his senior position at the CIA to steer contracts to Wilkes. The deal shielded and the money laundered through shell companies and strawmen. In exchange, prosecutors say, Foggo benefited richly. … The FBI and the CIA's Office of Inspector General took the extraordinary step of searching both Foggo's office at CIA headquarters and his home in Vienna, Virginia. Agents seized everything from bank records to Cuban cigars."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Hoffman) adds, "Foggo and Wilkes could each be punished by up to 20 years in prison if convicted. 'High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment,' said U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. The charges are a blow to the CIA, whose director, Michael Hayden, wrote to employees Tuesday that the agency continues to cooperate with the investigation." The AP notes Foggo "resigned in May under investigation by the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service, the Pentagon's Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the CIA's inspector general and the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego." USA Today (2/14, 4A, Kelley, 2.27M) adds, "Wilkes' lawyer, Mark Geragos, said all the charges were 'demonstrably false' but refused to give specifics. Geragos said Wilkes plans to plead not guilty in a court appearance today."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/14, Thornton, Baker, 324K) reports Lam "announced the indictments at an afternoon press conference, calling the charges against the two men 'breathtaking in scope.' … Wilkes and Foggo are expected to surrender at an arraignment in federal court Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Perry, 850K) notes, "Wilkes, according to the indictment, provided Cunningham with prostitutes, vacations, corporate jet travel, limousine service, cash, meals, furniture and equipment for his boat. The value of the alleged bribes was put at $700,000. The contractor reportedly provided Foggo, a childhood friend, with meals, gifts, private jet flights, a helicopter ride and a weeklong stay at a Scottish castle valued at $44,000. Wilkes also paid for Foggo to join him on Hawaiian vacations, the indictment said."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/14, Smith, 690K) reports, "While the probe has threatened to sweep in other members of Congress, some uncertainty surrounds it. A key U.S. attorney involved in it -- Carol C. Lam in San Diego -- has been fired by the administration for unspecified 'performance-related' deficiencies along with a handful of other federal prosecutors. Lam oversaw the Foggo investigation and is to leave Thursday. The head of the local FBI field office praised Lam's performance and said her firing appeared to be 'political,' an accusation that the Justice Department has denied." The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A12, Paltrow, 2.04M) also notes the controversy surrounding Lam's dismissal and adds, "The indictment and its details would seem to heighten the risk to other members of Congress still under investigation; Mr. Wilkes also had dealings with several of them."

Roll Call (2/14, Van Dongen) similarly reports, "Lam secured the indictments two days before she is slated to leave office after being fired by the Bush administration in December along with six other U.S. attorneys, causing Democrats to charge their firings were improper and political. Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty is slated to brief Judiciary Committee Senators today in a closed-door session on the prosecutors' personnel records." Roll Call notes, "The 42-page indictment of Wilkes is wide-ranging and charges a variety of criminal activities. It also names John Michael Thomas, the president and part owner of New York-based mortgage company Coastal Capital Corp., with helping Cunningham obtain a fraudulent mortgage."

The Hill (2/14, Schor) reports, "Justice Department officials have praised the Cunningham probe as the linchpin of their growing pursuit of public corruption cases, yet prosecutor Lam is nonetheless slated to step down tomorrow after the Bush administration cited unspecified 'performance' issues in requesting her resignation late last year. … House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has called for Lam to continue her cases against Wilkes, Foggo and others reportedly ensnared in the probe, including former

House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), via a special prosecutor appointment." The Washington Times (2/14, Seper, 88K) and PBS' NewsHour (2/13, Lehrer) also reported on the indictments, but without noting the Lam controversy.

CNN.com (2/14, Arena, Frieden) reports, "Foggo faces an 11-count indictment charging him with conspiracy, wire fraud, depriving taxpayers of honest services, conflict of interest and money laundering. He 'affirmatively hid' the gifts from his superiors at the CIA before his resignation, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam told reporters. … 'These two indictments describe patterns of self-dealing and corruption that spanned years and reached deep into our country's system of procurement for the defense industry,' Lam said." CNN adds, "Prosecutors will also try to reclaim $12 million in profits they say Wilkes received as a result of the schemes, Lam said. … A third man, New York mortgage banker John Michael, was charged with obstruction of justice. Prosecutors said he lied to a grand jury about Wilkes' role in paying off a half-million-dollar second mortgage on Cunningham's home." AFP (2/14) also reports on the indictments.

Defense To Rest Without Calling Libby, Cheney. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 6, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is word tonight from the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, Scooter Libby, that neither Vice President Cheney nor Libby himself will testify. … Libby's lawyers will rest their case this week with closing arguments next week." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Apuzzo) notes that the decision not to call Libby or Cheney "spares the defense team two dangerous bouts with cross-examination. But it also forces Libby to look elsewhere for someone to make the memory defense for him. John Hannah, who served as Libby's deputy and replaced him as Cheney's national security adviser, helped in that effort Tuesday. He described Libby as someone responsible for the nation's most sensitive intelligence but whose memory was notoriously spotty. Libby also wants three CIA briefers to testify Wednesday about the classified national security briefings he received each morning in mid-2003."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/14, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "The defense's central theory is that Libby suffered from a notoriously bad memory and misspoke to investigators about his role in the Bush administration's disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame. The decision to foreshorten the case means that jurors will hear little testimony and see scant evidence to back that contention. … The decision also means that the defense will not call any witnesses to explicitly buttress a dramatic assertion by lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. in his opening statement to the jury: that Libby was scapegoated by his White House colleagues when the leak investigation began." The Post notes Hannah "highlighted points that Cheney and Libby might have offered if they had testified. Hannah said that Libby essentially had two full-time jobs and, under questioning by defense attorney John Cline, gave the jury a tour of complex and sensitive foreign-policy issues in which Libby was immersed from May 2003 to March 2004."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Schmitt, 850K) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald "got Hannah to admit that Libby was not too busy in the summer of 2003 to take time out to track the doings of Wilson. The defense decision not to call Libby appeared to harden feelings a bit with the prosecution team. Before the trial, the government had given Libby and his lawyers extensive access to summaries of classified information that Libby had seen while working for Cheney," and "Fitzgerald said the information was given with the understanding that it would be used exclusively by Libby while he testified to show the size and sensitive nature of his workload. Tuesday, after defense lawyers said that Libby would not testify but that they planned to introduce some of that information during the testimony of three CIA employees today, Fitzgerald objected. … Walton deferred a ruling."

The New York Times (2/14, Lewis, Shane, 1.16M) notes, "Mr. Cheney's testimony, which was much anticipated, would have set a precedent as the first appearance of a sitting vice president as a witness at a criminal trial. It was also expected to bolster a major part of Mr. Libby's defense: that he was so consumed by the crush of high-stakes issues like global terrorism and Iraq that he might not have remembered all the details of his conversations. But the trial threw up numerous instances in which Mr. Cheney took a personal role in managing the White House response to accusations from Joseph C. Wilson…that the evidence for going to war had been knowingly overstated. Mr. Cheney could have been exposed during cross-examination to uncomfortable questions about his close involvement in trying to undermine Mr. Wilson's criticisms."

Fitzgerald's handling of the CIA leak investigation Tuesday, saying the prosecutor had to have known from the start that it was not a crime to disclose Valerie Plame's identity as an agent." The AP continues, "A fund-raiser for the defense of I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Thompson depicted Fitzgerald as out of control, telling ABC News there was 'no brake and no check and no balance' on the prosecutor." The AP continues, "Thompson's objections are the same ones Democratic politicians made in the 1990s about independent counsel Kenneth Starr, who spent six years investigating President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. … In the same fashion, Republicans complained about the six-year investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh into the Iran-Contra scandal of the Reagan years and the first Bush administration. … Congress allowed the independent counsel statute to expire in 1998. … 'When you put too much power in the hands of unelected, unaccountable people who have every incentive to focus massive resources onto one particular person — who gets the plaudits in the media for doing so — it's a bad thing,' Thompson told ABC. … Unlike Starr, who was appointed by a panel of federal appeals court judges, Fitzgerald's Justice Department superiors appointed him to look into the CIA leak scandal. He has continued his duties as U.S. attorney in Chicago while investigating the Valerie Plame affair." The AP notes, "Thompson, who plays a prosecuting attorney in NBC's 'Law & Order,' pointed out that no one has been charged with leaking Plame's identity, saying no law had been broken. 'The Justice Department knew that early on. The CIA should have known that early on,' Thompson said. 'Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had to have known that at the very beginning.'"

Judge To Hear NJ Legislature's Challenge To US Subpoenas. The Newark Star-Ledger (2/14, Margolin, Sherman) reports, "Federal prosecutors and attorneys for the state Legislature are due to square off today in an increasingly political fight over the confidentiality of legislative records being sought in a criminal corruption probe. The closed-door hearing in U.S. District Court in Trenton comes after Gov. Jon Corzine reiterated his call yesterday for the release of documents being sought by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in an expanding investigation into lawmakers' possible conflicts of interest. 'I think we ought to comply with the law and respond to the subpoena,' Corzine said. 'We ought to be taking those steps that give the public the assurance that we're getting our house in order with regard to ethics.' … Separately, attorneys for state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden), whose no-show job with the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey initially sparked the interest of the U.S. attorney, moved to intervene in the court hearing." The Star-Ledger notes, "It is clear, though, that Christie is not confining his questions to Bryant. Several legislative officers and budget officials have been interviewed by the FBI in recent weeks regarding the awarding of millions of dollars in special discretionary funds."

US Considering Additional Charges Against Alleged Chicago Mobster. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Robinson) reports, "Reputed mob boss Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo and another man could face new charges for going on the lam after a major indictment against them was unsealed, a federal prosecutor said Tuesday. 'We may seek to add charges to the indictment based on their fugitive status,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Mitchell A. Mars told federal Judge James B. Zagel at a hearing in a racketeering case known as Operation Family Secrets." The AP notes, "Lombardo, 77, was captured by FBI agents in a suburban Elmwood Park alley in January 2006 after nine months on the run. … Zagel told attorneys Tuesday that he likely would order a hearing to determine exactly what jurors might hear from prospective government witness James Wagner, a former FBI mob investigator who now is president of the Chicago Crime Commission."

Massachusetts Lawyer Surrenders To Face Art Theft Charges. The Boston Globe (2/14, Kurkjian, Murphy, 413K) reports, "A retired Watertown lawyer surrendered to federal authorities yesterday after returning from France to face charges he attempted to sell millions of dollars worth of paintings, including a major work by Cezanne, that were stolen from a home in the Berkshires in 1978. Robert M. Mardirosian , 72, who gave up a successful criminal law practice to become a sculptor and painter more than a decade ago, appeared in federal court 90 minutes after being arrested at Logan International Airport by arrangement with the US attorney's office. He was charged with taking possession of the seven paintings months after they were allegedly stolen by one of his clients. … He was released on $500,000 bail by US Magistrate Marianne B. Bowler."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Alderman) notes, "In 1988, Mardirosian moved the paintings to Monaco, thinking he might have a legal claim to ownership or a 10 percent 'finder's fee,' according to a May 2006 affidavit from FBI Special Agent Geoffrey Kelly, also unsealed Tuesday. Lloyd's of London was contacted in 1999 by an unknown person about insuring the paintings before sale, the affidavit says, and discovered they were listed with the database Art Loss Register as having been stolen. It says Julian Radcliffe, chairman of Art Loss Register, determined that the paintings were being sold by a Panamanian corporation called Erie International Trading Company, later found to be registered to Mardirosian."

Federal Inmate Sentenced To Death For Murdering Cellmate. The AP (2/14) reports from Roanoke, Va., "A federal inmate who killed his cell mate by strangling him with a bath towel has been sentenced to death, officials said Tuesday." Carlos Caro "was a prisoner at the federal penitentiary in Lee County…when he killed Robert Sandoval, U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee's office said in a statement. Caro later told an FBI agent that Sandoval had cursed Caro and threatened to eat his breakfast, the statement said."

Jury Sentences Pair To Death In Russian Immigrant Kidnap-Murders. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Risling) reports, "A jury imposed the death penalty Tuesday on the ringleaders of a kidnapping-for-ransom scheme targeting rich Russian immigrants whose bodies were found in a Northern California reservoir. Jurors deliberated less than a day before reaching their vote on sentences for Iouri Mikhel, 41, and Jurijus Kadamovas, 40. … Said U.S. Attorney Susan DeWitt: 'These were good people who didn't deserve the fate that befell them. We felt a tremendous responsibility to the victims' families.' Defense attorney Dale Rubin called the jury's decision 'a revenge verdict.'" The AP notes, "Five victims were killed regardless of whether the ransoms were paid, prosecutors said."

Study Predicts Prison Population Increases. USA Today (2/14, 4A, Johnson) reports, "The number of inmates in U.S. prisons likely will rise nearly 13% during the next five years, costing states up to $27.5 billion in new operating and construction expenses, according to a new analysis by the Pew Charitable Trusts." USA continues, "The Pew report, to be released today, projects the nation's prison population will be about 1.72 million by 2011, up from an estimated 1.53 million at the end of last year. Such an increase would roughly equal the current population of the federal prison system." USA adds, "Pew analysts said the growth is being fueled by mandatory minimum sentences that have stretched prison terms for many criminals, declines in inmates granted parole and other policies that states have passed in recent years to crack down on crime. … In some states, the study said, high rates of repeat offenders also have been a factor in boosting prison populations." USA notes, "Montana, Arizona, Alaska, Idaho and Vermont could see their prison systems grow by one-third or more if there are no changes to the states' sentencing and release policies, the study said. … Pew, a Philadelphia-based philanthropic organization that funds research into a variety of issues, based its findings on population forecasts gathered from the federal Bureau of Prisons and 42 states."

DC Dental Clinic Owner Sentenced For Medical Billing Fraud. The Washington Business Journal (2/13, Adler) reported, "The owner of a D.C. dental clinic who recently pled guilty to health care fraud has been sentenced to six months community confinement, six months of home detention and was ordered to pay restitution of $164,000 and a fine of $40,000 for submitting false claims for payment to private insurers, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for D.C." In August, Afsaneh Tehrani "was charged with health-care fraud and making false statements. At that time, she denied the charges, calling them 'ridiculous.' The charges resulted from an investigation by the U.S. Attorney for the District, the FBI's Washington field office, the D.C. Department of Health and the D.C. Department of Insurance, Securities and Banking."

Former iGate Stockholder Sues Jefferson Over Alleged Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Barrouquere) reports, "A former stockholder in a technology company sued a beleaguered congressman and a former business associate Tuesday, claiming they bilked stockholders by using business funds to pay bribes. The lawsuit alleges that Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., his wife and Vernon Jackson, former chief executive of the telecommunications firm iGate, schemed to funnel money to Jefferson, his family and foreign officials. The allegations mirror those in an ongoing federal investigation of Jefferson and his business dealings. Jefferson has not been charged, but the FBI has said in court records that agents found $90,000 in a freezer in his New Orleans home." The AP notes, "iGate stockholder Daniel C. Cadle filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Louisville."

Roll Call (2/14, Van Dongen) reports, "The suit charges Jefferson with soliciting and accepting nearly $400,000 in bribes from Jackson to promote iGate's services in the U.S. and abroad. It further alleges that Jackson transferred 30,775,000 shares of iGate stock to Jefferson from 2001 to 2005." Roll Call also notes Jefferson "has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nonetheless, questions swirl about why the FBI found $90,000 in the freezer of the Democrat's New Orleans home."

Connecticut Man Sentenced To Five Years For Child Porn Distribution. The AP (2/14) reports, "A man who traded images of child pornography and sexual abuse on the Internet was sentenced Tuesday to five years in prison after pleading for mercy, saying his effeminate appearance would make him vulnerable to abuse behind bars. David Cuozzo, 42, of New Haven had amassed a collection of 1,780 files of child pornography involving at least 30 children, including images that portrayed sadistic or masochistic conduct or other depictions of violence and the rape of young children, authorities said. 'This defendant used the Internet to trade some of the most disturbing images of infant and toddler child pornography and sexual abuse that law enforcement has seen,' said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor." The AP notes, "O'Connor said the prosecution was part of the U.S. Department of Justice Project Safe Childhood Initiative, designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse."

Louisiana Man Acquitted After 10 Years in Prison For Murder He Did Not Commit. USA Today (2/14, 4A, Parker) reports, "James Thomas spent almost 10 years in jail in Louisiana, waiting to be tried for a murder he said he didn't commit. … When the case finally was tried, it took jurors 80 minutes to agree with him. After a five-day trial, they acquitted Thomas in the 1996 shooting death of a Baton Rouge man. Thomas, 36, almost fainted in the packed courtroom as the verdict was read out. … 'I was shocked. I praised the Lord,' Thomas said Tuesday in his first interview since his acquittal Friday. 'As long as I live, I'll never forget this. That's 10 years they can never replace.'" USA continues, "Thomas' case, profiled in a USA TODAY story in 2005, symbolized problems in the nation's public defender system that result in tens of thousands of poor people in the USA going to jail every year without talking to a lawyer. An American Bar Association study concluded two years ago that the system was 'mired in crisis,' crippled by funding inadequacies that led to excessive caseloads and inexperienced lawyers being assigned to cases beyond their expertise." USA adds, "Since the report, public defender programs have been improved in several states, says Bill Whitehurst, an Austin lawyer who headed the ABA's panel on indigent defense. But 'there's no question it's still mired in crisis.'"

Better Business Bureau Targeted In E-Mail Scam. The Washington Post (2/14, D3, Shin) reports, "The Better Business Bureau network was the target of a 'spoofing' scam yesterday in which thousands of businesses in the United States and Canada received e-mails encouraging them to download what is thought to be a computer virus." The Post continues, "The e-mails, using the name of the 95-year-old network of nonprofit groups that looks into consumer complaints, told businesses that they were the subject of a complaint and included a link to view related documents. Clicking on the link, however, accessed the address book of an infected computer and distributed the counterfeit e-mail to more recipients, said Steve Cox, spokesman for the Council of Better Business Bureaus. … The council is the umbrella group for the system's 129 local branches, which are funded by member businesses. … BBB members and nonmembers received the e-mail." The Post adds, "Confused business owners began calling the council's offices in Arlington at 6 a.m. yesterday, Cox said. By mid-morning, the organization had confirmed the attack was systemwide. … The counterfeit e-mails were traced to an advertising firm in Kennesaw, Ga., that had had its computer system hacked into Monday night, Cox said. The agency had no prior affiliation with the BBB."

States Mull Laws Allowing Homeowners To Shoot Burglars. The AP (2/14, Wetzel) reports from Bismarck, ND, "A proposed law that would let people shoot a burglar or carjacker without fear of facing arrest or a lawsuit is moving forward in one state, and the National Rifle Association is promoting it in others. … 'This bill is simply a citizen's version of homeland security,' said North Dakota state Representative Ron Carlisle." The AP continues, "The proposal would erase language that says retreat is better than deadly force, and it says a person is presumed to be justified if he or she shoots a burglar or carjacker in his or her home, workplace or vehicle. … Police and county prosecutors object to the proposal, saying that trying to disprove a shooter's self-defense argument would be more difficult. The law protects a shooter from arrest unless police have probable cause to believe the shooting was not justified." The AP notes, "Ashley Varner, an NRA spokeswoman, said 15 states, including South Dakota, have versions of the law. This year, it has been offered in legislatures in five other states."

Bipartisan Measure Would Strengthen Federal Worker Whistleblower Protections. The Washington Post's (2/14, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Yesterday, advocates for whistle-blowers urged Congress to strengthen protections for federal employees who suffer reprisal in the workplace. The advocates were greeted with bipartisan support at a hearing held by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee." The Post adds that committee chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), "said the committee's bill would for the first time extend whistle-blower rights to those who work at the FBI and in intelligence agencies, and to people employed by federal contractors." While ranking member Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), "said the bill would clarify congressional intent as to what type of whistle-blowing is protected. He said 'the most significant reform' in the bill would guarantee federal employees a right to a jury trial in federal district court if the Merit Systems Protection Board, a federal agency that hears complaints from whistle-blowers, did not take action on a whistle-blower's claim in 180 days."

Judge Releases Prince George's K-9 Unit From DOJ Oversight. The Washington Post (2/14, B1, Castaneda) reports, "The Prince George's County police canine unit, which in recent years operated under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, has improved to the point that the oversight is no longer necessary, a federal judge in Maryland has ruled." The Post continues, U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus on Monday granted a motion filed jointly by the Justice Department, the county and the police department to end the federal oversight that began in 2004, Prince George's officials said. … The judge's order means the department has succeeded in reforming the canine unit by dramatically reducing the number of bites inflicted by police dogs, beefing up supervision of canine teams, instituting reviews of biting incidents and improving documentation of such encounters, county officials said. … The oversight will formally end March 11." The Post notes, "A separate agreement between county officials and the Justice Department, which was negotiated to end a Justice investigation into allegations of excessive force by county police, is still operative. The department is in substantial compliance with the terms of that agreement, which calls for broad reforms regarding use of force, training and other issues, said Sharon Taylor, a spokeswoman for the police department. … On a practical level, the end of the consent decree means police officials will no longer undergo periodic Justice Department reviews and will no longer be required to file detailed reports to Justice officials. … However, the canine unit reforms will continue, Taylor said."

Georgia County Declines To Join Push For Probe Of 1946 Death Of Black Veteran. The AP (2/14, Minor) reports from Butler, GA, "A rural county's leaders declined to take action Tuesday on a request from two civil rights groups to support a federal probe into the unsolved 1946 killing of a black World War II veteran." The AP continues, "The groups and surviving relatives of Maceo Snipes, the first registered black voter in Taylor County, wanted the county commission's support before they mailed their request to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … But the relatives and activists stormed out to protest the line of questioning of an official who said local residents resent outsiders telling them what to do, and the commission did not act. … 'I'm disappointed at the outcome. We didn't come to fight,' said a cousin, Felix Snipes, 66, of Atlanta." The AP adds, "Commission member Patty Carson-James later said the state NAACP and the Prison & Jail Project did not need the commission's support for the probe." The AP notes, "Maceo Snipes, who served most of his two-year Army hitch in the Pacific, was shot in the back by four white men in 1946 - a day after the 37-year-old voted for the first time, relatives say. He collapsed in the doorway of his farmhouse about 90 miles south of Atlanta and died two days later. … While his death certificate says he died of 'gunshot wound by homicide,' there is no evidence of a criminal probe into the killing, and no one was arrested."

WRBL-TV, Columbus, GA (2/13, 10:59 p.m.) broadcasted, "Members of the NAACP are asking that another grand jury be convened to look into the Kenneth Walker case." President of the Georgia State Conference, Edward Dubose, wants District Attorney Gray Conger and US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "to conduct an investigation into whether criminal misconduct took place the night Kenneth Walker was killed three years ago."

Federal Appeals Court Hears Arguments Over Christian Prison Program. The New York Times (2/14, Henriques, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers for Prison Fellowship Ministries and its affiliate, the Inner8Change Freedom Initiative, appeared before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in St. Louis yesterday to defend the constitutionality of an evangelical Christian rehabilitation program they operate in a state prison in Iowa. A federal judge ruled last June that the program, built around Bible study and prayer, violated the First Amendment's ban on government-sponsored religious indoctrination. Although inmates volunteered for the program, the judge, Robert W. Pratt of Federal District Court, found that they had been induced to join it to get safer housing and more accessible treatment options. … The prison program's lawyers emphasized the voluntary nature of the program, and the State of Iowa, a co-defendant, argued that it got valuable secular services for its money. The program is continuing during the appeal, lawyers for the state said."

Four Car Rental Brands In Merger Discussions. The New York Times (2/14, Sorkin) reports, "A deal to combine four of the nation's largest car rental brands — National, Alamo, Thrifty and Dollar — is being discussed as the industry continues to consolidate." The Times continues, Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, a unit of DaimlerChrysler, is in early talks to merge with Vanguard Car Rental, of Tulsa, Okla., which owns National and Alamo, in a deal valued at more than $3 billion, according to people involved in the discussions. … The negotiations, which have been taking place on and off for several months, are at a particularly delicate stage, these people said, and may still collapse." The Times adds, "If completed, a deal would create the third-largest rental car company in the United States behind leaders Enterprise Rent-a-Car and Hertz Global Holdings, but outpacing Avis Budget Group in terms of revenue. … A deal could push rental car rates higher. Prices have already risen 10 percent to 20 percent in the last year as the Detroit automakers have tried to move away from providing discounted fleet vehicles to rental car companies and focus on higher-margin retail customers. … And a deal would face antitrust scrutiny from regulators." The Times notes, "A merger would be the latest in a flurry of deals in the car rental business. Hertz was bought from Ford Motor in December 2005 by a consortium of private equity firms. In November, Hertz went public at $15 a share. (It closed yesterday at $20.36.) Avis Budget Group was recently spun off in the breakup of the Cendant Corporation."

Judge Delays Caremark Shareholder Vote On CVS Bid. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, B2, Berman, Armstrong) reports, "A Delaware judge waded into the thick of the two-way takeover struggle for Caremark Rx Inc., postponing a shareholder vote on CVS Corp.'s bid, while nudging Caremark to begin negotiations with rival Express Scripts Inc. … The rare step to enjoin -- or delay -- the vote gave a much-needed boost to Express, whose $27.3 billion bid for Caremark has been repeatedly rebuffed by Caremark's board." The Journal continues, "Coincidentally or not, Delaware Chancellor William B. Chandler III delayed the vote until at least March 9 from Feb. 20. The March date is the day after Express is supposed to receive government notice about the length of an antitrust review, a factor that has long loomed over the merger saga." The Journal adds, "Mr. Chandler questioned Caremark's insistence that it can't speak to Express because such a deal would likely run afoul of antitrust laws. He noted that Caremark appeared to have no such concerns when it reviewed potential transactions with Express in 2001, 2003 and 2005. The judge chided Caremark for disclosing those past discussions on Monday -- just eight days before the scheduled shareholder vote. … A shareholder might want more time to weigh his vote, Mr. Chandler wrote, 'in the face of Caremark's present protestations that antitrust difficulties loom so large as to prevent the board of directors from even discussing' the Express offer. … Antitrust worries are… a big part of any Express-Caremark combination, which would unite the country's second- and third-largest managers of pharmacy benefits. It is still quite possible that federal authorities could seek a 'second request' for information that would be a big blow to Express's ambitions."

The AP (2/14, French) reports, "The CVS offer has already won antitrust approval. But the offer from Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., has yet to receive antitrust clearance. Express Scripts is the third-largest pharmacy benefits manager and Caremark is No. 2." The AP adds, "Investment advisory firms Glass, Lewis & Co., CtW Investment Group and Institutional Shareholder Services have said that Caremark's board has not succeeded in getting the best deal for its shareholders and urged before the latest dividend increase that Caremark shareholders reject the CVS bid. … Express Scripts said in news release that Caremark shareholders should vote against the proposed merger of CVS and Caremark to 'send a message to the (Caremark) board that it is time to level the playing field.'"

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/14, Feldstein) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. on Tuesday got more time to charm Caremark Rx shareholders when a judge delayed a vote on whether the company should merge with CVS Corp. … The delay also gives Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, a chance to win regulatory approval for its bid before the shareholders' vote. … Express Scripts should learn by March 8 whether the Federal Trade Commission would approve a Caremark—Express Scripts deal or whether regulators require a lengthy investigation to decide the matter. Express Scripts' lack of FTC approval has hurt its ability to gain the support of Caremark's shareholders."

EU Raids Siemens, ABB Offices In Cartel Probe. The Financial Times (2/14, Buck, Milne) reports, "The antitrust problems that have engulfed Siemens and several of its engineering rivals deepened yesterday when the European Commission raided the offices of several manufacturers in Germany, France and Austria in connection with a cartel probe. … The Commission refused to identify the companies targeted in the raids but Siemens and ABB confirmed that their offices had been searched." The Times continues, "Brussels said the groups were suspected of forming a price-fixing cartel in the market for transformers, key components in the power grid in controlling the voltage. Siemens said in a statement that the Brussels antitrust watchdog was investigating five companies, and added: 'The EU Commission is investigating collusion in the area of power transformers in Germany, Austria and the Netherlands between 1999 and 2003.' … The Commission refused to confirm the precise extent of its probe." The Times adds, "The raids are deeply troubling for the groups involved, coming weeks after Siemens, ABB, Alstom and other engineering companies were found guilty of operating another cartel in the market for electricity transmission systems. The groups were together fined a record €751m ($978m), with Siemens alone accounting for €397m of the total. … Companies that are found guilty of operating a cartel face fines of up to 10 per cent of their global annual turnover. The Commission is particularly tough on repeat offenders and, under new rules introduced last year, Siemens and its peers could find their fines being double the normal level should they be found guilty in any new case resulting from this month's raids."

Aluminum Industry Seen Ripe For Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C3, Barta, Glader) reports, "Aluminum companies may be next in line for consolidation as mining conglomerates scour for takeover targets." The Journal continues, "Speculation is building that BHP Billiton Ltd., Rio Tinto PLC or another mining titan could bid to buy one of the world's aluminum heavyweights, particularly Pittsburgh's Alcoa Inc. or Alcan Inc. of Montreal. … Doing so would enable BHP or Rio Tinto to consolidate its position in the growing aluminum market, while preventing competitors from snatching up the few remaining blue-chip players at a time of accelerating consolidation in the natural-resources sector." The Journal adds, "The price of aluminum, which is used to make everything from soda cans to airplane parts, has lagged behind some other metals in the recent commodity boom. In part, that is because China -- a driver of demand -- produces significant quantities of its own, diminishing the need for imports. Still, analysts believe global demand will continue to rise. … Rumors of a large aluminum deal have floated for more than a year, heating up again in recent days, after the Times of London reported that BHP and Rio Tinto had both 'drawn up plans' for a $40 billion takeover of Alcoa. Rio Tinto and BHP declined to comment on the speculation, and Alcoa officials have played down the report. 'We view this as rumors and rumors only,' said Kevin Lowery, a spokesman for Alcoa." The Journal notes, "There are good reasons why a big aluminum deal might be attractive. Mining companies have struggled in recent years to find and develop new sources of raw-material supplies, and many of them believe it is safer to pick up assets through acquisitions than attempting higher-risk exploration projects. … Also, mining companies are awash in cash on profits earned since the commodity boom took off four years ago. Shareholders are clamoring for the companies to find new ways of spending that money to ensure they have strong growth prospects in the next decade."

Belgian Court Rules Google Violated Copyright Laws With Newspaper Links. The New York Times (2/14, Crampton) reports from Paris, "A Brussels court ruled Tuesday that Google had violated copyright laws by publishing links to articles from Belgian newspapers without permission. Legal experts said the case could have broad implications in Europe for the news indexes provided by search engines." The Times continues, "The ruling, which Google said it would appeal, was hailed by some newspaper industry representatives and may also have an impact on a lawsuit against Google by the news service Agence France-Presse. … 'As the first decision to condemn a search engine for indexing news articles, you can be sure publishers around the world are paying attention,' said Cyril Fabre, a lawyer in Paris at Alexen, a law firm specializing in Internet law and intellectual property. 'The implications in Europe are particularly strong since copyright law is so uniform across the Continent.'" The Times adds, "The Brussels court ruled that Google, which operates the dominant Internet search engine, must pay 25,000 euros, or $32,600, for each day it displayed content from the plaintiff publications in violation of copyright. The court scaled back a September ruling that called for damages of up to 1 million euros a day and required Google to publish the judgment on its home page. … The group that brought the case, Copiepresse, manages copyright issues for more than one dozen Belgian newspapers, most published in French. It said it had also asked the French division of Yahoo to stop showing the group's news reports."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, B3, Patrick, Jolis) reports, "As media companies around the globe grapple with how they are compensated when their material is shared online, a Belgian court said Google Inc. can't post news articles from local newspapers on its Web sites in Belgium." The Journal continues, "In a closely watched ruling, the Brussels Court of First Instance said Google can't offer any links to articles or post any articles or photographs from French- and German-language Belgian newspapers. (No Dutch-language Belgian newspapers participated in the suit.) The judgment upheld the court's initial ruling in September, which the Internet-search firm had challenged. … The ruling may provide ammunition for other news associations. Already, Agence France Presse, the French wire service, is suing Google in U.S. District Court in Washington, accusing it of violating AFP's copyright by using its headlines, photographs and story fragments in Google News. AFP is demanding payment when Google uses excerpts of its articles and photographs in the U.S. … Also in the U.S., the Authors Guild and a group of major publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have brought two separate suits against Google in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, alleging Google is abusing their copyright by digitizing books without permission in order to make their contents searchable on the Web. Google has denied wrongdoing in all three cases; all are still pending."

Mills Corp Board Spurns Brookfield For Higher Bid From Simon, Farallon. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, D4) reports, "Mills Corp., the troubled Chevy Chase mall developer, said yesterday that it favored a $1.6 billion offer from Simon Property Group and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management instead of an earlier takeover agreement with Brookfield Asset Management." The AP continues, "Mills said its board of directors concluded that the Simon-Farallon offer, $24 per share, was "superior" to Brookfield's proposed deal of $21 per share, valued at $1.35 billion. The board authorized Mills to end the deal with Brookfield. When it was offered in January, Brookfield's bid represented an 18 percent premium over the price of Mills stock, but the share price has since jumped on news of a possible merger." The AP adds, "Mills, which owns 38 shopping centers nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, said in a statement that it would give Brookfield three days to top its previous offer, however, before it breaks the agreement signed Jan. 17. The company said it was 'ready and willing to negotiate such an amendment' with Brookfield, which is headquartered in Toronto. .. Along with the higher price, Mills said its board preferred the Simon-Farallon deal because it could be closed more quickly. If it ends the Brookfield agreement, Mills would likely absorb a $40 million breakup fee, but some Wall Street analysts said that was not a considerable amount." The AP notes, "Mills, one of the first developers of oversize malls known as mega-malls, has struggled in the past year with accounting problems and heavy debt that the company said in January could push it into bankruptcy. … The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating Mills's accounting missteps, which the company said were widespread and could cost shareholders up to $352 million in equity. Mills has yet to file its 2005 annual earnings report and plans to restate earnings as far back as 2001."

Honeywell Settles Chemical Plant Death Charge With DOJ For $12 Million. The AP (2/14) reports from Baton Rouge, "Honeywell International Inc. has agreed to pay $12 million in fines and restitution resulting from a fatal accident at its Baton Rouge chemical plant in 2003, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Honeywell agreed to plead guilty to violating the federal Clean Air Act, U.S. Attorney David Dugas said in a news release. A court date for formally entering the plea has not been set." The AP adds, "The charge stemmed from an accident at the plant on July 29, 2003. A plant worker, Delvin Henry, was doused by a corrosive material after opening a vat that had been labeled as containing a benign refrigerant. He died from his injuries the next day. … Through the plea agreement, Henry's three children will receive $2 million. The company also will pay an $8 million criminal fine, $750,000 to the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality, $750,000 to the Louisiana State Police hazardous materials unit and $500,000 to the state police emergency operations center."

Judge Rules Agriculture Department Violated Law In Seed Case. The New York Times (2/14, Pollack) reports, "A federal judge ruled yesterday that the Agriculture Department violated the law by failing to adequately assess possible environmental impacts before approving Monsanto's genetically engineered alfalfa." The Times continues, "Judge Charles R. Breyer of Federal District Court in San Francisco said the agency had been 'cavalier' in deciding that a full environmental impact statement was not needed because the potential environmental and economic effects of the crop were not significant." The Times adds, "Plaintiffs in the case — some alfalfa seed companies and environmental and farm advocacy groups — said they would push to stop the sales and planting of the alfalfa, which is resistant to Monsanto's Roundup herbicide. … Joseph Mendelson, legal director of the Center for Food Safety, a Washington advocacy group that organized the lawsuit, said the decision by itself could block commercial sales of genetically engineered alfalfa seeds but that the plaintiffs would ask for an injunction to make sure. Judge Breyer asked the parties to meet and propose remedies to him by Feb. 26." The Times notes, "A federal judge in Washington said last week that the Agriculture Department had not done adequate assessments before approving field trials of genetically engineered grass. And last August a federal judge in Hawaii, in a case involving field trials of crops engineered to produce pharmaceuticals, ruled that the Agriculture Department had not adequately assessed the possible impact on endangered species. … Mr. Mendelson of the Center for Food Safety said yesterday's decision could set a precedent that would require the Agriculture Department to do full impact statements for other biotech crops before they are approved."

Corporate Executives Call For Emissions Caps In Senate Testimony. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Simon, 850K) reports, "Corporate CEOs do not usually come to Capitol Hill to lobby for more government regulation. But that's what a group of executives did Tuesday, urging Congress to cap emissions blamed for global warming." Advocates "of a mandatory program for reducing greenhouse gas emissions see support from such businessmen as critical to getting legislation through Congress and past President Bush's veto pen. The executives were invited to appear at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing by its chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who has made passage of legislation addressing global warming her top priority." The testimony "was intended to rebut arguments that mandatory caps on emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases would be bad for business and drive up costs."

Exxon CEO Warns Against Damaging Economy With Emissions Curbs. The New York Times (2/14, Krauss, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports, "The chief executive of Exxon Mobil, Rex W. Tillerson, warned Tuesday that governments should not rush into policies that could damage the global economy in order to limit carbon emissions. In a speech at a major industry gathering, Mr. Tillerson acknowledged that the planet was warming while carbon dioxide levels were increasing, suggesting a more accommodating position than the hard-nosed stance Exxon had held." But he "gave an unalloyed defense of the oil industry and predicted that hydrocarbons would dominate the world's transportation as energy demand grows by an expected 40 percent by 2030. There is no significant alternative to oil in coming decades and Exxon will continue to make oil and natural gas its primary products, he said."

Tillerson's "statements suggested that Exxon was navigating between positions defending oil as an energy source and its core business, and showing sensitivity to growing public concerns about a warming climate."

WPost Runs Excerpt From IG Report On Missing FBI Laptops. Under the headline "Audit Faults FBI on Missing Laptops, Weapons," the Washington Post (2/14, A17, Eggen, 690K) ran a 212-word excerpt from the IG report released Monday which found "that 160 weapons and 160 laptop computers were missing at the FBI." The Post noted that the report said, "We recognize that in any organization the size of the FBI some weapons will inevitably be stolen or go missing. However, it is important that the FBI take appropriate steps to minimize these losses. … Our audit found that the FBI has not taken sufficient corrective action on several recommendations outlined in our 2002 audit report to address the issue of missing or stolen equipment. … Moreover, during this follow-up review, the FBI could not identify for us the contents of many of the lost and stolen laptops, including whether they contained sensitive or classified information . . ."

Philadelphia Cocaine Dealer Sentenced To 24 Years In Prison. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/14, Caparella, 106K) reports, "Mario Luis Rojas Jr., 39, a fugitive for 7 ½ years, a $3-million con man and bigtime cocaine trafficker, officially closed the family business Friday. His new life begins in a federal prison, where he'll serve a 24-year sentence thanks to U.S. District Judge Bruce Kauffman." The Daily News notes that after Rojas was arrested in 1998 and promised to cooperate with police, he "bribed a high school buddy, state trooper Antonio Romero, Jr., with a promise of a $3 million payday in return for a key to escape. Rojas then reneged on the $3 million and his deal to cooperate and fled to Mexico, where he resumed shipping cocaine to Philadelphia," according to Assistant US Attorney Ewald Zittlau. "During an investigation of the escape, the FBI conducted a 'reverse sting' and supplied the trooper's cousin, Jose L. Davila, with five kilograms of 'sham' cocaine as if it were a partial payment of the $3 million owed by Rojas."

Judge Says Supply Of Marijuana For Medical Research Is Inadequate. McClatchy Newspapers (2/14) reports, "In an emphatic but nonbinding opinion, the Drug Enforcement Administration's own judge is recommending that a University of Massachusetts professor be allowed to grow a legal pot crop. … 'The existing supply of marijuana is not adequate,' Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen Bittner ruled. … The federal government's 12-acre marijuana plot at the University of Mississippi provides neither the quantity nor quality scientists need, researchers contend." The Bush administration's "anti-drug stance may make it unlikely that the pot-growing rules will loosen. A decision is still months away, the DEA said."

In a longer version of the story, McClatchy Newspapers (2/13) wrote that both sides "will now get a chance to file comments on the opinion before DEA administrators make their ruling. 'We could still be months away from a final decision,' DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said Tuesday afternoon, adding that 'obviously, we're going to take the judge's opinion into consideration.'" The McClatchy story was used by the Denver Post, Fresno Bee, San Jose Mercury News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Detroit Free Press, and Kansas City Star.

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/13) reported the ruling "is actually only a recommendation to the DEA, which supports the current policy." Courtney "said a deputy administrator would make the final decision after reviewing arguments from lawyers for the DEA staff and for [Lyle Craker, a University of Massachusetts professor of plant biology.] The agency's decision could be appealed to a federal court in Washington, D.C. 'It's going to be a hard case to win,' said Anjuli Verna of the American Civil Liberties Union's drug law reform project, which represents Craker. She said the court could overturn a DEA veto of Bittner's ruling only if it was found that the agency was acting arbitrarily."

The North County Gazette (2/13) reported, "Thirty-eight members of Congress and a broad range of scientific and medical organizations have joined professor Craker in challenging the federal government's policy of blocking administrative channels and obstructing research that could lead to the development of marijuana as a prescription medicine. These organizations include the Lymphoma Foundation of America, the National Association for Public Health Policy, the Multiple Sclerosis Foundation, as well as several state medical and nurses associations."

Purported Ringleader Of Arizona Meth Operation Gets Life Sentence. The Arizona Daily

Star (2/13) reported the "ringleader of one of Tucson's largest methamphetamine organizations was sentenced to life in prison Monday. Timothy Owens, 50, was convicted last month on 22 felony counts following a three-week trial in Pima County Superior Court." The Counter Narcotics Alliance "was asked by the Tucson Police Department for help in investigating the burgeoning methamphetamine business in Midtown. It was soon afterward that Rich Kivi, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, discovered that many of the same people were being arrested again and again on drug-related charges only to be released to commit new crimes while awaiting trial." The Daily Star says Owens was included on the list of repeat offenders.

The AP (2/14) reports a similar story.

Former New York Trooper Pleads Guilty To Impersonating DEA Agent. The Newark Star Ledger (2/14) reports Michael Gluchowski, a former New York state trooper, has admitted posing as a DEA agent in a "raid." The Star Ledger says Gluchowski "could face up to three years in prison and a $250,000 fine." The Star Ledger reports John Yauch, the public defender representing Gluchowski, "had [an] innocent explanation for his client's actions: He was doing research for a book about his years with the DEA."

Congress Expected To Evaluate 2006 Anti-Meth Package. In the Modesto (CA) Bee (2/13) Michael Doyle wrote, "The House meth caucus is bigger than ever. … But none of this means the 110th Congress will do something new about the drug. Instead, 2007 may turn out to be a year for consolidation, as lawmakers evaluate results from their most recent anti-meth package signed by President Bush in March." The 2006 legislation "authorizes $99 million a year for meth-related enforcement, training and research. Next year, though, lawmakers must decide how much money to actually provide." Lawmakers "also must decide how much money will be devoted to the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas, such as the Fresno-based program targeting the valley methamphetamine trade."

Former Customs Agent Gets 9-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case. The Arizona Daily Star (2/14) reports a former customs officer "was sentenced to nine years in prison Tuesday after he knowingly allowed a vehicle with 440 pounds of cocaine inside to come into the United States. Fernando Arango, 52, was working for U.S. Customs and Border Protection at the port of entry in Nogales when he decided to counsel a person who he believed to be a drug trafficker on how to purchase an RV and have it altered to smuggle drugs into the country, according to…the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona."

The Arizona Republic (2/13) reported Officials "said while he still worked for the Border Patrol, Arango taught a person, whom he believed was a drug smuggler, how to have a vehicle altered with a hidden compartment to smuggle drugs into the United States."

The AP (2/14) reports Arango "was caught in a sting operation in October, 2005 when a law enforcement informant met him and paid him for his help."

IMMIGRATION:

Bank Of America To Issue Credit Cards Without Social Security Numbers. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Reckard, Streitfeld, Uribarri) reports, "Bank of America said Tuesday that it was issuing credit cards to Spanish-speaking immigrants who may not have Social Security numbers, triggering complaints that the nation's largest retail bank is tacitly endorsing illegal immigration." The Times continues, "The bank described the program as a pilot, limited for now to 51 branches in Los Angeles County, and said it could go national this year. … The credit cards are not aimed specifically at illegal immigrants, a bank spokeswoman said, but instead people who lack solid credit histories. Even so, the bank was bombarded with angry phone calls." The Times adds, "On Capitol Hill, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) accused the lender of aiding terrorists, while the Department of Homeland Security worried that the program could be exploited by criminals. … 'At face value the program seems to be problematic,' said Russ Knocke, a department spokesman. 'It seems to be lending itself to possibilities of perpetrating identity theft or creating more risk for money laundering.'" The Times notes, "The bank's program may be controversial, but it also vividly demonstrates that businesses view the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants not as lawbreakers but as customers. … Other major banks including Wells Fargo & Co. and Citibank have launched similar initiatives to gain customers in the burgeoning Latino community. … Wells Fargo began a pilot program last year in Los Angeles and Orange counties to offer home mortgages to immigrants who have lived in the United States for at least two years. The customers are allowed to identify themselves using taxpayer numbers issued by the Internal Revenue Service instead of Social Security numbers. That's the same type of identification number an immigrant can use to obtain a credit card under Bank of America's pilot program. … A Justice Department official declined to comment on the legality of the program."

Feinstein Wants Explanation For Ex-Border Agents' "Extreme" Sentences. The Washington Times (2/14, Seper, 88K) reports Sen. Dianne Feinstein has written Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking them "to explain the 'extreme' prison sentences two US Border Patrol agents received for shooting a fleeing drug-smuggling suspect." The senator wrote "that the government's prosecution had a 'chilling effect' on the ability of other agents to carry out their duties and had significantly affected their morale." Feinstein said Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean "were given 'sentences that some individuals who are convicted of murder wouldn't receive.'"

TAX:

Bill Would Reduce Underpayment Of Capital Gains Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C3, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that in an effort "to raise government revenues without raising taxes, a bipartisan group of lawmakers will join President Bush today in supporting a plan to require securities brokers, mutual funds and others to report the original purchase price that an investor paid for stocks, bonds and other securities, and thus cut down on underreporting of capital gains." The proposal "aims to help close the 'tax gap' -- the difference between what the government collects in revenue each year and what it believes it is entitled to collect." Internal Revenue Service researchers "estimate the gap at about $290 billion a year, and lawmakers -- as well as Mr. Bush -- would like to tap into that money to help pay for other priorities."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Negroponte Confirmed At Deputy Secretary Of State. The Washington Post's (2/14, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that the Senate on Monday confirmed former national intelligence director John Negroponte as deputy secretary of state. Kamen sys "Negroponte's portfolio as deputy was expected to include the pesky North Korea nuke problem. But Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill appears to have hammered out an agreement on that. Maybe it was because the North Koreans heard Negroponte was coming?"

White House Sends Khalilzad Nomination To Senate. The Washington Post's (2/14, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that the White House "has sent up to the Senate the nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, now our man in Baghdad, to be ambassador to the United Nations." The move Monday came "nearly two months after his selection was announced," but the Senate, "barring some unforeseen fracas, may confirm him in early March." Meanwhile, Ford M. Fraker, an investment banker and former head of banking at Saudi International Bank, was nominated to be ambassador to Saudi Arabia, while Lt. Gen. Dell L. Dailey, "now director of the center for special operations at MacDill Air Force Base, has been tapped to be the State Department's coordinator for counterterrorism."

Bush Criticized For Lack Of Black Judicial Nominees. The National Law Journal (2/14, Maclean) reports, "In nine of 11 Southern states, President George W. Bush has never nominated an African-American for any of 62 openings for federal trial court judgeships, according to federal court data." The Journal continues, "In his home state of Texas, the president has not nominated a single black judge to the federal bench in 18 nominations sent to the Senate during the past six years, according to Leslie Proll, director of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund's Washington office." The Journal adds, "The lack of black nominees has caused some African-American lawyers to express concern that retiring black judges appointed years ago will leave a new crop of Southern lawyers who may never see a black judge on the federal bench. … Mississippi and Alabama have not had a black judge appointed in more than 20 years, a situation Proll called, 'very egregious. So many of the Carter judges are leaving the court through death or retirement. Generations are changing on the bench, and nobody is following them,' she said." The Journal notes, "In Alabama, where all nine Bush nominees have been white, U.S. Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., said, 'It is inconceivable to me that there has not been a black judge of caliber to serve on the federal bench in the last 20 years. .. The first thing you hear is they can't find anyone qualified. That is not plausible, given the number of black lawyers in the state,' Davis said." The Journal notes, "The more powerful federal appellate courts of the 4th, 5th and 11th U.S. circuit courts of appeals have fared little better with black nominations. Of 14 nominees, no blacks have been proposed for the 5th or 11th circuits. … Bush has nominated three blacks to the 4th Circuit -- Claude Allen of Virginia, who later withdrew in the face of Democratic opposition; Judge Roger Gregory, originally a recess appointment by President Clinton renominated by Bush in 2001; and Judge Allyson Duncan of North Carolina, confirmed in 2003."

Black Lawmakers Have Low Expectations For Bush Meeting. Roll Call (2/14, Yachnin) reports members of the Congressional Black Caucus "said Tuesday they weren't getting their hopes up in advance of this week's private meeting with President Bush, the first such planned encounter in two years." Even as "many of the group's 44 lawmakers confirmed they plan to attend Thursday's White House meeting, acknowledging the event's importance, Members offered doubt that the session would yield any tangible results." Rep. Elijah Cummings said, "It's only logical that we have to consider what has happened in the past at these meetings." Roll Call adds Rep. John Conyers "asserted that even the power-switch that put Democrats in control of Congress — although nonpartisan, the CBC's membership includes no Republicans — will have little impact on the session's outcome." Conyers said, "I expect nothing from the president."

ABA Supports Pay Raises For Federal Judges. The AP (2/14, Sherman) reports, "The 420,000-member American Bar Association came to the defense of judges during its Miami meeting, expressing support for a pay raise for federal judges and pledging to defend aggressively against ballot measures that compromise judicial independence." The AP continues, "ABA President Karen Mathis told her membership Monday that district judges, who earn $165,200 a year, certainly should be paid more than first-year lawyers at New York City firms. Starting annual salaries there now are $160,000." The AP adds, "Former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker recently wrote that district judges would be making roughly $100,000 a year more today had their pay risen at the same pace as U.S. salaries generally. .. .Chief Justice John Roberts also highlighted judicial pay in his year-end report, noting that judges were leaving their lifetime-tenure jobs at an alarming rate for much better-paying jobs in the private sector."

House Panel Would Curb Government Review Of Foreign Investments. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A11, Hitt, 2.04M) reports a House committee "voted to curb the government's ability to reopen reviews into how foreign investments in U.S. companies might affect national security. But some business leaders said the proposed change doesn't go far enough." The issue concerns "the Bush administration's decision to reserve the right to revisit -- and potentially unwind -- foreign-led deals, even after they have been cleared by the U.S. government." The Bush administration "insisted on including such an 'evergreen authority' clause as part of its approval in November of the $11.6 billion purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by France's Alcatel SA. Business, concerned about the uncertainty added by such a clause, has lobbied Congress over the issue." The House Financial Services Committee, "acting on an amendment advanced by its chairman, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), yesterday approved a measure requiring that any decision to expose business deals to additional security reviews be triggered at the most senior levels of the government."

Bush Budget Ties Increased Drug Industry Fees To FDA Funding. USA Today (2/14, 1B, Schmit, 2.27M) reports President Bush's proposed budget "will create new industry fees to help finance the Food and Drug Administration, tying it more closely to the businesses it regulates." The FDA says "fees help it get good products to market faster, but critics say they give business too much influence. At a congressional hearing Tuesday on the FDA's drug-review record, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said the drug-review fees already in place have helped compromise the FDA's ability to ensure a safe drug supply." Of the FDA's "proposed $2.1 billion budget for fiscal 2008, 21.3% would come from user fees paid mostly by drug, medical device and food companies. That's about the same as in last year's proposed budget." In addition "to criticism from some members of Congress, the drug industry is questioning the growth of user fees, too."

Senators Offer Healthcare Reform Plan To Bush. The AP (2/14, Freking) reports that five Republican senators and five Democratic senators "told President Bush on Tuesday that they have agreed on a blueprint for increasing health insurance coverage, and they would like to work with him on it," and the White House "quickly took the lawmakers up on their offer." The AP continues, "The senators said they disagreed that the Senate is too divided to pass comprehensive health care legislation. Their blueprint, while vague on many points, contains two proposals that are essential, said Sen. Ron Wyden," an Oregon Democrat. The AP continues, "The first point was a 'big lift' for Republicans, he said. It acknowledges that legislation should ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality health insurance, while protecting current government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid. The second point required compromise from Democrats, he said, because they agreed with Bush that the current federal tax rules for health insurance disproportionately favor the rich while promoting inefficiency." The AP also notes that "Wyden said the lawmakers were not endorsing the president's tax proposal. They only acknowledged that the current tax rules were problematic."

Medical Establishment Said To Oppose Healthcare Reform. The Washington Post's Steven Pearlstein (2/14) writes, "It's hardly an original point, but now that health-care reform is back on the political agenda, it's worth emphasizing: The reason the system has been so resistant to change is that lots of powerful interests do very nicely with things just the way they are. Or, put another way: Although doctors, hospitals, insurers and drug companies say they, too, want things to change, any comprehensive reform would reduce their incomes and their profits."

Senate Poised To Pass $464 Billion Spending Bill. The AP (2/14, Taylor) reports, "The Senate is poised to send President Bush a huge spending bill that strikes a balance between Democrats controlling Congress and Republicans whose budget work stalled last year." The "catchall $464 billion measure would fund 13 Cabinet agencies covering foreign aid and every domestic agency save for the Homeland Security Department." A final vote "is slated for Wednesday after Democrats on Tuesday won a key vote to limit debate by a lopsided 71-26 margin." The measure "will be the first major bill to work its way through both the House and Senate since the Democratic takeover, but it also has support from Bush because it sticks within the overall budget limit he and congressional Republicans set last year." The Washington Times/AP (2/14) says the bill "reflects the priorities of its authors, the Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, who shifted funds from Mr. Bush's requests for foreign aid and military base projects to popular programs such as health research, law enforcement and low-income housing. Most of the funding shifts were small but were needed to avoid furloughs or other problems at agencies such as the FBI that are limping along at or below last year's funding levels."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A13, Rogers, 2.04M) notes the Senate vote "came as the House began debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush's decision to send at least 21,500 more U.S. troops to try to curb sectarian violence in Iraq. The twin events underscore how central defense spending will be to the 2008 budget debate this spring, and how emotions over the Iraq war can make the debate more difficult for both parties."

Democratic Spending Bill Said To Include "Accounting Gimmicks." McClatchy (2/14, Rosen) reports that when President Bush "sent Congress his 2008 budget last week, Democratic lawmakers accused him of using accounting gimmicks to appear fiscally responsible and intent on reducing the federal deficit." But it "turns out, the Democrats have some accounting tricks of their own. A massive spending bill to fund the government through September contains billions of dollars in savings that exist only on paper, but which free up real money to spend on discretionary programs Bush has sought to cut." The House "passed the $463.5 billion appropriations legislation Jan. 31, and the Senate took it up Tuesday." Budget experts "from both parties, including current and former lawmakers and senior aides, said the Democrats' legislation relies on various types of creative accounting and side deals in order for it to appear to avoid new deficit spending." Among other "gimmicks," the measure "provides $2.49 billion for the ongoing realignment and closing of military bases, less than half the amount authorized by the last Congress. There is bipartisan agreement to make up the difference - $3.14 billion - in subsequent 'emergency' supplemental appropriations." The measure also "eliminates $3.5 billion in 'contract authority' for federal highway projects, but it doesn't decrease 'obligation limitations' by an equivalent amount."

bracing for their first clash with the Democratic Congress, raising millions of dollars to defeat a proposal to ease labor-organizing efforts." A House committee "is set to begin work today on the Employee Free Choice Act, which would give greater legal protection for union organizers and would let workers choose to organize simply by signing pro-union cards rather than holding a federally supervised election." Labor leaders "made enactment of such a law a priority, after spending heavily in last year's elections to help their Democratic allies win control of Congress." The AFL-CIO "and other labor groups say that having the ability to organize workers through a card-signing process will help them to stem the multidecade decline in union representation."

Roll Call (2/14, Newmyer) reports that in "what is set to be their first major showdown since Democrats took control of Congress, business and labor interests are poised for a multimillion-dollar clash over a measure to make it easier for workers to unionize." The "deep-pocketed corporate lobbying groups have joined together to defeat the proposal, today announcing the launch of a new coalition to coordinate their activities. The effort, called the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, has the backing of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business, among others." On the other side is "an informal alliance of labor groups, headed by the AFL-CIO and the breakaway Change to Win unions, working across a divide in the labor movement to advance the measure. They also have the backing of Americans United, a liberal group closely aligned with Congressional Democrats." The bill at issue "in the fight is the Employee Free Choice Act. A top priority for labor unions and Democratic leadership, the bill would allow employees at a workplace to organize once a majority sign cards indicating they want to join a union."

Sweeney Says Lindsey Mischaracterized Union Organizing Bill. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/12), AFL-CIO president John Sweeney says, "In response to Lawrence B. Lindsey's mischaracterization of the Employee Free Choice Act ('Abrogating Workers' Rights,' editorial page, Feb. 2): In fact, workers can still petition for a union election under the Employee Free Choice Act. The new legislation simply gives workers another choice, to form unions when a majority signs authorization cards. Such procedures have been in place since 1935 -- but today the choice is up to the boss, and it should be up to workers." Lindsay "claims that under the new legislation, workers couldn't decertify a union by signing a card. The fact is, they already can, and that wouldn't change. If workers present to their employer a petition or other evidence that a majority no longer want the union, the employer can legally withdraw recognition and refuse to bargain."

Norwood Dies Of Lung Disease. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was a pause in that Iraq debate today in memory of Republican Congressman Charlie Norwood, who died this morning at his home in Augusta, Georgia after a long battle with lung disease. He was a conservative, swept into office in the GOP wave of 1994. He was a dentist and a passionate advocate of a patients' bill of rights, aimed at giving consumers better access to healthcare in this country. Charlie Norwood was 65 years old."

The AP (2/14, Evans) reports Norwood, "a blunt-spoken Georgia Republican who sold his dental practice and ran for Congress at age 52, died Tuesday after battling cancer and lung disease." President Bush, "in a statement, described Norwood as 'a good friend and a strong, spirited legislator who always stuck to his principles.'" The "vacancy created by his death will be filled by a special election." Norwood "wasn't afraid to criticize his own party when he thought it was veering off course. Last year he called Republicans who backed compromise immigration legislation 'turncoats.'" Norwood's "passion was health care. Taking on insurance companies, he spent much of his political career pressing for a 'patients' bill of rights' aimed at giving consumers better access to care, including greater ability to sue insurers."

Roll Call (2/14, Whittington) reports that as "politicians from Capitol Hill to Atlanta mourned the death of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.) on Tuesday, calculations and preparations already were under way for a special election to fill the vacancy in the Augusta-based 10th district." Among the "local GOP lawmakers considered most likely to run to succeed Norwood are state Rep. Barry Fleming and state Sens. Ralph Hudgens and Jim Whitehead." Former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) and state Rep. Ben Harbin (R) "also have been mentioned as possible candidates. However, Harbin's perch as chairman of the Appropriations Committee is a powerful incentive for him to stay put." In Georgia, "state lawmakers must resign their seats once they qualify to run in a special election — a requirement that could severely limit what otherwise would be a large field of candidates." Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) "now has 10 days to issue a writ of election, which will allow the Georgia secretary of state's office to set the date for the special election. The contest, which must occur 30 days after the writ of election is issued, will be an all-party primary in which the first-place finisher must get more than 50 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff."

Bush's Comments About His Father Noted. The New York Times (2/14, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "It was a moment of public sentimentality that seemed almost un-Bush-like. Speaking on C-Span on Monday, President Bush said of his father, 'I am actually more concerned about him than I have ever been in my life, because he's paying too much attention to the news.' Mr. Bush continued: 'I understand how difficult it is for a person who loves somebody to see them out in the political process and to kind of endure the criticism. My answer to him is, 'Look, don't pay attention to it. I'm doing fine.' His comments were a rare window into a complicated father-son relationship that has been a source of endless fascination in Washington and promises to fascinate future historians no less."

Ellison Complains To Police About Tancredo's Cigar Smoke. The Hill (2/14, Rothstein) reports Rep. Keith Ellison "called the Capitol Hill Police on" Rep. Tom Tancredo last Wednesday night "as Tancredo was in his office smoking a cigar. The lawmakers have neighboring offices on the first floor of the Longworth House Office Building. Tancredo was still stunned a day later. 'It's very bizarre,' said Tancredo, who has never met Ellison. 'Seemed to me not a good way to say hello.'" The Hill goes on to report that a police officer "walked in to check on the smoke. The officer told Tancredo that the officer came because he was required to do so and not because the officer wanted to. The officer had already told Ellison that Tancredo was permitted to smoke in his office. The visit was more a formality."

NYTimes Seeks Ban On Congressional Leadership PACs. The New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) reports, "Critics in Congress know the free-flowing PAC's, as the next big scandal waiting in the wings, should be banned under campaign finance law. The leaders of the House Democratic campaign committee, in fact, have already canceled the committee's annual ski weekend for lobbyists. Members should follow suit and ban the grossly misnamed leadership PACs as a step toward serious campaign finance reform."

OTHER NEWS:

Trade Deficit Hits New Record. USA Today (2/14, 2B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "Here's a news flash: The U.S. trade deficit set a record last year. If that seems pretty much like a dog-bites-man story, maybe it's because 2006 marked the fifth-consecutive year that the trade deficit hit a new high." The US "last ran an annual trade surplus in 1975 as the Vietnam War wound down and Saturday Night Live made its television debut. … There's hope, however, that the US trade imbalance with the rest of the world in goods and services may have peaked. 'It's going to get a bit better,' says Nigel Gault, chief US economist at Global Insight."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A2, Price, 2.04M) reports "economists said trade is likely to contribute to growth in coming months, as exports continue on an uptrend and oil prices, which surged in December, fall back. Economists have long predicted that as economic demand among top US trading partners caught up with rapid US economic growth, the US trade deficit would shrink."

The New York Times (2/14, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "The record trade deficit was no surprise, since it had been foreshadowed in monthly figures over the last year. But in the current tense political climate in Washington, it was seized upon by both the Bush administration and its critics. It also seemed certain to become a factor in the accelerating presidential race." The Times adds, "Leading Bush administration officials noted that although the deficit had reached new levels, exports of American products were also growing at record rates, in many cases to the countries with which the United States had signed trade deals in the last six years. 'Our exports for the last year are up by nearly 13 percent,' Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, said in a telephone interview. 'We've said all along that our strategy is to grow exports and ensure that companies know about the trade agreements we have, rather than a protectionist strategy of cutting off imports.'" Democrats "used the latest trade numbers to demand what the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, called 'a new direction' in trade policies, placing more emphasis on opening foreign markets to American goods, protecting American products from piracy and counterfeiting, and helping American industry become more competitive."

The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) also says the data "raised tensions in Washington, unleashing criticism on Capitol Hill of the Bush administration's pursuit of new trade deals. They also provoked a fresh round of demands for action against China, whose trade surplus with the United States swelled to a record $233 billion last year, according to the Commerce Department." In Congress, the Democratic leadership "used the record deficit to accuse the Bush administration of selling out the interests of American workers in pursuit of trade deals. In a letter to President Bush, top Democrats, including…Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, called the trade deficit 'unsustainable,' listing among its consequences 'failed businesses, displaced workers, lower real wages and rising inequality.' … A White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, said the letter was 'not the most helpful approach.'" But "he added that the White House would 'work with Congress' in seeking approval for new trade deals."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 8, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the blue chips spiked on rumors that aluminum giant Alcoa is somehow a takeover target. The Dow finished up at 102 points to close at 12,654.85] on the day. NASDAQ was up nine and a half points [to close at 2,459.88] on the day." The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C1, Browning, 2.04M) notes "the blue-chip average is up 1.5% for 2007. The last record close was 12673.68, on Feb. 1." Also yesterday, "the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.76%, or 10.89 points, to 1444.26, up 1.8% in 2007." The Washington Post (2/14, D1, Tse, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports on the stock market.

Bernanke To Testify Before Congress. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, 2.04M) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke begins his two-day semiannual economic report to Congress, with financial markets braced for hawkish signals on interest rates. The economy continues to chug along despite the drag from the slower housing market, and investors are concerned that a future rate increase is still on the table. Mr. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill begins at 10 a.m. EST." USA Today (2/14, 3B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) says Bernanke "will likely be peppered with questions about why wages are not rising at a more rapid pace. But he may have to leave lawmakers guessing." USA Today adds, "That's because economists aren't sure why wages haven't increased at a faster pace even though the labor market is tight. A tight labor market is often a precursor to a big pickup in pay as employers enter into bidding wars to attract and retain workers."

Economist Sees Budget Surplus In 2009. In a Wall Street Journal (2/14, A-21, 2.04M) op-ed, economist Brian Wesbury writes, "In relative terms, the first five years of the current recovery have been much better than the first five years of the 1990s recovery. But all this has not softened the pessimism of many pundits and politicians who are either unimpressed or expect the whole thing to come crashing down any minute. That is, unless the government firmly grabs the reins of the global economy and steers it clear of disaster." Wesbury adds, "Many believe that the debate is over on global warming, nationalized health care, tax hikes, rich-versus-poor, the trade deficit and 'obscene' oil company profits. Forgotten in this rush to pass judgment on capitalism is the fact that the last two times government seriously tried to control the U.S. economy -- in the 1930s and in the 1970s -- they made a terrible mess of it." Many "of the more acute economic problems supposedly facing the U.S. are evaporating quickly. My models of the federal budget forecast a $115 billion dollar deficit this year, just 0.8% of GDP, less than half the size expected by the White House." A "budget surplus in 2009 is likely," and "[s]urpluses will change the calculus on tax hikes in dramatic fashion. Any argument to repeal the Bush tax cuts will face a strong headwind. This is great news for investors and the economy."

Romney Makes His Candidacy Official At Michigan Event. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney officially declared his candidacy for president yesterday at the Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn, Michigan. Romney's decision to kick-off his candidacy in Michigan capitalizes on the reputation of his father, who served as Michigan's governor, and, according to Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume), allows Romney "to portray himself as someone outside Washington D.C., and outside the sort of thinking and dealing that goes on here. … Casting himself as an outsider, he underscored his commitment to new and innovative thinking, something he pointedly suggested his GOP rivals are incapable of." All three network devoted significant time to covering the announcement, focusing on Romney's Mormonism and formerly liberal views on social matters. ABC World News (2/13, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "what he said and where he said it, spoke volumes about his candidacy. … In front of a new Ford hybrid and a 1963 Rambler once championed by his father, the former Governor of Massachusetts talked about the need for innovation." ABC noted Romney is "eager to highlight his Midwestern values and distance himself from some of the moderate stands he took as governor," but "biggest challenge may be his religion." According to the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 9, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M), "apparently many people are asking, Mitt who? A new CBS News poll found that 72% of Americans haven't heard enough about the former Governor of Massachusetts to form an opinion. Then there's the issue of his religion. Romney is Mormon, and that…may prove to be an obstacle as he embarks on his campaign. … A CBS News poll shows that most Americans don't know enough about the religion to have an opinion. Yet, more than two-thirds say they could vote for a qualified Mormon."

NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 9, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) said Romney "has real challenges. He says he is the true social conservative in the race, opposed to abortion and gay marriage. But here was Romney in 1994." Romney was shown saying, "I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country"; and "I feel that all people should be allowed to participate in the Boy Scouts regardless of their sexual orientation." NBC also characterized Romney's religion as his "biggest hurdle."

Despite an enormous amount of recent media attention, the AP (2/14, Sidoti) portrays Romney as "a lesser-known Republican in a jam-packed presidential field." The AP notes the symbolism of yesterday's event and emphasizes that Romney is "casting himself as a political outsider with the managerial skills necessary to fix a flawed Washington." The AP adds, "His political resume thin…Romney sought to turn that potential weakness into a strength, portraying himself as the best candidate to meet the country's challenges given his venture capitalist background and proven leadership in the public, private and volunteer sectors. In doing so, he attempted to draw a stark distinction between his qualifications and those of" Sen. John McCain.

USA Today (2/14, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "Only one Republican presidential candidate has run a business, governed a state and turned an ailing Olympics into a success story. That record…Romney said Tuesday, makes him uniquely qualified to transcend Washington's 'petty politics' and deliver change. … The Michigan launch allowed Romney to focus on his Midwestern roots rather than the liberal state he governed until last month." USA Today notes that Romney's challenges include "his Mormon religion and changing positions on issues such as abortion, gay rights, emergency contraception and stem cell research."

The Politico (2/14, Martin) reports, "Along with two of his siblings, his wife, five sons and daughters-in-law and a bevy of grandchildren, the son of an automobile executive-turned-Michigan governor spoke to about 600 people. … Pivoting into his campaign message, the former venture capitalist declared in his 20-minute speech that 'if there ever was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it is now.' Romney would return again and again to those buzzwords. He used 'innovation' 10 times and 'transformation' eight times." The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Pearson, 617K) reports, "Though he didn't mention Democratic Sen. Barack Obama or any other candidates by name, Romney also said voters should not be content with candidates who make broad appeals to voters' hopes. 'Our hopes and dreams are going to inspire us, because we are an optimistic people,' he said. 'But let me tell you, just hoping is simply crossing your fingers. What we really need are hands that will go to work. It's time for hope and action. It's time that we do as well as dream.'" The Boston Globe (2/14, Helman, 413K) reports, "Even with the soaring language, Romney…at times struck an uncharacteristically subdued tone, especially in the beginning of his address. The crowd also missed some applause lines, making for some awkward pauses."

Romney Struggling To Establish Conservative Bona Fides. The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Kornblut, 690K) describes Romney as a "Mormon father of five," who "brings personal wealth, dashing looks and business credentials to a race that is relatively open." The Post goes on to report that while Romney "focused…on his executive experience over the past decade and a half, his political evolution during that time is proving problematic: A significant obstacle is his history as a self-described moderate Republican during his 1994 Senate campaign. On issues such as abortion and gay rights, Romney has made sizable shifts since then, exposing himself to charges of inconsistency and political opportunism. He spoke directly about social issues in his announcement. … The emphasis contrasted with his words in 1994, when he at one point argued that the 'gay community needs more support from the Republican Party' and presented himself as the candidate to make that happen." Romney "says that he no longer favors a federal nondiscrimination law for gay men and lesbians, and that he would not support allowing them to serve in the military. He has also altered his stance on abortion, saying he would now support overturning the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A12, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "For months, Mr. Romney has struggled to persuade conservatives that he opposes abortion and gay rights, despite videotaped comments to the contrary from his past campaigns in more liberal Massachusetts. Yesterday, he struck the notes that Christian conservatives listen for." The New York Times (2/14, Nagourney, 1.16M) notes Romney "made only passing mention to abortion and gay rights and used the kind of coded language that would be recognized by people familiar with the debate, in what appeared to be an accommodation to the larger audience a candidate faces when announcing. And he dropped a description of Americans as 'God-fearing' that was included in his prepared text." The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Barabak, 850K) reports Romney "spoke of God, family and morality…but made only passing mention of abortion and gay rights."

McCain Event Showcases Former Romney Supporters. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) noted that McCain's campaign "is playing hardball, staging a news conference with former Romney supporters who switched to McCain. While Romney is pro-life now, he supported abortion rights in the nineties. McCain, they said, had been a reliable conservative all along." Michigan state Rep. Judy Emmons: "His commitment to protecting life at every level from conception on, and the fact of the matter is that he has been strong in his convictions…for decades."

Morris Says Romney Has Been Overtaken By Gingrich As Conservatives' Alternative. In his column for The Hill (2/14) Dick Morris claims that former House speaker Newt Gingrich "appears to be moving up into contention, overtaking former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and battling to be the conservative alternative to either former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani or Arizona Sen. John McCain. … Unnoticed by most pundits, Gingrich seems to be building a lead over Romney and a host of conservative wannabes." Morris adds, "As McCain drops in the polls…some conservatives seem eager for a 'real Republican' to challenge for the nomination. … Hungry for new ideas and desperate after losing Congress, Republican voters seem to be rallying to the only real genius in the race — the former Speaker. The statute of limitations seems to have expired on his personal scandals and Gingrich is striking a responsive chord among conservatives."

USA Today/Gallup Poll Shows Clinton, Giuliani Maintaining Leads. USA Today (2/14, 6A, Page, 2.27M) reports that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "widened leads over their rivals in recent weeks as they began to openly campaign for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. The survey taken Friday through Sunday…shows Clinton with a 19-percentage-point edge over Illinois Sen. Barack Obama among Democrats and Giuliani with a 16-point margin over Arizona Sen. John McCain among Republicans. A month earlier, Clinton had led by 11 points and Giuliani by 4. Though Clinton and Obama have faced questions about whether the nation is ready to elect the first woman or African-American as president, the poll finds that other traits may pose higher hurdles. More than four in 10 say they wouldn't vote for a 'generally well-qualified person' for president who was 72 years old -- the age McCain will reach in August 2008. Three in 10 say they wouldn't vote for someone who has been married three times, as has Giuliani. In contrast, 11% rule out voting for a woman and 5% for a black." USA notes, "In potential general-election matchups, Giuliani defeats Obama by 9 points and leads Clinton by 2 points, within the survey's three-point margin of error. McCain ties Obama and trails Clinton by 3 points."

By 45-31, More Voters Intend To Vote For Democratic Candidate. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, 2.04M) reports Clinton "is leading the pack of presidential hopefuls as the campaign for the 2008 election begins, a new poll indicates. The Harris Interactive poll, which was conducted online Feb. 2-8, among 3,423 adults, shows that 20% of U.S. adults would most likely vote for Ms. Clinton if they had to choose one candidate from a list of those who may run. Ten percent of those surveyed said they would vote for Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) and 8% said they would choose former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani. The poll indicates that for 45% of respondents, their first choice for president would be a Democratic candidate, while 31% would choose a Republican candidate. When asked to pick from a list of leaders they would consider for president, 45% said they would consider voting for Hillary Clinton, while 37% said they would consider Mr. Obama, 32% said they would consider Colin Powell and 29% said they would consider Mr. Giuliani. Forty-one percent of Republicans polled indicated they would consider a Democratic leader for president, while 35% of Democrats said they would consider a Republican candidate."

Giuliani Hedges His Support For Bush's Handling Of Iraq War. The New York Times (2/14, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports, "In every speech he makes…Giuliani talks about Iraq and makes clear that he sides with President Bush, endorsing the war and the deployment of 21,500 more troops. His chief rivals…take the same stances. But in discussing the deployment of more troops, Mr. Giuliani has been alone in saying that such a strategy may not succeed, potentially providing him cover should the situation in Iraq deteriorate further. And he has put the strategy in a broader context that plays down the importance of Iraq. Terrorists 'are going to continue to be at war with us, no matter what the outcome in Iraq,' Mr. Giuliani said recently in New Hampshire. The night before, he said that 'there are no sure things,' and that if the United States fails in Iraq, 'we have to be ready for that, too.' In California a few days later, speaking of 'the danger of focusing on Iraq too much,' he said that complete success there would not win the fight against terrorism, and that failure there would not lose it."

Giuliani's Speeches Stick To Familiar Themes. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Finnegan, 850K) reports, "In five days of campaigning in California, Giuliani has made terrorism his paramount focus -- that and his story of a New York turnaround on his watch at City Hall. … But while testing themes, he has stuck to tightly controlled events that minimize his exposure to tough questions on the Iraq war, domestic policy or the private business deals and speeches that have made him wealthy. A supporter of President Bush's troop buildup, Giuliani has framed Iraq as a battle in the war on terrorism without addressing questions on its original rationale."

1994 Campaign Memo Analyzes Giuliani's "Weirdness Factor." The Washington Post (2/14, A3, Kurtz, 690K) reports that a "vulnerability study" undertaken by former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani's own 1994 campaign, "including warnings about his 'weirdness factor' and other perceived liabilities, surfaced. … The 1993 report by two aides in Giuliani's mayoral campaign was obtained by Village Voice reporter Wayne Barrett for a book on Giuliani and was posted on the Smoking Gun Web site." The Post goes on to report, "The 'weirdness' question involved Giuliani's first marriage, to his second cousin. He had his 14-year union with Regina Peruggi annulled on grounds that the Roman Catholic Church had never properly approved the marriage. The 1993 memo said that Giuliani had given a 'wide array of conflicting answers' about his personal life, bringing 'the soundness of his judgment' into question. … The memo also reported the 'charge' that 'Giuliani received special treatment from a friendly federal judge to avoid military service during the Vietnam War,' and later 'hypocritically prosecuted draft dodgers.' Giuliani, who was dropped by an Air Force ROTC program because of a hearing problem, received a rare occupational deferment in 1969 after a federal judge wrote a letter about the importance of his duties as a law clerk."

McCain To Officially Announce His Candidacy March 12. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported that Sen. John McCain "is now making plans for his announcement, targeting March 12th to join the race officially."

Second Controversial Edwards Blogger Quits. The New York Times/AP (2/14) reports, "A second blogger working for the Democratic presidential campaign of former Senator John Edwards quit Tuesday under pressure from conservative critics. The blogger, Melissa McEwan, wrote on her personal blog, Shakespeare's Sister, that she had made the decision to quit 'with the campaign's reluctant support, because my remaining the focus of sustained ideological attacks was inevitably making me a liability to the campaign.' On Monday, another blogger, Amanda Marcotte, left the Edwards staff, also after being accused of religious bigotry for earlier writings."

Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, on The O'Reilly Factor (2/13) said Edwards "remains defiant. … Everybody knows that Edwards or any other politician would never employ an anti-Semite, Klan member or a homophobe, while had no problem standing by two anti-Christian women even after seeing the vile things they had written."

Many Senators Considered Potential VP Picks. Roll Call (2/14, Billings) reports, "At least seven Senators are weighing or are engaged in a 2008 presidential run. … Any of those Senators also could be a vice presidential pick if unsuccessful in their respective campaigns to sit atop the 2008 ticket. But beyond that group, a handful of other Senate Democrats and Republicans could be attractive No. 2 picks for their party's presidential candidates." Roll Call continues, "Among them are: Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), the affable Midwesterner who himself was briefly a 2008 presidential candidate; Dianne Feinstein, the experienced, steady Democrat from the electoral-rich state of California; Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Senate leader and strong party loyalist; Jack Reed (R.I.), a West Point graduate and point man for the Democrats on military matters; Jim Webb (Va.), the freshman Democratic rising star whose national security credentials are difficult to match; Ken Salazar (Colo.), a Westerner with a law enforcement background as state attorney general; and Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), a well-versed and well-liked Southerner. Senate Republicans have picks on their side as well, beginning unsurprisingly with presidential hopefuls Brownback, Hagel and McCain. … Beyond that trio, other GOP Senators likely to get strong consideration include Sens. John Thune (S.D.), the telegenic first-term Senator who knocked off then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) in 2004; Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), the conservative Republican Policy Committee chairwoman who has hinted at a possible interest in the job; Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), a one-time presidential hopeful himself; Judd Gregg (N.H.), the wonky Easterner who has become one of his party's most loyal attack dogs; and David Vitter, the conservative Louisianan whose work on behalf of Hurricane Katrina recovery could play heavily in his favor."

Clinton Said To Risk Suffering Muskie's Fate. The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (2/14, A19) writes, "A specter was haunting Hillary Clinton as she campaigned in New Hampshire this weekend: the specter of Ed Muskie. As the ancient or merely studious among us will recall, the Democratic senator from Maine, who'd been Hubert Humphrey's running mate in 1968, entered his party's presidential contest in 1972 as the front-runner. His prospects were dashed in the New Hampshire snows, however. As popular memory has it, an indignant Muskie started crying while refuting a silly attack on him. … Muskie's more serious problem, however, was the Vietnam War, which he opposed. His opposition, though, had none of the fervor or long-term consistency of another Democratic senator and presidential aspirant, George McGovern." Meyerson adds, "Today, Hillary Clinton seems almost uncannily positioned to become the Ed Muskie of 2008. She opposes the U.S. military presence in Iraq but not with the specificity, fervor or bona fides of her leading Democratic rivals. As Muskie did with Vietnam, she supported the legislation enabling the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and she has been slower and more inconstant than her party rivals in coming around to opposing the continued U.S. occupation."

Dowd Analyzes Obama's Weaknesses. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (2/14)writes that Sen. Barack Obama "is backed up by a strong, smart wife and a professional campaign team, but he doesn't have a do-whatever-it-takes family firm with contract killers and debt collectors, like Bush Inc. and Clinton Inc. He was eloquent, if not as inspiring as his advance billing had prepared audiences to expect. He made his first Swift-boat-able slip when he had to apologize for talking about soldiers' lives 'wasted' in Iraq. He sounded self-consciously pristine at times, as if he was too refined for the muck of politics. That's not how you beat anybody but Alan Keyes."

DCCC Targeting Ferguson After Extremely Close 2006 Race. The Hill (2/14, Youngman) reports, "Even though Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), is targeting Republican-held seats in New Jersey, state GOP consultants say if Democrats couldn't capitalize on their own party's electoral successes last year, then those seats aren't attainable in 2008. … Perhaps the most vulnerable of those seats is Rep. Mike Ferguson (R), who narrowly defeated state Assemblywoman Linda Stender (D), winning by just more than 1 percent in the wake of press reports alleging inappropriate conduct with a female college student at a Georgetown bar in 2004. Ferguson, who denied the allegations, did not comment for this article. Stender told The Hill this week she is 'looking seriously' at going up against Ferguson again in 2008, and she will make a decision by 'late summer, early fall.'" However, Ed Traz, "a GOP consulting heavyweight in the Garden State," said "taking on Ferguson in 2008 would be a 'waste' of the DCCC's money in light of the large number of resources the committee will need to devote to defending freshman incumbents in Republican districts."

Both Parties Avoid Debate Over Entitlement Spending. The Washington Post's Robert Samuelson (2/14, A19) writes, "The welfare state has made budgeting an exercise in futility. Both liberals and conservatives, in their own ways, peddle phony solutions. Cut waste, say conservatives. Well, network news reports of $20 million federal programs that don't work may seem -- and be -- scandalous, but like Amtrak they're usually mere blips in the total budget. For its 2008 budget, the Bush administration brags it would end or sharply reduce 141 programs. But most are microscopic; total savings would be $12 billion, or 0.4 percent of spending. Worse, Congress has previously rejected some of these cuts."

Nuclear Pact With North Korea Met With Criticism By Conservatives, Democrats. ABC World News (2/13, story 3, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that under "the potentially historic agreement" signed Tuesday by North Korea, Pyongyang "has 60 days to begin dismantling its nuclear program. In exchange, the US will begin the process of ending trade sanctions and moving North Korea from the list of terror-sponsoring nations. North Korea will also receive almost 1 million tons of fuel."

A number of media reports note the agreement is coming under fire from "both sides of the political spectrum," as the New York Times (2/14, A10, Cooper, Yardley, 1.16M) puts is. The Times says "hardliners argued that the United States should have held out until North Korea agreed to fully declare and dismantle its entire nuclear program," while Democrats "argued that the deal was no better than one they said the United States could have gotten four years ago." Regardless, the Times say the deal "represented a bureaucratic victory for [Secretary] Rice, who has pushed for a more diplomatic approach with North Korea than more hawkish administration officials would have liked. In the end, it was Ms. Rice who convinced President Bush to sign onto the pact, administration officials said."

The Washington Times (2/14, Miller, 88K) says the deal received "faint praise" from Senate Democrats. Majority leader Harry Reid called it a "first step," but said it "still can't fix the mess this administration has created by ignoring North Korea for the past five years."

The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) said "the biggest reason to be skeptical" is whether "North Korea's Kim Jong Il [is] ready to honor this deal. Maybe. But as this unpredictable leader has shown over and over, if his mood changes next month or next year, he may be just as ready to torpedo it." Separately, the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 4, 1:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "no one is popping any champagne corks yet" due to "the unpredictability of Kim Jong Il. However, "North Korea had every reason every incentive to come to the table, the electricity and the oil it so badly needs."

The AP (2/14, Gearan) says the Bush administration called a deal a "breakthrough," but Pyongyang's "history of broken promises kept the celebrations to a minimum." There was "worry, too, that accommodation of North Korea would encourage brinksmanship by Iran or other would-be nuclear states."

The Washington Post (2/14, A11, Kessler, Cody, 690K) also reports the deal "came under attack yesterday, with conservatives labeling it a betrayal and Democrats charging that Bush allowed North Korea to become a nuclear-weapon state without gaining much improvement over a Clinton-era deal that collapsed during Bush's first term." Bush, however, pronounced himself "pleased" with the accord, and Secretary Rice said it is just the beginning of a long process. "This is not the end of the story," she said, calling it the result of "patient, creative and tough diplomacy."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Richter, 850K) says the deal "marks a fundamental shift in direction for the Bush administration," which "provoked outrage from conservative allies of the administration who said it flatly contradicted Bush's previous policy." Meanwhile, "some former Clinton administration officials termed it a step in the right direction but questioned why it took Bush so long."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A4, King Jr., Ramstad, 2.04M) says "fading options for the US and North Korea led to a landmark agreement designed to shut down Pyongyang's nuclear program. But the follow-through needed to reach the goal of a denuclearized Korean peninsula could be thwarted by the same problems that plagued earlier deals."

On its front page, the Washington Times (2/14, A1, Lanfranco, 88K) says the "next 60 days will determine whether the new document to halt and eventually eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs will create the momentum to ease tensions in Northeast Asia or will become just another diplomatic chapter in a series of broken promises."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Magnier, 850K) says "troublesome signs are already emerging" about Pyongyang's intent to "honor the disarmament promises it made."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Ford, 59K) reports, "Some observers suggest that this agreement could either resolve years of conflict or collapse amid more conflict, crisis, and rhetoric as has happened so often."

A number of different local TV stations across the country broadcast reports on the deal, often contrasting Secretary Rice's positive reaction to the agreement against Bolton's comments. Some examples: KXMC-TV Bismarck

(2/13, 10:00 pm) showed Secretary Rice saying, "It is a part of a broad and comprehensive effort not only to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula, but also to advance the future of peace and prosperity in northeast Asia." The station added, "But not everyone thinks this is a good deal. Former UN Ambassador John Bolton says it sends the wrong message and that North Korea should not be rewarded for only partially dismantling its nuclear program." NECN-TV Boston (2/13, 9:23 pm) showcased both Rice and Bolton, and reported, "There is both optimism and criticism about a plan designed to denuclearize North Korea." Bolton was shown challenging the deal, saying, "I just think it's a bad sign. It's a reward for the persistence of the North Koreans that they don't deserve." Other stations offering similar quotes from Bolton and Rice were KGO-TV San Francisco (2/13, 6:34 pm), WIBW-TV Topeka (2/13, 5:18 pm), KJUD-TV Juneau (2/13, 5:14 pm), and KAIT-TV Jonesboro, AR (2/13, 5:11 pm).

Bush's "Weakened" Position Seen As Impetus For Deal. In its analysis, the Financial Times (2/14, Fifield) notes some see the deal as "a partial capitulation by a weakened administration…badly in need of a diplomatic breakthrough to set against his Middle East troubles."

In a front page analysis, the New York Times (2/14, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) says, "It is hard to imagine that either George W. Bush or Kim Jong-il would have agreed even a year ago to the kind of deal they have now approved. … But in the past few months, the world has changed for both Mr. Bush and Mr. Kim." Bush, "bogged down in Iraq, his authority undercut by the November elections, any chance to show progress in peacefully disarming a country that detonated a nuclear test just four months ago could no longer be passed up."

The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Fang, Osnos, 617K) calls the deal "a rare foreign policy victory at a time when the US faces severe difficulties in Iraq and elsewhere." The AP (2/14, Hutzler) says negotiations now give way "to a more arduous phase: making sure the communist country keeps its promises. Secretive, belligerent and with a reputation for skirting past deals, North Korea makes a rough prospect for arms control inspectors, experts said."

McClatchy (2/14, Strobel) says the deal "blossomed from the sort of diplomatic give-and-take with an adversary that the White House had rejected until recently." Two senior State Department officials said the deal "reflected, in part, Rice's desire for a visible foreign-policy victory to offset setbacks across the Middle East, from Iraq to Iran and Lebanon." It also reflects "a changed power balance within the Bush administration, with Rice at the forefront and Vice President Dick Cheney's influence diminished, at least on this issue and for now."

Deal Seen As Signaling China's Growing Stature In World Stage. Calling it a "sweeping and potentially historic deal," the Financial Times (2/14, A1, Fifield, Dombey) says the accord "cemented China's emergence as a significant power-broker on the world stage" for its "crucial role" in brokering the deal.

Bolton Says Deal Sends "Bad Signal." NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 3, 2:10, Mullen, 9.87M) showed former UN Ambassador John Bolton warning, "I am afraid North Korea has won. Once again they have made a hollow promise and they are going to get tangible economic benefits as a consequence of it."

The Washington Times (2/14, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports in a front page article that Bolton criticized the deal for "making too many concessions" and "gives up key US leverage that blocked illicit financial activities by Pyongyang in the past." In an interview, Bolton said, "It's a bad signal to North Korea and it's a bad signal to Iran" that "if you hold out long enough and wear down the State Department negotiators, eventually you get rewarded."

Berlin Meeting "Critical" In Reaching Final Accord. The New York Times (2/14, Yardley, 1.16M) says talks late last month between Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and North Korean negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, in Berlin were "critical in resuscitating the talks and in shaping the agreement reached Tuesday in Beijing," according to a senior United States official familiar with the American negotiating team.

More Commentary. George Perkovich, director of the nonproliferation program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M), "If the current deal keeps North Korea from producing more bomb material and conducting more nuclear tests, it will be a good thing. If further pay-offs can induce Pyongyang to reduce the stockpile and reassure us that security and control procedures minimize the risks that nuclear materials or bombs could be transferred to terrorists, we should haggle over the price." Therefore, he urges Republicans and Democrats to "urge extending the six-party negotiating forum into a broader exploration of steps to prevent instability in Northeast Asia" and turn "this modest nuclear deal" into "the start of something bigger."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M) says the deal "strikes us as something close to faith-based nonproliferation." Calling the deal ""marginally better" than the 1994 Agreed Framework reached by the Clinton Administration, the Journal says, "Perhaps Mr. Bush feels this is the best he can do in the waning days of his Administration. Or perhaps, in the most favorable interpretation, he wants to clear the decks of this issue in order to have more political capital to control Iran's nuclear ambitions. Iran may look at this deal, however, and conclude it has little to lose by raising the nuclear stakes. We'd like to believe this will turn out better, but history doesn't support such faith."

The New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is welcome news that North Korea has agreed to move toward dismantling its nuclear weapons program," but "there are a lot of other dangers out there. And we hope that Mr. Bush learns the most basic lesson of this week's deal: sometimes you really do have to talk to your enemies, even if you have to grit your teeth."

On its editorial page, the Washington Post (2/14, A18, 690K) writes, "Along with many experts on North Korea, we're skeptical that Mr. Kim would choose to give up nuclear weapons unless he were convinced that the survival of his regime depended on it." Trying to "push Mr. Kim into a permanent shutdown of plutonium production over the next year is certainly worthwhile," the Post continues, but "yesterday's announcement was a start, but as the football-loving Ms. Rice said, 'This is still the first quarter.'"

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/14, 850K) call the deal "score one small point for pragmatism and global sanity." The Times, however, concedes that it is a "very tentative one-page agreement" that "could well collapse within its first 60 days." Conservatives, "predictably, are hollering betrayal," but there are "right," say the Times, "President Bush has changed course." However, "The tactical shift doesn't mean that the US has abandoned its principles; the White House still needs to be prepared to abort this deal if it ultimately proves as hollow as previous accords."

Israeli, Palestinian Officials Differ On Agenda Ahead Of Summit. The AP (2/14, Federman) reports Israeli and Palestinian officials said Tuesday they have "vastly different agendas" for next week's meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "raising serious doubt about the summit's prospects." For their part, the Palestinians "want to jump to talks on a final peace agreement at the Feb. 19 meeting," while Israel said it "will not discuss 'substantial issues' until it learns more about Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' power-sharing agreement with the Hamas militant group."

Jordan, Russia Call For Mideast Accord. The AP (2/14, Halaby, Gavlak) reports Jordan's King Abdullah II and Russian President Vladimir Putin Tuesday called for "a stronger international push for lasting Mideast peace and urged for a diplomatic solution to Iran's nuclear standoff." King Abdullah said he and Putin "agreed that negotiations for the establishment of a viable Palestinian state should be accelerated," calling the Palestinian-Israeli conflict the "core conflict" in the Middle East.

Abbas Still Faces Troubles Forming Unity Government. The Washington Times (2/14, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "As Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas seeks international support for a Hamas-Fatah power-sharing agreement, Palestinian observers warn that formidable obstacles remain, including who will control the security forces." The agreement reached last week in Mecca "lays out principles for cooperation, but implementation still must be worked out." According to the Times, the "most sensitive problem will be overhauling the Palestinian security forces to incorporate thousands of members of a controversial Hamas unit, and the appointment of an interior minister to oversee the job."

Bombings Kills 3 In Lebanon Ahead Of Hariri Anniversary. The New York Times (2/14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "A day before Lebanon prepared to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of its former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, three people were killed and about 23 others wounded when two minibuses were bombed." In a country "so fragile and on edge because of its internal political struggles," the bombings "managed to heighten tensions" in the "first such attack…since the end of Lebanon's 15-year civil war in 1990."

The Washington Post (2/14, A11, Shadid, 690K) reports "in past days, speculation has risen that a deal is possible" between Lebanese factions "with Iranian and Saudi Arabian blessing. But in a visit Monday to Syria, Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa said 'complications' remained. Rumors swirled Tuesday over whose aims the bombings would serve, and some suggested that foreign powers opposed to a deal might have played a role."

American Charged With Aiding Islamic Militants In Somalia. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, A15) reports a former Houston resident "has been charged in Texas with teaming with al-Qaeda" in Somalia. Daniel Joseph Maldonado, also known as Daniel Aljughaifi, "was ordered held without bail Tuesday on federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device." Arrested in Kenya last month, Maldonado is "the first American to be prosecuted on suspicion of joining terrorists in Somalia," Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein said in a statement.

Paulson Outlines Plans For Economic "Dialogue" For China. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A2, Phillips, 2.04M) reports Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, "under pressure from impatient China-bashers on Capitol Hill, unveiled specific areas where he hopes the Bush administration's economic dialogue with Beijing will show concrete results in the coming months." Paulson said he "is seeking quick action from Beijing in opening Chinese financial markets to foreign firms, employing cleaner Western environmental services and products, enforcing patent and copyright protections and creating domestic pension and health-care benefits that will let ordinary Chinese spend more on consumer goods." Paulson said, "We're going to start making progress [by May, when the next round of talks takes place in Washington]." The Journal adds Paulson's "comments came as he named a former drug-industry lobbyist and former deputy U.S. trade representative, Alan Holmer, to coordinate the strategic dialogue." Meantime, House lawmakers "said they plan to introduce legislation today that would make it easier for the U.S. to retaliate against China for its currency practices."

White House Drops Outreach To Chavez. McClatchy (2/14, Bachelet) reports the Bush Administration "has abandoned efforts to reach out to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, blaming Caracas for showing little interest in taking up U.S. overtures. But even as U.S. officials harden their criticism of Chavez, they say the doors are still open to dialogue." After Chavez "won a big re-election victory in December, Washington seemed to reach out to the feisty socialist leader who routinely lashes out at President Bush as the main cause of the world's ills." Now, "the tough talk is back. In recent weeks, U.S. officials have stepped up their criticism of Chavez's latest moves, such as nationalizing the phone and electricity companies and securing a law so that he may pass legislation without congressional approval."

Putin Said To Be Exploiting Fallout From NATO Expansion. In his New York Times column (2/14), Thomas Friedman says, "Now that high oil and gas prices have made Russia powerful again — the gasman of Europe — Mr. Putin is shoving Russia's resurgent pride right back in our face. In effect, he is saying to America: 'Oh, you talkin' to me? You thought you could tell me that the cold war was over and that NATO expansion was not directed at Russia — but we couldn't be members anyway. Did you really think we were going to believe that? Well, now I'm talkin' to you. Get out of my face.'" Friedman adds, "I'm not here to defend an iron-fisted autocrat like Mr. Putin. But history is prologue. The fact is, we helped to create a mood in Russia hospitable to a conservative cold warrior like Mr. Putin by forcing NATO on a liberal democrat like Mr. Yeltsin. It was a bad decision and one that keeps on giving. Just when we need to be getting Russia's help, we're getting its revenge."

In his Washington Post column (2/14, A19), David Ignatius says, "Putin's comments" in his Munich speech "may be jarring to Americans, but they express a bitterness that's widespread here. His generation of Russians grew up in a country that claimed the status of 'superpower,' and they don't like being taken for granted. Putin, a former KGB officer with a black belt in judo, has been pugnacious in standing up for his country's interests, and Russians seem to like that. In the latest opinion polls, his popularity is well above 70 percent." Russia is "back. That's the real lesson I take from Putin's blunt comments. A country that was near collapse after the fall of Soviet communism has regained enough confidence and stability to take a verbal shot at its old rival."

Bodman Warns Against Possibility Of Gas Cartel. In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (2/14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says the U.S. should continue to develop the infrastructure to import and use liquefied natural gas and warns against the possibility that producing countries could form a cartel to control the price of natural gas. In a speech prepared for delivery Wednesday at an energy conference in Houston, Bodman said that 'initiatives, new or old, which seek to control the flow of energy supplies to the market' and set prices "are contrary to the long term interests of both producers and consumers.'" Bodman "didn't mention any countries, but it just so happens that his remarks coincide with Russian President Vladimir Putin's visit to the Middle East, where he is talking up an international natural gas cartel."

UN Secretary General Faces Backlash For Improving Ties With US. The Washington Post (2/14, A14, Lynch, 690K) reports when UN Secretary General Ban Ki Moon "paid his first official visit to Washington last month, he received the White House version of a seal of approval: a presidential pat on the back and an invitation to phone President Bush whenever he needs help in responding to an international crisis." Ban's "warm reception appeared to signal an end to an era of U.S. confrontation with the United Nations that was marked by quarrels over the Iraq war, Republican-led corruption hearings on Capitol Hill and relentless threats of funding cuts." But "such a turn of fortune in Washington comes at a price: Ban is facing a diplomatic backlash from developing nations, which suspect the former South Korean foreign minister of seeking to reshape the United Nations to accommodate U.S. interests and the desires of other wealthy member nations. They have stonewalled his early attempt to reorganize the U.N. bureaucracy." The standoff "has weakened Ban barely a month into the job, as he faces one of the top challenges confronting every U.N. leader: how to strike a balance between the organization's most powerful member and an influential bloc of developing countries that instinctively resist policies that appear to track with U.S. interests."

Graham Says Sudanese President Deserves Some Credit. The Washington Post (2/14, A15, McCrummen, 690K) reports the "first time that Omar Hassan al-Bashir, the Muslim president of Sudan, met Franklin Graham, the prominent evangelical Christian, the conversation came to a kind of standoff." Graham, who "has called Islam an 'evil and wicked' religion, told Bashir in the 2003 meeting that he wanted to persuade him to become a Christian. Bashir, at the time fighting a civil war in the southern region of the country, told Graham that he wanted to make him a Muslim, Graham recalled." In a meeting "between the two men here Monday night, the semi-serious proselytizing continued. This time, though, Graham said he came away thinking that Bashir, who now stands accused of presiding over the killing of at least 200,000 people in the Darfur region in the country's west, deserves credit for signing the peace agreement with rebels in the south in 2005." Although human rights activists "and some U.S. officials are counseling tougher measures against Bashir's government to end the violence in Darfur -- and to more fully implement a faltering peace agreement with the south -- Graham said that a softer approach is needed." Graham said, "I'm not a politician, but I think our government does need to recognize some steps he's taken and reward this government in some way to show them we appreciate what they have done [regarding southern Sudan]."

Padilla Claims He Is Too Traumatized For Trial. USA Today (2/14, Parker) reports, "The prisoner lived in isolation in a cell with only a steel slab for a bed. At times chained to the floor, he was deprived of light, sleep, a clock and heat. His interrogators injected him with 'truth serum' drugs to try to loosen his tongue and threatened him with execution. … That's how Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen held without charge as an 'enemy combatant,' was treated for three years and eight months at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., his attorneys allege. In court papers, they say Padilla — initially accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive 'dirty bomb' — was treated so severely that it amounted to torture and rendered him mentally incompetent to now stand trial on terrorism charges that could bring him life in prison." USA adds, "That provocative claim — disputed by the government, which says Padilla was not abused and is fit for trial — will be the focus of a mental competency hearing for Padilla, scheduled for Feb. 22 in a federal court in Miami. … The long-shot effort to have him declared unfit for trial is the latest turn in a case that has become a test of how far the U.S. government can go in limiting the civil liberties of an American in the name of national security. … It pits Padilla — the first American since the Civil War to be held by the military solely on the president's orders — against a government that, under persistent legal challenges, has taken the case on an unusual journey from military detention to the U.S. Supreme Court and then to a federal trial court." USA n otes, "Government lawyers decline to give details about how Padilla has been treated, but they flatly dispute the defense's version. 'It has no merit whatsoever,' prosecutors say in papers filed in the court where Padilla is scheduled for trial April 16. He is charged with conspiring to support terrorism overseas as part of a North American terror cell. … The government has said that however it handled the Brooklyn-born Padilla, 36, its actions were necessary to try to learn more about terrorism."

US Man Charged With Plotting Al Qaeda Overthrow In Somalia. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Stinebaker) reports, "A former Houston man arrested in Kenya last month has been charged in Texas with teaming with al-Qaida to overthrow the Somali government and form an Islamic state there. Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, was ordered held without bail Tuesday on federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device." The AP notes, "Maldonado's arrest marks the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining terrorists in Somalia, Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein said in a statement. … Maldonado told FBI agents in Kenya that he went to Somalia to fight 'jihad,' or holy war, for a true Islamic government, according to the complaint."

Fox News (2/13) reported on its Web site, "The investigation included elements of the Joint Terrorism Task Force and the Houston Police Department." Fox added, "Joseph Billy, Assistant Director of the FBI Counterterrorism Division, said, 'The FBI is working closely with our law enforcement and intelligence community partners in this country and around the world to bring all necessary resources to bear to protect Americans and its allies from terrorist attacks.'" TheHouston Chronicle (2/14, George, 530K) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Abran 'Abe' Martinez, who leads the special prosecutions unit in the U.S. Attorney's Office, which includes anti-terrorism, said the investigation originated in Houston, but declined to talk about what brought Maldonado here."

The Boston Globe (2/14, Mishra, 413K) reports, "Spurred by radical Islamic beliefs," the "Massachusetts native…journeyed from the streets of Boston to the frenzied civil war in Somalia, where he allegedly conspired with Al Qaeda militants to establish a fundamentalist regime, only to end up in the custody of FBI agents when his insurgent efforts unraveled, according to court papers released yesterday. … A conviction could mean life in prison."

AFP (2/14) reports, "Maldonado, 28, is accused of leaving his Houston, Texas home in 2005 'in search of a country where he could practice true Islam,' according to FBI documents. … A year later, he joined the Islamic Courts Union and elements of Al Qaeda to fight for the establishment of an independent Islamic state in Somalia, the criminal complaint alleged." AFP adds, "During the course of his training, the complaint added, Maldonado spoke about his willingness to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded, and also observed how bombs were made and tested with the group's bomb-maker. … He was captured by the Kenyan military on January 21 as he fled to avoid Ethiopian and Somalian forces. At the weekend, he was handed over to US authorities and escorted back to Houston. … 'This case represents the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining forces with Islamic extremist fighters in Somalia,' said Kenneth Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's National Security Division. … 'The prosecution of Mr. Maldonado demonstrates the scope of our laws and serves as a warning to others who would travel overseas to wage violent jihad.'"

Democratic Bill Would Restore Habeas Corpus For Detainees. The Washington Post (2/14, A8, White, 690K) reports a group "of Senate Democrats introduced legislation yesterday that would restore habeas corpus rights to all detainees in U.S. custody and would narrowly define what it means to be an 'enemy combatant' against the United States, a measure designed to challenge laws ushered in by the Republican-controlled Congress last year." The bill, "titled the 'Restoring the Constitution Act of 2007,' strikes at the core of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 by giving detainees access to U.S. courts. It was introduced by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination." The bill "would also prevent the executive branch from making blanket determinations about who is an enemy combatant and would restrict the president's authority to interpret when certain human rights standards apply to detainees. The legislation would limit the label 'enemy combatant' to a person 'who directly participates in hostilities in a zone of active combat against the United States' or who took part in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001."

Panel Recommends London Police Apologize For Mistaken Raid. The Washington Post (2/14, A15, Jordan, 690K) reports the Independent Police Complaints Commission says "London police should publicly apologize to two Muslim families caught up in a mistaken anti-terrorist raid in which a man was shot." The panel was "investigating the dramatic dawn raid of two homes in East London last June by about 250 officers, some in chemical protective suits. Police officials later said they believed that 'a highly dangerous explosive device that could be set off remotely' was being made there." Two men, "Mohammed Abdul Kahar, 23, and his brother Abul Koyair, 20, were arrested, and Abdul Kahar was accidentally shot in the shoulder during the scuffle. A week later, after an extensive search of the houses, both men were released without charge." Although it "admonished the police for some of their procedures, the panel did not recommend disciplinary action in connection with the raid, which soured relations between police and many Muslims."

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Launches New System For Monitoring FISA Wiretap Applications. Government Computer News (2/13, Dizard) reported, "The FBI has launched an application that monitors the preparation of requests for secret wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by using several levels of classification, ranked by the security level of the user. … An FBI special agent recently recounted the state of affairs regarding executive branch requests to the FISC for national-security wiretaps when FBI director Robert Mueller took office in August 2001. 'The director asked how many [FISA requests] were pending,' the FBI official said. 'The answer was, "The FBI didn't know." He asked, "How long does it take to approve one?" We didn't know. He asked, "What's the holdup [main delaying factor]?" We didn't know.'" GCN added, "When Mueller joined the FBI, officials transmitted FISA requests among agencies by sneakernet," and "the FBI official said, 'To give you an idea of their idea of connectivity, it was called Oasis [and wasn't connected to anything].' … Automating the system speeded the approval process from 120 days to 60 days, the official said. It also provides an audit trail of system activity, generates reminders about pending requests and has room to grow, the official said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Islamic Jihad Threatens Attacks On Americans If Shallah Harmed. In a story focusing on the Palestinian and Israeli disagreement over next week's summit with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's, the AP (2/14, Laub) reports, "In other developments Tuesday, senior members of the violent Islamic Jihad group warned in Gaza City that American citizens could be in danger if any harm comes to their leader, Ramadan Shallah. The vague threats were made after Washington offered up to $5 million for his capture."

Judge Orders Deportation Of Rhode Island Trucking School Student. The Providence Journal (2/14, Mooney, 167K) reports, "A federal judge yesterday ordered an Indian national whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school spawned a nationwide antiterrorism investigation be deported. Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala 'is not the person who he claims to be,' said U.S. Immigration Judge Matthew J. D'Angelo." The Journal adds, "'While Mullawala's 'ultimate intentions and motives have not yet been revealed in full,' the judge said, 'this court reaches a finding that mirrors the grave concern expressed by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, The Rhode Island State Police and the Rhode Island Fusion Center' — which spearheads local homeland security matters." Mullawala "remain in the custody of Homeland Security officials while officials there continue investigating his alleged suspicious behavior."

Appeals Court Upholds Freezing Of US Islamic Charity's Assets. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Hananel) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld the government's decision to freeze the assets of a Missouri-based Islamic charity with alleged links to a foreign group that supports terrorism. The Treasury Department claims the Islamic American Relief Agency-USA, of Columbia, Mo., is an affiliate of a Sudanese charity…accused of financing al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations." The AP notes, In 2004, federal agents raided the group's headquarters in Columbia, Mo., as part of a criminal investigation. No criminal charges have been filed against the charity or its employees. While the court found the unclassified evidence was 'not overwhelming,' the three-judge panel noted that its review of national security cases is 'extremely deferential' to the government." The Kansas City Star (2/14, Morris, 271K) also notes, "The FBI raided the group's office on Oct. 13, 2004, the same day Treasury agents labeled the group a terrorist supporter and froze its assets."

US Malls Seen As New Emerging Front In Terror War. Long Island Newsday (2/14, Eisenberg) reports, "The mall security guard scrutinizes the black backpack lying by the garbage bin. Should he open it? Ignore it? Call police? … In a world increasingly vulnerable to terrorism and random acts of violence like the rampage in a Salt Lake City mall Monday, security experts say that low-paid private security worker may be the front line of protection in one of the nation's most heavily trafficked places. And they question the adequacy of his training -- or of the malls' security measures -- to detect or deter an attack. … 'For suburban America, the mall is the gathering place,' said Mitchell Moss of New York University's Center for Catastrophe Preparedness and Response. 'It's much more than just a place to shop. It's where huge numbers of people gather to go to the movies, eat and socialize -- therefore, making it a potential terror target.'" Newsday continues, "Roosevelt Field, the state's largest mall, may draw as many as 100,000 people a day at holiday peak -- one reason Nassau police conducted a training exercise there a year after 9/11, based on the scenario of a plane crashing into the mall's food court. … The Department of Homeland Security has repeatedly warned that malls are potentially attractive targets for terrorists, although officials say there is no credible intelligence of imminent plots. … It cites al-Qaida training manuals that identify 'places of amusement' and 'vital economic centers' as targets and a pattern of such attacks worldwide. A Rand Corp. survey documented over 60 attacks since 1998 on shopping centers in places as diverse as Russia, Turkey and Israel." Newsday adds, "This country has seen only lone-wolf attacks -- one of the bloodiest Monday night when an 18-year-old Bosnian refugee opened fire on shoppers in a Salt Lake City mall, killing five and wounding four before being gunned down by an off-duty police officer. Police are still investigating his motive. .. .But such cases underscore how potentially vulnerable the nation's malls and shopping centers are to acts of violence, according to a recent Justice Department report, which found that while many malls have tightened security since September 2001, much more could be done. The report cited inadequate training for low-paid, high-turnover security workers, as well as insufficient drilling and coordination between mall security and first responders."

Chertoff Asks Senate Not To Delay Real ID Act, Pushes For Visa Waiver Changes. The Washington Times (2/14, Hudson, 88K) reports testifying Tuesday before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "defended the federalization of driver's licenses and asked a Senate panel not to block the Real ID law, but he urged members to make security changes in the visa waiver program. … 'We don't want to keep kicking the can down the road,'" said Chertoff, regarding proposals to delay the Real ID Act's 2008 implementation deadline." Chertoff "also said the Senate should legislate changes in the visa waiver program to secure international flights and ensure foreign visitors are not terrorist threats or do not overstay. 'We are not going to sacrifice security for the sake of facilitating travel among our allies,' Mr. Chertoff said."

Chertoff Says He "Will Not Apologize For Protecting Americans." Secretary Chertoff appeared on Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (2/13, 8:20 pm, O'Reilly), where he was asked about Guantanamo Bay and the negative reaction that some have to the holding of prisoners there. "Because the hatred directed at you and the Bush administration for your policies of no more catch and release for illegals, and you know to keep these people in Guantanamo Bay until we fully vet them, not let them just out, the hatred direct toed you is staggering." Chertoff: "Well let me say this: I will not apologize for protecting Americans. I'm not going to apologize for putting as first priority keeping Americans safe. I don't think the administration will. Obviously we want to be humane and fair, but job one is keeping Americans safe from harm."

NYTimes Urges Chertoff Not To Appeal Dismissal Of LA 8 Case. Under the headline "A Shameful Prosecution," the New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) editorializes, "An immigration court judge's dismissal of 20-year-old deportation proceedings against two Palestinian men — and his criticism of the government's abusive conduct in the case — ought to prick the conscience of the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff. Rather than reflexively pursuing an appeal, Mr. Chertoff, a former federal judge, should see the wisdom of finally declaring an end to this sorry legal tale, which has become a big source of distrust in the Arab and Muslim community." The Times says the judge "fittingly denounced" the government's pursuit of the LA 8 case, calling it "'an embarrassment to the rule of law.' Mr. Chertoff has until Feb. 28 to file an appeal. The only decent thing to do is to drop the case."

Senate Bill Would Drop 100 Percent Screening For Shipping, Air Cargo. The AP (2/13, Lumpkin) reported Sens. Joe Lieberman and Susan Collins introduced "an anti-terrorism bill Tuesday that could spark future clashes with the House, proposing more homeland security money for smaller and rural states and dropping requirements for tougher cargo inspections." The Senate version of a bill implementing the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission "would drop House-passed provisions requiring that all containers on US-bound vessels be screened in foreign ports for radiation, and that all cargo loaded onto US airliners be screened for explosives. Both were strongly opposed by the Bush administration on grounds that they are too costly and require the use of technology that does not exist."

Report Urges More Investment To Develop Subway Bomb Detection Technology. USA Today (2/14, 1A, Frank, 2.27M) reports on its front page, "An ambitious test of machines for checking subway and rail passengers for bombs failed to find a technology that can reliably stop terrorists such as those who attacked trains in Madrid and London, according to a Homeland Security Department assessment." Each piece of "futuristic screening equipment" tested under the $7 million program "had significant problems," including "excessive false alarms," screenings that took too long, and one machine "'could not consistently locate the item that caused the alarm,' according to the report, which was not made public but was presented at a recent rail-security conference in Arlington, Va. The effort to screen rail passengers 'needs significant investment,' the assessment concludes. Democrats in Congress have recently pledged to boost spending on subway security systems by billions." In the face of "technological limitations,"

NFL Rejected Border Patrol Ad For Super Bowl Over Mention Of Terrorism, Illegals. The Washington Times (2/14, Dinan, Seper, 88K) reports, "The National Football League refused to run a recruitment ad for the US Border Patrol in last week's Super Bowl program, saying it was 'controversial' because it mentioned duties such as fighting terrorism and stopping drugs and illegal aliens at the border. … 'The borders, the immigration debate is a very controversial issue,'" said NFL spokesman Greg Aiello, "'and we were sensitive to any perception we were injecting ourselves into that.' The NFL's rejection didn't sit well with Border Patrol agents, who called it a snub of their role in homeland security and said it was 'more than a little puzzling.'"

Congress Concerned Contractors Given Too Much Control Over DHS Projects. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A16, Karp, 2.04M) reports issues with the Coast Guard's Deepwater modernization program, which has "given black eyes to Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. underscore broader concerns about the government's use of private contractors to oversee vital homeland security programs. Congress this week is scheduled to hold its third and fourth hearings in less than a month to review" the Coast Guard's "ambitious" effort, and legislators "are also scrutinizing SBInet, a Boeing Co.-led project to build a high-tech border surveillance system." The Journal adds that the concern among contractors "is that political pressure could prompt Homeland Security to revise contracts on less favorable terms. Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad Allen confirmed yesterday that the service will change the 'structure' and 'contractual relationship' with the Lockheed-Northrop joint venture, though details have yet to be worked out."

Allen Announces Management Overhaul At Coast Guard. The New York Times (2/14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports Admiral Thad Allen acknowledged that the US Coast Guard "has failed to keep up with changing times" as he "unveiled a plan Tuesday to restructure its management radically and expand its surveillance efforts along the nation's coasts." Though "intended to address mounting criticism" of Deepwater, the overhaul "is much broader, including revamping the way the Coast Guard manages its response to natural disasters and terrorist attacks, supervises its Atlantic and Pacific fleets, maintains its aircraft and ships and handles its payroll and financial systems." The Times adds that the plan outlined in Allen's speech "reflects changes that have already taken place at the service since 2001 when it assumed a broader antiterrorism mission and has had its budget grow by 50 percent, to $8.6 billion this year." The speech came "in advance of the release of another scathing report by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general on the Coast Guard's management of its ship procurement program."

WSJournal Praises Possible Sale Of Freedom Tower. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "The Freedom Tower at Ground Zero in Manhattan still isn't much to look at -- a handful of beams rising from the pit roughly to ground level. But this week has brought the welcome news that private-equity funds and other investors are asking if its owner might be willing to sell the building that is supposed to replace the fallen twin towers. The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey has also hired a broker to shop the still-unbuilt tower." A sale "is far from certain," but "the twin towers were underoccupied and underutilized for at least two decades after their construction. Letting private capital take on the risks of turning a profit on the new 2.6 million-square-foot, 1,776-foot tower would ensure that history does not repeat itself at taxpayer expense."

WAR NEWS:

For House Democrats, Anti-Surge Resolution Is First Step In "Slow-Bleed" Strategy. USA Today (2/14, 8A, Kiely, 2.27M) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said yesterday that the current non-binding resolution on Iraq before the House "was only the beginning of congressional steps to try to change Iraq war policy. 'A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation, which will be coming to the House floor,' she said." Pelosi offered no explanation of what that legislation might be, and media accounts in several major news outlets didn't delve into that area either. For example, NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 4, 2:15, Reid, 9.87M) reported "Democratic leaders say" the resolution "will be only the first step," and the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 5, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) said the measure "wouldn't force the President to change his strategy, but it could go a long way towards shaping Iraq policy in the future."

The Politico (2/14, Bresnahan) this morning offers an outline of the Democratic strategy beyond this week's House vote. "Top House Democrats," it reports, "working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to US involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options. Led by Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., and supported by several well-funded anti-war groups, the coalition's goal is to limit or sharply reduce the number of US troops available for the Iraq conflict, rather than to openly cut off funding for the war itself." The Politico adds, "The legislative strategy will be supplemented by a multimillion-dollar TV ad campaign designed to pressure vulnerable GOP incumbents into breaking with President Bush and forcing the administration to admit that the war is politically unsustainable." As "described by participants, the goal is crafted to circumvent the biggest political vulnerability of the anti-war movement -- the accusation that it is willing to abandon troops in the field. That fear is why many Democrats have remained timid in challenging Bush, even as public support for the president and his Iraq policies have plunged."

The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Weisman, 690K) interprets Pelosi's words as a warning about funding, reporting "both sides of the debate agreed that the real fight will come next month, when Democrats are to move to attach to a $100 billion war spending bill binding language that would limit future deployments to Iraq and begin to bring troops home." Another report that analyzes what the Democrats' future steps runs in the Los Angeles Times (2/14, A1, Levey, Gaoluette, 850K), under the headline "House debate: Prelude to a faceoff?" The Times says "many Democrats, including Iraq war veteran Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania, made clear that they wanted to follow the resolution vote with binding steps to force the Pentagon to begin withdrawing the more than 135,000 US forces now in Iraq." Republicans "have long tagged Democratic opposition to the war as an attack on the military. On Tuesday, Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) -- a Vietnam veteran who 34 years ago Monday was released after seven years in a North Vietnamese prisoner of war camp -- called the Democratic resolution a 'first step for them to cut funding for our troops in harm's way.'" And in another preview of that line of attack, Minority Leader John Boehner said yesterday, "We know what Al Qaeda thinks when America retreats from the battlefield. … They think we can't stomach a fight. This is why they haven't been afraid to strike us whenever they've had the opportunity." The Hill (2/14, Marre, Soraghan) runs a similar report under the headline "Pelosi: Iraq Resolution Is Just The Beginning,"

The New York Times (2/14, Zeleny, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "On its face, several Republicans conceded, the resolution was difficult to oppose. Two Republicans, John Shadegg of Arizona and Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, instructed their colleagues to make the debate about the fight against terrorism. 'If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose,' they wrote in a letter." That is why, says the Times, "many Republicans who spoke on Tuesday appeared to heed that message, framing the war as an important battleground in a global struggle against militant Islam." Democrats "sought to temper the tone of the debate, and the scope of the resolution, to avoid alienating all Republicans." The Washington Times (2/14, Ward, Hurt, 88K), meanwhile, says that "internal Republican memo that showed the minority party was…trying to avoid debating the specifics of the president's plan" was actually released by Democrats.

The AP (2/14, Davis), meanwhile, reports "many rank-and-file" Democrats, "particularly moderate newcomers who rode to Congress on a wave of public discontent about Iraq -- are wary of casting any vote that could be construed as ending funding for the mission."

ABC World News (2/13, story 2, 2:25, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Trying to seem strong on military issues, Democrats lined up veterans of Korea, Vietnam and Iraq as their first speakers in favor of the anti-surge resolution." Rep. Murphy: "Walking in my own combat boots, I saw firsthand this Administration's failed policy in Iraq." Rep. John Tanner: "The problem here is not the stomach of the troops. The problem is the competency of the civilian leadership that's gotten us into this mess." Democrats "expect at least a dozen Republicans to vote with them, including Maryland

Republican Wayne Gilchrest, a Vietnam veteran and former Iraq war supporter, who says troops killed and wounded from his district have influenced his vote."

The AP (2/14, Espo) reports Democratic leaders "said they expected no more than one or two members of their rank-and-file to oppose the resolution. Republicans said that despite quiet lobbying by the White House, they expected at least two dozen GOP lawmakers to swing behind the measure, suggesting that it would command the votes of at least 250 or 260 votes in the 435-member House." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "said he would attempt to pass an identical measure later this month." The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Madhani, 617K) says Reid "plans to call the House resolution for a vote in his chamber Feb. 27."

McClatchy (2/14, Talev) reports that although "the White House dispatched national security adviser Stephen Hadley to advise any lawmakers who wanted to listen," lawmakers "said neither Republican congressional leaders nor the White House was twisting arms." Likewise, under the headline "Bush Stays Out Of Fight, Opts For Lighter Fare," the Washington Post (2/14, A6, Baker, 690K) says, "While the House of Representatives debated weighty matters of war and peace yesterday, President Bush headed to the YMCA." He "visited children bending paperclips into different shapes and urged Americans to volunteer as mentors. He talked not of armies in Iraq but of "armies of compassion" at home. Even the kids seemed confused. One asked why he came. 'I came to see you,' the president responded." Bush "is publicly ignoring the" House "clash -- a display that is part strategy and part concession to reality." The Post adds, "By not engaging in the debate, Bush sends the signal that it does not matter to him what Congress says in a nonbinding resolution, hoping to minimize the impact of what the White House considers the inevitable outcome. And according to strategists in both parties, he has limited influence on Capitol Hill at this point, even among fellow Republicans."

Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported, "Many House Republicans said the debate was stacked against them. Late Monday House Democrats refused to allow debate on two GOP alternatives, one to forbid future moves to cut off Iraq war funds, the other to support the findings of the Iraq Study Group. … Denying Republicans a chance to vote on an Iraq alternative violates a promise made by Democrats just last week." Hoyer was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (2/13, Matthews) why the Democrats will not allow a vote on the GOP's alternative. Hoyer answered, "We believe that the American public deserves a clear answer to the president's proposal. … We decided that unlike the Senate, which got very confused, and in gridlock on the whereas and therefore classes, that we would put a very simple proposition on the floor. And that was essentially two premises. A, we support the troops and we'll protect the troops. B, we do not support the escalation…and don't think it will work. We want a very clear vote on that issue, unconfused by other propositions. There will be time, as I have said, in the very near future on the supplemental, on the defense appropriation bill and on the defense authorization bill, all of which are coming up in the near term to make those other views known, but on this debate, we wanted a very clear question asked and a very clear answer given."

Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (2/14, A2, Milbank, 690K), says, "A dazzling debate it wasn't. At the start, there were 75 members of Congress on the floor." By the time Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida, "the man in charge of Republican strategy in this week's great debate on Iraq," spoke, "about half an hour later, the number was down to 36; before long, the chamber returned to its usual, depopulated state." The Washington Post (2/14, A6, 690K) also runs several quotes from lawmakers participating in the debate, including Pelosi and Reps. Ike Skelton, Patrick J. Murphy and Peter Hoekstra."

Pelosi Quote Gets Widespread Local TV Coverage. Last night, there was heavy local TV coverage of the House debate across the nation. A significant number of reports showed footage of Pelosi saying, "No more blank checks for President Bush on Iraq. Our taxpayer dollars must go to protect our troops." Many of the reports showing the Speaker's quote also ran a clip of Minority Leader Boehner saying, "We are fighting to preserve and defend our sacred way of life." Among the stations following that pattern, quoting Pelosi and then a Republican representative who support the surge plan, were KCOY-TV Santa Barbara (2/13, 11:11 pm), WDRB-TV Louisville (2/13, 10:36 pm), WPXT-TV Portland, ME (2/13, 10:13 pm), KIII-TV Corpus Christi (2/13, 10:03 pm), KSPR-TV Springfield, MO (2/13, 10:01 pm), WRC-TV Washington, DC (2/13, 6:16 pm), and WWAY-TV Wilmington, NC (2/13, 5:18 pm).

Pence Urges Support For Surge. In a Washington Times (2/14, 88K) op-ed, Rep. Mike Pence (R-IN) writes, "I support the president's call for reinforcements and a change of our strategy because we must do everything in our power to see freedom prevail in Iraq. ... The temptation to retreat must be ignored."

In Interviews, US Soldiers In Iraq Express Anger At Democrats. ABC World News (2/13, story 2, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that it asked Army sergeants "in Ramadi what they thought of the resolution." First Sgt. Louis Barnum, US Army: "Makes me sick. I was born and raised a Democrat. When I see that, it makes me sad." Sgt. Brian Orechowski, US Army: "I don't want to bad mouth the President at all. To me, it is treason."

State Lawmakers Denounce Surge. The Washington Post's (2/14, 690K) Maryland Notebook column reports, "As Congress debates…Bush's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq, Democrats in the Maryland legislature are weighing in with a resounding no. A one-page letter signed by 83 lawmakers and sent yesterday to the delegation on Capitol Hill starts: 'The people of Maryland have not been shielded from the horrors taking place in Iraq.' ... State legislatures don't traditionally dip their toes into matters of foreign policy. But on the Iraq war, the General Assembly has a lot of company: Twelve other states, including California, Illinois, New Jersey and New Mexico, have gone even further this year, approving formal resolutions of opposition." On a similar vein, the Los Angeles Times (2/14, Slladay, 850K) this morning runs a story titled "Calif. Senate OKs resolution against Iraq."

Iraqi Government Closes Border Crossings To Iran And Syria. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported that the Iraqi government "said today that it will close its border crossings to Iran and Syria for three days as part of its new security plan for Baghdad. The closing is aimed to deter terrorists from both nations from crossing into Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Daragahi, 850K) reports Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, "the former naval officer appointed by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to oversee the much-vaunted Baghdad security plan, announced a 72-hour closure of some border crossings along the Iranian and Syrian frontiers, restrictions on civil liberties, and the suspension of all weapons licenses except for those issued to authorized security officials and contractors. 'Legal procedures will be taken and strict penalties will be imposed against all those who violate the rules,' Qanbar said, reading from a lengthy statement broadcast over state television." The Post adds, "It was unclear how some of the security provisions differed from measures already in place. Observers also questioned why Maliki left the announcement to a surrogate."

The New York Times (2/14, Santora, 1.16M) reports Qanbar "did not mention the role American forces would play in the crackdown, but his remarks were clearly timed to coincide with more aggressive efforts by American troops on the streets of Baghdad. The Americans have been establishing outposts — called joint security stations — to work alongside the Iraqi Army and police to end the sectarian bloodletting." The Times adds, "On Tuesday, senior American officers expressed surprise about the plan to resettle people who had moved from their homes amid sectarian cleansing. But they declined to be identified, saying they did not want to contradict the Iraqi general." Qanbar "indicated that the plan would be carried out evenly across Baghdad. But critics said…Maliki, who has come under intense criticism for pursuing a sectarian Shiite agenda, might be trying to appease his detractors and may not actually carry out the plan. Some feared that his government might not apply the same pressure to residents of Shiite areas." The Washington Times/AP (2/14, Abdul-Zahra) and Washington Post (2/14, A12, Ernesto Londo, 690K) run similar reports.

Iraqi Troops Appear To Meet Bush Plan's Demands. The Washington Times (2/14, Hess, 88K) reports, "Iraqi troops have passed a key test by showing up at 70 percent strength or better for President Bush's 'surge' in Baghdad, a senior US general said." Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, "commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq," said in an interview, "This movement of these three brigades and two separate battalions into Baghdad to our way of looking at it has gone very well. … We've also learned more lessons from this one, and in future deployments, we'll make it even better." Gen. Dempsey "said three brigades had shown up with between 70 percent and 75 percent of their soldiers. While a Kurdish unit from Sulaimaniyah and Kirkuk arrived with only 56 percent of its expected troops, he said, other inbound units from the Kurdish north were expected to arrive with 70 percent of their troops or more."

Insurgents Take Over Locals' Homes. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Rifai, 850K) describes, in a first-hand account, by an Iraqi architect and interpreter for the Times, how his family home was taken over and "house-jacked" by area insurgents. With his family away to escape the area's violence, little could stop insurgents from occupying the home when the area is filled with chaos- leaving little recourse for locals whose houses have been seized by insurgents and little or no policing by corrupt local authorities.

Al Sadr Flees Iraq For Iran Ahead Of Security Plan. ABC World News (2/13, lead story, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Iraiq Shiite militia leader Muqtada al Sadr "has left Iraq and gone to Iran." ABC (Raddatz) added, "He left two or three weeks ago, senior military officials tell ABC, headed straight for Tehran." His departure "coincides with the announced [US troop] surge into Baghdad." The New York Times (2/14, Mazzetti, 1.16M) says Al Sadr fled in order to "avoid being captured or killed during the crackdown. But officials also said that Mr. Sadr, who has family in Iran, had gone to Tehran in the past and that it was unclear why he had chosen to leave Iraq at this time."

USA Today (2/14, 8A, Jackson, 2.27M) notes Al-Sadr "has strong family ties in Iran," and it "was unknown whether he was on a personal visit or on business there rather than seeking a safe haven, as suggested by the Bush officials."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/14, Abdul-Zahra) reports early Wednesday that "officials linked to Muqtada al-Sadr denied Wednesday that the radical Shiite cleric had fled to Iran ahead of a security crackdown in Baghdad."

Iraq To Close Borders With Syria, Iran. The Washington Post (2/14, A12, Ernesto Londono, 690K) reports Iraqi officials Tuesday announced "the temporary closure of checkpoints at the Syrian and Iranian borders, as well as an expanded nighttime curfew in the capital, as part of the new Baghdad security plan." In a televised address, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, who is in charge of the security plan, "said the border will be closed for 72 hours, but he did not specify when."

Administration Struggles To Defend Iran Claims. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 7, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are serious new questions tonight about the Pentagon's accusation that Iran is supplying deadly explosive device targeting US troops in Iraq. The latest questions are from a surprising source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Those surprising questions about the Pentagon's case against Iran come from America's top military commander, Joint Chief's Chairman Peter Pace." Although the White House today "stuck by its claims," some Pentagon officials "say the military briefers in Baghdad went too far in blaming Iran's government."

The AP (2/14, Jelinek) reports the Bush administration "struggled Tuesday to explain what it knows about alleged Iranian interference in Iraq after the Pentagon's top general appeared to contradict a recently released military dossier on the subject." The claims of Tehran's involvement "had already drawn skeptical responses from some lawmakers and other critics still wary of an administration that based the invasion of Iraq on faulty intelligence." But those doubts "increased Tuesday after Pace said the link between the bomb materials and the government had not been definitively proven." Defense experts "said Pace's comments -- and the way the dossier had been presented to reporters anonymously -- cast doubt on how solid the administration case is against Iran."

The New York Times (2/14, A14, Mazzetti, Gordon, 1.16M) says White House spokesman Tony Snow "tried to paper over the apparent disagreement on Tuesday," by disclosing "that he had called General Pace on the matter and that he and the general were 'on the same page' with regard to Iran's role in the roadside bomb attacks in Iraq."

But the Financial Times (2/14, Sevastopulo, Aglionby) says Gen. Pace's comments "appear at odds with the White House, which on Monday repeated the line that the Iranian government was involved." The Times notes that "while some parts of the Bush administration have been raising the rhetorical pressure on Iran, others appear to be toning down the war of words."

Pentagon Denies Politics Behind Claims. USA Today (2/14, 9A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports the US military said Tuesday that its decision to go public with allegations that Iran is providing militants in Iraq with weapons "was not politically motivated or orchestrated by the White House." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the US command's top spokesman, "said the decision to air the allegations against Iran on Sunday was made by the US military and stemmed from concerns that Iran has been supplying militias with a deadly type of roadside bomb that could pierce thick armor."

Diplomacy Seen As Aim Behind Claims. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Grier, 59K) reports, "The US may be trying to achieve a difficult balance regarding Iran: pushing the Iranians hard enough so they will negotiate over their nuclear program, yet not so hard as to increase tensions in a part of the world that's already aflame. That's the conclusion some experts draw from the recent US attempt to lay out evidence that officials say links Iran to attacks against US troops in Iraq." The White House had said for weeks that it would "present proof that Tehran is meddling in Iraq by providing arms and training to Shiite militias. Yet when the presentation came, it was somewhat low-key. It took place in Baghdad, not Washington. It focused almost entirely on a type of dangerous roadside bomb that Iran is allegedly supplying to its Iraqi allies."

Memo Says Iranian Leaders Backed Talks With US In 2003. The Washington Post (2/14, A14, Kessler, 690K) reports the Swiss ambassador to Iran "informed US officials in 2003 that an Iranian proposal for comprehensive talks with the United States had been reviewed and approved by Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei; then-President Mohammad Khatami; and then-Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi," according to a copy of the cover letter to the Iranian document. Ambassador Tim Guldimann wrote in a letter that was faxed to the State Department o may 4, 2003, "I got the clear impression that there is a strong will of the regime to tackle the problem with the US now and to try it with this initiative." Guldimann "attached a one-page Iranian document labeled 'Roadmap' that listed US and Iranian aims for potential negotiations, putting on the table such issues as an end to Iran's support for anti-Israeli militants, action against terrorist groups on Iranian soil and acceptance of Israel's right to exist." The Post notes that of State Rice "was questioned about the document on Capitol Hill last week," but told congressmen "she did not recall seeing it when she was national security adviser."

Ahmadinejad Seen As Toning Down Anti-Israeli Rhetoric. The AP (2/14) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "toning down verbal attacks on Israel," said in an interview that Tuesday with ABC's "Good Morning America," that Palestinians "should be allowed to determine a resolution to the conflict with the Jewish state." Asked if he stuck by his past calls for Israel to be "wiped off the face of the map," Ahmadinejad "stopped short of addressing whether Iran would recognize Israel but said any decision the Palestinians make should be respected."

Feith Defends 2003 Intelligence Project. In a Washington Post (2/14, 690K) op-ed, former Undersecretary of Defense Feith writes, "Promoters of the 'Bush Lied, People Died' line claim that the recent Pentagon inspector general's report concerning my former office's work on Iraq intelligence supports their cause. ... In his report, [Thomas] Gimble wrote that the Pentagon briefing was not the 'most accurate analysis of intelligence.' This has been taken to suggest it was false or deceptive. But the IG said he meant only that the briefing was at 'variance with the consensus of the Intelligence Community.' Of course it was at variance! It was a critique. ... Gimble's characterization is absurdly circular. Cheered on by the chairmen of the Senate intelligence and armed services committees, he is giving bad advice based on incomplete fact-finding and poor logic." Feith adds, "Intelligence is inherently sketchy and speculative -- and historically often wrong. It is improved when policy officials freely probe and challenge it."

Zawahiri Says Bush Lost Bet On Iraq. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, A12) reports, "Al-Qaeda's deputy leader said President Bush was an alcoholic and a lying gambler who wagered on Iraq and lost, according to a new audiotape released Tuesday by a U.S. group that tracks extremist messages." In the tape, Ayman al Zawahiri says, "Bush suffers from an addictive personality and was an alcoholic. I don't know his present condition...but the one who examines his personality finds that he is addicted to two other faults -- lying and gambling."

New Plan Launched To Bring More Iraqi Refugees To US. The New York Times (2/14, A16, Swarns, Zoepf, 1.16M) reports the Bush administration and the United Nations have developed a plan "that would bring several thousand of them to the United States over the next 10 months," officials familiar with discussions of the plan say. Under the plan, which is expected to be formally unveiled this week, the United Nations "began its first large-scale screening this month of Iraqis who have fled to Syria and Jordan since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. It hopes to register 135,000 to 200,000 of them to determine which Iraqis have fled persecution at home and would be eligible for refugee status." For its part, the US "hopes to resettle at least 5,000 of that group this year, with the first arriving in late spring or summer." On Wednesday, Secretary Rice is expected to meet with António Guterres, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, to discuss the Iraqi refugee crisis. Meanwhile, Guterres and Under Secretary Paula J. Dobriansky "are expected to outline the refugee plan this week at a news conference."

Pakistan Expected To Oust 2.4 Million Afghan Refugees. The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Montero, 59K) reports that "as Robert Gates, in his first visit to Pakistan as US secretary of Defense, met with President Musharraf in Islamabad this week to discuss the Taliban's expected spring offensive in Afghanistan;" Pakistan's expected attempt to expel 2.4 million Afghanis will, according to analysts, only shift "the world's largest refugee community across borders would only serve to raise tensions." Pakistan is making an effort to contain the Taliban by sending "2.4 million Afghan refugees, most living in camps…home by 2009" due to fears of "cross-border militancy" displayed by the Taliban forces. "Many disagree, however, saying Pakistan's Afghan refugees, most of whom are Pashtun and share the same tribal ethnicity as the Taliban movement, are only being made a scapegoat."

Iraq Seen As Overshadowing Dire Issues In Afghanistan. The Politico (2/14, Grim) reports that "as the House spent most of its energy debating the resolution condemning President Bush's troop surge plan for Iraq, the House Armed Service Committee's hearing on the war in Afghanistan drew only the weakest of spotlights." At the hearing, "the star witness was Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the outgoing commander of all NATO troops in Afghanistan," although the event drew little public or media interest, confusing many members of the committee, with one blaming snow for the small turn-out. After the hearing, "Gen. Eikenberry, lingering in the empty room, said he wasn't sure why the hearing had gotten so little attention. 'You'll have to ask your media colleagues why they're not here,' he mused.

The Washington Post (2/14, Tyson, A15, 690K) reports, "A senior U.S. military commander urged Pakistan yesterday to crack down on an entrenched network of senior Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders, training camps and recruiting grounds -- a sanctuary from which fighters have tripled cross-border attacks since September and are preparing an anticipated major spring offensive in southern and eastern Afghanistan. Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the outgoing top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, also warned that an even greater threat than the resurgent Taliban is the possibility that the government of President Hamid Karzai" could "suffer an irreversible loss of legitimacy among the Afghan population" as "the Pentagon is expected to announce soon that it will keep U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan at a minimum of 27,000 into 2008, extending a temporary increase…ordered last month."

Alleged Taliban Commander Promises Biggest Offensive Yet. AFP (2/14) reports, "A purported Taliban commander has said the militia is ready for its 'biggest ever' offensive in Afghanistan this year, while a boosted NATO-led force says it also plans significant operations. ... the year is shaping up to be as violent as 2006 -- the worst in the insurgency." "We have between 8,000 to 10,000 armed men," Mullah Abdul Rahim told AFP in a telephone interview. AFP notes, "His role in the Islamist militia and his claims could not be independently verified." On the other hand, "ISAF has meanwhile swollen to more than 35,000 troops, with the United States extending the tour of duty of about 3,500 soldiers for more than four months, and it is putting in place the first 'rapid reaction unit.'"

WSJournal Optimistic About Outcome Of Spring Clashes. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M) editorializes, "Expect more terrorism in Kabul, attacks on positions in and around the key Pashtun city of Kandahar, ambushes on vehicles and attacks on European and Canadian forces, which the Taliban consider, with good reason, to be the weak link in the NATO chain. Expect, too, for the Taliban to be decisively defeated. ... The combination of more troops and a keen appreciation of last year's mistakes puts the U.S. and Afghanistan in a better position than a year ago to repulse the Taliban's expected spring offensive."

With US Military Aid, Philippines Winning Battle Against Abu Sayyaf. USA Today (2/14, 10A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports, "Thousands of miles from the bazaars of Iraq and the mountains of Afghanistan, U.S. military forces are quietly helping defeat terrorists in the jungles of the southern Philippines, a forgotten front in the global war on terrorism." Working "behind the scenes with a rejuvenated Philippine military, U.S. special forces have helped kill, capture or rout hundreds of Abu Sayyaf guerrillas who have links to the Islamic terror groups Jemaah Islamiyah and al-Qaeda, Philippine and U.S. military commanders say." The Abu Sayyaf, "responsible for 16 years of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings in the southern Philippines, has been forced to flee into the mountainous terrain here on Jolo island in the remote Sulu Archipelago." But its "numbers are dwindling and its leadership almost wiped out, says Brig. Gen. Ruperto Pabustan, commander of Philippine special forces on Jolo." Backed "by U.S. intelligence, equipment and training, Philippine forces have killed or captured 200 of the 400 Abu Sayyaf fighters on Jolo since they began Operation Ultimatum last August, Pabustan says."

Algerian Bombings Linked To Al Qaeda-Allied Group. The New York Times (2/14, Smith, 1.16M) reports, "Seven bombs exploded almost simultaneously in Algeria yesterday, killing six people and wounding more than a dozen in the worst attack in months by North Africa's most active terrorist group, which says it has allied itself with Al Qaeda." The bombs, "including at least five powerful car or truck bombs, went off before dawn, pulverizing police stations in six towns in mountainous areas east of the capital, Algiers." A group "calling itself the Qaeda Organization in the Islamic Maghreb claimed responsibility for the attacks in a telephone call to the Morocco offices of the Arabic-language satellite broadcaster Al Jazeera. The name was recently adopted by the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has operated in Algeria since 1996."

Four Top Lam Aides Interviewed For Interim US Attorney Post. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/14, Thornton) reports, "With U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's departure imminent, the Justice Department has interviewed four of her top advisers for the position of interim chief while a committee searches for a long-term replacement." The Union-Tribune continues, "Among the short-term candidates interviewed within the last two weeks are Lam's second-in-command, Stephen Clark, her third-in-command, Karen Hewitt, plus Narcotics Chief Tim Coughlin and Appeals Chief Bruce Castetter. … All are career prosecutors hand-picked by Lam who have supported her priorities of prosecuting corruption and white-collar crimes rather than routine immigration cases, which, according to Justice Department officials, led to Lam's ouster." The Union-Tribune adds, "Lam was targeted for dismissal because of 'performance-related' issues after the Justice Department received complaints from members of Congress about her handling of immigration enforcement cases, said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. … Before statements, sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam, a political independent, was asked to step down because of declining prosecutions of gun, smuggling and drug cases. … Though initially staying mum, the Justice Department confirmed under pressure from lawmakers that it recently asked at least seven U.S. attorneys, including Lam, to resign. Officials said the dismissals weren't politically motivated and were generally based on job performance." The Union-Tribune notes, "The interviews of potential temporary replacements for Lam were conducted via video conference calls by Justice Department officials in Washington, D.C. The candidates did not seek the position but were invited to be interviewed. … An announcement is not expected until Lam's final day in office Thursday. An office party is scheduled for that day so colleagues can wish her well. Lam has declined to discuss reasons for her departure or her future plans."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Johnson & Johnson Tries To Minimize Damage From Bribery Probe. The Financial Times (2/14, Bowe, Davoudi, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Carved in stone in the lobby of its US headquarters is Johnson & Johnson's credo, displaying its guiding principles and symbol for what the healthcare conglomerate regards as its most preciously preserved commodity - its reputation. … But J&J also prizes is decentralised structure - with managers nimbly running separate businesses ranging from pharmaceuticals to medical devices to consumer brands such as its iconic Band-Aid and baby shampoo. These two ideals at J&J have clashed, and now the group is trying to minimise the damage to its reputation following revelations of improper payments overseas that could violate US anti-bribery laws." The Times continues, "Late on Monday, J&J said it had notified the US legal authorities and securities regulators that it had found 'improper payments in the connection of medical devices in two small-market countries.' … J&J was not under investigation for these payments and voluntarily notified the US Department of Justice and Securities and Exchange Commission. It said the payments could violate the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), and that a senior executive had stepped down as a result. J&J declined to name the countries or the type of payments involved. … Nevertheless, J&J said Michael Dormer, 55, would retire as worldwide chairman of three of its medical device businesses - Ethicon Endosurgery, Depuy orthopaedic implants and Ortho diagnostics unit." The Times notes, "The J&J case underscores that the medical device industry is particularly vulnerable to charges under the US FCPA, an anti-bribery statute that makes it illegal to make payments or offer anything of value to a foreign government official in order to obtain business. … Indictments of companies can carry a heavy price in the US, including a potential ban on doing business with the government, a huge buyer of health products and services. Around the world, companies like J&J sell products to hospitals and other healthcare facilities that are often government-owned, increasing the risk that payments to healthcare officials can be considered bribes to government officials. Bribes between parties in the private sector are not covered under the FCPA. … Experts say the Justice Department has markedly stepped up its enforcement of FCPA violations, forcing companies to be more vigilant about any types of payments it makes to individuals or entities that may be deemed to be government controlled."

Nasdaq Says Cyberonics Is In Compliance With Filing Rules. The AP (2/14) reports, "Cyberonics Inc. said Tuesday it received a letter from the Nasdaq Stock Market confirming that the medical device maker is in compliance with all the exchange's rules, and its stock will continue to be listed." The AP continues, "The company also said that with last week's filing of its quarterly report for the period ended Oct. 27, it has now filed all previously delinquent reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission." The AP adds, "Cyberonics had received letters from the Nasdaq warning that the company was subject to delisting for failing to meet its filing requirements. … Cyberonics in November said it would restate financial results from 2000 through January 2006 to correct improper stock options accounting, resulting in $10 million in non-cash expenses. The company's CEO and chief financial officer resigned later that month." The AP notes, "Cyberonics is one of 106 companies currently under SEC or Justice Department scrutiny over its stock-option grants, and at least 94 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews into their stock options practices, according to an AP review."

Aflac To Allow Shareholder Vote On Executive Pay. USA Today (2/14, 1A, Jones) reports, "Responding to the uproar against soaring executive compensation, Aflac today will announce a move to become the first major U.S. company to let shareholders vote on executive pay packages." USA continues, "On Tuesday, Aflac's board approved allowing shareholders to vote on the pay of the insurer's top five executives. Although the vote will be non-binding, it would be hard for Aflac to ignore the wishes of a majority of shareholders, says analyst Dawn Wolfe at Boston Common Asset Management. … Other companies are under similar pressure. Shareholder proposals to approve executive pay are on ballots this year at about 50 companies, many introduced by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) union, which is a powerful institutional investor." USA adds, "Aflac, probably best known for the ubiquitous duck in its TV ads, had received a shareholder proposal from Boston Common, but the money management firm withdrew it when Aflac promised to make the move voluntarily. Aflac plans to announce today that shareholders will begin voting in 2009, the first time there will be three years of complete pay data in proxy tables under new Securities and Exchange Commission disclosure rules. .. Aflac CEO Dan Amos said in an interview that a key concern is the chance of an 'emotional vote' if Aflac's stock is depressed going into the annual shareholders meeting. … Similar shareholder proposals at other major companies have never passed, says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy at AFSCME. However, he says proposals at companies such as Sun Microsystems were supported by 40% or more of shareholders."

Congress Probes Sallie Mae Exec's Stock Sale. The Washington Post (2/14, D1, Paley, 690K) reports congressional investigators are "looking into Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord's sale of $18.3 million worth of company stock this month, just days before President Bush proposed a huge cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to nosedive." The chairmen of the House Financial Services and Education committees "sent letters yesterday to the White House counsel, the education secretary and Sallie Mae, asking for detailed information on all contact between the Reston-based student lending giant and the Bush administration over the past three months."

Rep. George Miller said, "Given the timing of the Sallie Mae stock sale and the release of the President's budget, the committee is seeking more information as a matter of routine oversight."

Staggered Corporate Boards Defended. In an op-ed for he New York Times (2/14), Guhan Subramanian, a professor of business and law at Harvard, writes, "Slowly but surely, corporate America is giving up the staggered board." Subramanian continues, "Some businesses are responding to corporate governance rating agencies, which penalize companies that do not elect all of the directors each year. Some are responding to shareholder resolutions or to behind-the-scenes pressure from large shareholders. Georgeson Shareholder Services reports there were more than 90 resolutions among S.&P. 1500 companies in 2006 to abolish staggered boards, half proposed by the companies and half by shareholders. More are expected in the 2007 proxy season, and some corporate governance experts are urging companies not to fight the issue. … This would be a mistake. What shareholders object to is not staggered boards themselves, but how staggered boards block takeovers." Subramanian adds, "Most corporations have adopted or can easily adopt a 'poison pill,' a takeover defense that forbids a hostile bidder from directly purchasing a controlling interest in a target company. If the target has a staggered board, a bidder must win two proxy contests, conducted more than a year apart, to gain control of the board and jettison the poison pill. No bidder in the modern era of takeovers has had the patience and persistence to do this, so the staggered board combined with the pill presents a potent roadblock to shareholders who want to accept a hostile offer. … But there is a way to give shareholders exactly what they want without eliminating the staggered board: shift the staggered board from the charter to the bylaws. That would allow a hostile bidder to dismantle the staggered board through a bylaw amendment and put its offer to shareholders in a single proxy contest. For the 99.5 percent of United States public companies that are not subject to a hostile takeover bid in a given year, directors would continue to be elected to staggered, three-year terms. … Shareholders rightly decided that they did not like the anti-takeover effect of staggered boards, but their campaign unnecessarily casts the baby out with the bathwater. A bylaws-based staggered board meets the interests of all sides."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former CIA Official, Contractor Indicted In Cunningham Bribery Probe. ABC World News (2/13, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A congressional bribery scandal expanded today with the indictment of a former top CIA official. Kyle Foggo – who was the CIA's number three official until last May – was charged with fraud, conspiracy, and money laundering. The charges stem from the investigation that sent former Congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham to prison. Foggo and Cunningham were linked to a defense contractor who was also indicted today." CNN's The Situation Room (2/13, Blitzer) noted Foggo is "facing some very, very serious charges." CNN (2/13, Roberts) added, "The indictment alleges that Foggo used his senior position at the CIA to steer contracts to Wilkes. The deal shielded and the money laundered through shell companies and strawmen. In exchange, prosecutors say, Foggo benefited richly. … The FBI and the CIA's Office of Inspector General took the extraordinary step of searching both Foggo's office at CIA headquarters and his home in Vienna, Virginia. Agents seized everything from bank records to Cuban cigars."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Hoffman) adds, "Foggo and Wilkes could each be punished by up to 20 years in prison if convicted. 'High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment,' said U.S. Attorney Carol Lam. The charges are a blow to the CIA, whose director, Michael Hayden, wrote to employees Tuesday that the agency continues to cooperate with the investigation." The AP notes Foggo "resigned in May under investigation by the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service, the Pentagon's Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the CIA's inspector general and the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego." USA Today (2/14, 4A, Kelley, 2.27M) adds, "Wilkes' lawyer, Mark Geragos, said all the charges were 'demonstrably false' but refused to give specifics. Geragos said Wilkes plans to plead not guilty in a court appearance today."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/14, Thornton, Baker, 324K) reports Lam "announced the indictments at an afternoon press conference, calling the charges against the two men 'breathtaking in scope.' … Wilkes and Foggo are expected to surrender at an arraignment in federal court Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Perry, 850K) notes, "Wilkes, according to the indictment, provided Cunningham with prostitutes, vacations, corporate jet travel, limousine service, cash, meals, furniture and equipment for his boat. The value of the alleged bribes was put at $700,000. The contractor reportedly provided Foggo, a childhood friend, with meals, gifts, private jet flights, a helicopter ride and a weeklong stay at a Scottish castle valued at $44,000. Wilkes also paid for Foggo to join him on Hawaiian vacations, the indictment said."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/14, Smith, 690K) reports, "While the probe has threatened to sweep in other members of Congress, some uncertainty surrounds it. A key U.S. attorney involved in it -- Carol C. Lam in San Diego -- has been fired by the administration for unspecified

'performance-related' deficiencies along with a handful of other federal prosecutors. Lam oversaw the Foggo investigation and is to leave Thursday. The head of the local FBI field office praised Lam's performance and said her firing appeared to be 'political,' an accusation that the Justice Department has denied." The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A12, Paltrow, 2.04M) also notes the controversy surrounding Lam's dismissal and adds, "The indictment and its details would seem to heighten the risk to other members of Congress still under investigation; Mr. Wilkes also had dealings with several of them."

Roll Call (2/14, Van Dongen) similarly reports, "Lam secured the indictments two days before she is slated to leave office after being fired by the Bush administration in December along with six other U.S. attorneys, causing Democrats to charge their firings were improper and political. Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty is slated to brief Judiciary Committee Senators today in a closed-door session on the prosecutors' personnel records." Roll Call notes, "The 42-page indictment of Wilkes is wide-ranging and charges a variety of criminal activities. It also names John Michael Thomas, the president and part owner of New York-based mortgage company Coastal Capital Corp., with helping Cunningham obtain a fraudulent mortgage."

The Hill (2/14, Schor) reports, "Justice Department officials have praised the Cunningham probe as the linchpin of their growing pursuit of public corruption cases, yet prosecutor Lam is nonetheless slated to step down tomorrow after the Bush administration cited unspecified 'performance' issues in requesting her resignation late last year. … House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has called for Lam to continue her cases against Wilkes, Foggo and others reportedly ensnared in the probe, including former House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), via a special prosecutor appointment." The Washington Times (2/14, Seper, 88K) and PBS' NewsHour (2/13, Lehrer) also reported on the indictments, but without noting the Lam controversy.

CNN.com (2/14, Arena, Frieden) reports, "Foggo faces an 11-count indictment charging him with conspiracy, wire fraud, depriving taxpayers of honest services, conflict of interest and money laundering. He 'affirmatively hid' the gifts from his superiors at the CIA before his resignation, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam told reporters. … 'These two indictments describe patterns of self-dealing and corruption that spanned years and reached deep into our country's system of procurement for the defense industry,' Lam said." CNN adds, "Prosecutors will also try to reclaim $12 million in profits they say Wilkes received as a result of the schemes, Lam said. … A third man, New York mortgage banker John Michael, was charged with obstruction of justice. Prosecutors said he lied to a grand jury about Wilkes' role in paying off a half-million-dollar second mortgage on Cunningham's home." AFP (2/14) also reports on the indictments.

Defense To Rest Without Calling Libby, Cheney. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 6, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is word tonight from the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, Scooter Libby, that neither Vice President Cheney nor Libby himself will testify. … Libby's lawyers will rest their case this week with closing arguments next week." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Apuzzo) notes that the decision not to call Libby or Cheney "spares the defense team two dangerous bouts with cross-examination. But it also forces Libby to look elsewhere for someone to make the memory defense for him. John Hannah, who served as Libby's deputy and replaced him as Cheney's national security adviser, helped in that effort Tuesday. He described Libby as someone responsible for the nation's most sensitive intelligence but whose memory was notoriously spotty. Libby also wants three CIA briefers to testify Wednesday about the classified national security briefings he received each morning in mid-2003."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/14, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "The defense's central theory is that Libby suffered from a notoriously bad memory and misspoke to investigators about his role in the Bush administration's disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame. The decision to foreshorten the case means that jurors will hear little testimony and see scant evidence to back that contention. … The decision also means that the defense will not call any witnesses to explicitly buttress a dramatic assertion by lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. in his opening statement to the jury: that Libby was scapegoated by his White House colleagues when the leak investigation began." The Post notes Hannah "highlighted points that Cheney and Libby might have offered if they had testified. Hannah said that Libby essentially had two full-time jobs and, under questioning by defense attorney John Cline, gave the jury a tour of complex and sensitive foreign-policy issues in which Libby was immersed from May 2003 to March 2004."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Schmitt, 850K) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald "got Hannah to admit that Libby was not too busy in the summer of 2003 to take time out to track the doings of Wilson. The defense decision not to call Libby appeared to harden feelings a bit with the prosecution team. Before the trial, the government had given Libby and his lawyers extensive access to summaries of classified information that Libby had seen while working for Cheney," and "Fitzgerald said the information was given with the understanding that it would be used exclusively by Libby while he testified to show the size and sensitive nature of his workload. Tuesday, after defense lawyers said that Libby would not testify but that they planned to introduce some of that information during the testimony of three CIA employees today, Fitzgerald objected. … Walton deferred a ruling."

The New York Times (2/14, Lewis, Shane, 1.16M) notes, "Mr. Cheney's testimony, which was much anticipated, would have set a precedent as the first appearance of a sitting vice president as a witness at a criminal trial. It was also expected to bolster a major part of Mr. Libby's defense: that he was so consumed by the crush of high-stakes issues like global terrorism and Iraq that he might not have remembered all the details of his conversations. But the trial threw up numerous instances in which Mr. Cheney took a personal role in managing the White House response to accusations from Joseph C. Wilson…that the evidence for going to war had been knowingly overstated. Mr. Cheney could have been exposed during cross-examination to uncomfortable questions about his close involvement in trying to undermine Mr. Wilson's criticisms."

Former Senator Thompson Criticizes Libby Prosecution. The AP (2/14) reports, "Former Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., criticized Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's handling of the CIA leak investigation Tuesday, saying the prosecutor had to have known from the start that it was not a crime to disclose Valerie Plame's identity as an agent." The AP continues, "A fund-raiser for the defense of I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Thompson depicted Fitzgerald as out of control, telling ABC News there was 'no brake and no check and no balance' on the prosecutor." The AP continues, "Thompson's objections are the same ones Democratic politicians made in the 1990s about independent counsel Kenneth Starr, who spent six years investigating President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. … In the same fashion, Republicans complained about the six-year investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh into the Iran-Contra scandal of the Reagan years and the first Bush administration. … Congress allowed the independent counsel statute to expire in 1998. … 'When you put too much power in the hands of unelected, unaccountable people who have every incentive to focus massive resources onto one particular person — who gets the plaudits in the media for doing so — it's a bad thing,' Thompson told ABC. … Unlike Starr, who was appointed by a panel of federal appeals court judges, Fitzgerald's Justice Department superiors appointed him to look into the CIA leak scandal. He has continued his duties as U.S. attorney in Chicago while investigating the Valerie Plame affair." The AP notes, "Thompson, who plays a prosecuting attorney in NBC's 'Law & Order,' pointed out that no one has been charged with leaking Plame's identity, saying no law had been broken. 'The Justice Department knew that early on. The CIA should have known that early on,' Thompson said. 'Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had to have known that at the very beginning.'"

Judge To Hear NJ Legislature's Challenge To US Subpoenas. The Newark Star-Ledger (2/14, Margolin, Sherman) reports, "Federal prosecutors and attorneys for the state Legislature are due to square off today in an increasingly political fight over the confidentiality of legislative records being sought in a criminal corruption probe. The closed-door hearing in U.S. District Court in Trenton comes after Gov. Jon Corzine reiterated his call yesterday for the release of documents being sought by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in an expanding investigation into lawmakers' possible conflicts of interest. 'I think we ought to comply with the law and respond to the subpoena,' Corzine said. 'We ought to be taking those steps that give the public the assurance that we're getting our house in order with regard to ethics.' … Separately, attorneys for state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden), whose no-show job with the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey initially sparked the interest of the U.S. attorney, moved to intervene in the court hearing." The Star-Ledger notes, "It is clear, though, that Christie is not confining his questions to Bryant. Several legislative officers and budget officials have been interviewed by the FBI in recent weeks regarding the awarding of millions of dollars in special discretionary funds."

US Considering Additional Charges Against Alleged Chicago Mobster. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Robinson) reports, "Reputed mob boss Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo and another man could face new charges for going on the lam after a major indictment against them was unsealed, a federal prosecutor said Tuesday. 'We may seek to add charges to the indictment based on their fugitive status,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Mitchell A. Mars told federal Judge James B. Zagel at a hearing in a racketeering case known as Operation Family Secrets." The AP notes, "Lombardo, 77, was captured by FBI agents in a suburban Elmwood Park alley in January 2006 after nine months on the run. … Zagel told attorneys Tuesday that he likely would order a hearing to determine exactly what jurors might hear from prospective government witness James Wagner, a former FBI mob investigator who now is president of the Chicago Crime Commission."

Massachusetts Lawyer Surrenders To Face Art Theft Charges. The Boston Globe (2/14, Kurkjian, Murphy, 413K) reports, "A retired Watertown lawyer surrendered to federal authorities yesterday after returning from France to face charges he attempted to sell millions of dollars worth of paintings, including a major work by Cezanne, that were stolen from a home in the Berkshires in 1978. Robert M. Mardirosian , 72, who gave up a successful criminal law practice to become a sculptor and painter more than a decade ago, appeared in federal court 90 minutes after being arrested at Logan International Airport by arrangement with the US attorney's office. He was charged with taking possession of the seven paintings months after they were allegedly stolen by one of his clients. … He was released on $500,000 bail by US Magistrate Marianne B. Bowler."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Alderman) notes, "In 1988, Mardirosian moved the paintings to Monaco, thinking he might have a legal claim to ownership or a 10 percent 'finder's fee,' according to a May 2006 affidavit from FBI Special Agent Geoffrey Kelly, also unsealed Tuesday. Lloyd's of London was contacted in 1999 by an unknown person about insuring the paintings before sale, the affidavit says, and discovered they were listed with the database Art Loss Register as having been stolen. It says Julian Radcliffe, chairman of Art Loss Register, determined that the paintings were being sold by a Panamanian corporation called Erie International Trading Company, later found to be registered to Mardirosian."

Federal Inmate Sentenced To Death For Murdering Cellmate. The AP (2/14) reports from Roanoke, Va., "A federal inmate who killed his cell mate by strangling him with a bath towel has been sentenced to death, officials said Tuesday." Carlos Caro "was a prisoner at the federal penitentiary in Lee County…when he killed Robert Sandoval, U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee's office said in a statement. Caro later told an FBI agent that Sandoval had cursed Caro and threatened to eat his breakfast, the statement said."

Jury Sentences Pair To Death In Russian Immigrant Kidnap-Murders. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Risling) reports, "A jury imposed the death penalty Tuesday on the ringleaders of a kidnapping-for-ransom scheme targeting rich Russian immigrants whose bodies were found in a Northern California reservoir. Jurors deliberated less than a day before reaching their vote on sentences for Iouri Mikhel, 41, and Jurijus Kadamovas, 40. … Said U.S. Attorney Susan DeWitt: 'These were good people who didn't deserve the fate that befell them. We felt a tremendous responsibility to the victims' families.' Defense attorney Dale Rubin called the jury's decision 'a revenge verdict.'" The AP notes, "Five victims were killed regardless of whether the ransoms were paid, prosecutors said."

Study Predicts Prison Population Increases. USA Today (2/14, 4A, Johnson) reports, "The number of inmates in U.S. prisons likely will rise nearly 13% during the next five years, costing states up to $27.5 billion in new operating and construction expenses, according to a new analysis by the Pew Charitable Trusts." USA continues, "The Pew report, to be released today, projects the nation's prison population will be about 1.72 million by 2011, up from an estimated 1.53 million at the end of last year. Such an increase would roughly equal the current population of the federal prison system." USA adds, "Pew analysts said the growth is being fueled by mandatory minimum sentences that have stretched prison terms for many criminals, declines in inmates granted parole and other policies that states have passed in recent years to crack down on crime. … In some states, the study said, high rates of repeat offenders also have been a factor in boosting prison populations." USA notes, "Montana, Arizona, Alaska, Idaho and Vermont could see their prison systems grow by one-third or more if there are no changes to the states' sentencing and release policies, the study said. … Pew, a Philadelphia-based philanthropic organization that funds research into a variety of issues, based its findings on population forecasts gathered from the federal Bureau of Prisons and 42 states."

DC Dental Clinic Owner Sentenced For Medical Billing Fraud. The Washington Business Journal (2/13, Adler) reported, "The owner of a D.C. dental clinic who recently pled guilty to health care fraud has been sentenced to six months community confinement, six months of home detention and was ordered to pay restitution of $164,000 and a fine of $40,000 for submitting false claims for payment to private insurers, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for D.C." In August, Afsaneh Tehrani "was charged with health-care fraud and making false statements. At that time, she denied the charges, calling them 'ridiculous.' The charges resulted from an investigation by the U.S. Attorney for the District, the FBI's Washington field office, the D.C. Department of Health and the D.C. Department of Insurance, Securities and Banking."

Former iGate Stockholder Sues Jefferson Over Alleged Bribery. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/14, Barrouquere) reports, "A former stockholder in a technology company sued a beleaguered congressman and a former business associate Tuesday, claiming they bilked stockholders by using business funds to pay bribes. The lawsuit alleges that Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., his wife and Vernon Jackson, former chief executive of the telecommunications firm iGate, schemed to funnel money to Jefferson, his family and foreign officials. The allegations mirror those in an ongoing federal investigation of Jefferson and his business dealings. Jefferson has not been charged, but the FBI has said in court records that agents found $90,000 in a freezer in his New Orleans home." The AP notes, "iGate stockholder Daniel C. Cadle filed the suit in U.S. District Court in Louisville."

Roll Call (2/14, Van Dongen) reports, "The suit charges Jefferson with soliciting and accepting nearly $400,000 in bribes from Jackson to promote iGate's services in the U.S. and abroad. It further alleges that Jackson transferred 30,775,000 shares of iGate stock to Jefferson from 2001 to 2005." Roll Call also notes Jefferson "has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nonetheless, questions swirl about why the FBI found $90,000 in the freezer of the Democrat's New Orleans home."

Connecticut Man Sentenced To Five Years For Child Porn Distribution. The AP (2/14) reports, "A man who traded images of child pornography and sexual abuse on the Internet was sentenced Tuesday to five years in prison after pleading for mercy, saying his effeminate appearance would make him vulnerable to abuse behind bars. David Cuozzo, 42, of New Haven had amassed a collection of 1,780 files of child pornography involving at least 30 children, including images that portrayed sadistic or masochistic conduct or other depictions of violence and the rape of young children, authorities said. 'This defendant used the Internet to trade some of the most disturbing images of infant and toddler child pornography and sexual abuse that law enforcement has seen,' said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor." The AP notes, "O'Connor said the prosecution was part of the U.S. Department of Justice Project Safe Childhood Initiative, designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse."

Louisiana Man Acquitted After 10 Years in Prison For Murder He Did Not Commit. USA Today (2/14, 4A, Parker) reports, "James Thomas spent almost 10 years in jail in Louisiana, waiting to be tried for a murder he said he didn't commit. … When the case finally was tried, it took jurors 80 minutes to agree with him. After a five-day trial, they acquitted Thomas in the 1996 shooting death of a Baton Rouge man. Thomas, 36, almost fainted in the packed courtroom as the verdict was read out. … 'I was shocked. I praised the Lord,' Thomas said Tuesday in his first interview since his acquittal Friday. 'As long as I live, I'll never forget this. That's 10 years they can never replace.'" USA continues, "Thomas' case, profiled in a USA TODAY story in 2005, symbolized problems in the nation's public defender system that result in tens of thousands of poor people in the USA going to jail every year without talking to a lawyer. An American Bar Association study concluded two years ago that the system was 'mired in crisis,' crippled by funding inadequacies that led to excessive caseloads and inexperienced lawyers being assigned to cases beyond their expertise." USA adds, "Since the report, public defender programs have been improved in several states, says Bill Whitehurst, an Austin lawyer who headed the ABA's panel on indigent defense. But 'there's no question it's still mired in crisis.'"

Better Business Bureau Targeted In E-Mail Scam. The Washington Post (2/14, D3, Shin) reports, "The Better Business Bureau network was the target of a 'spoofing' scam yesterday in which thousands of businesses in the United States and Canada received e-mails encouraging them to download what is thought to be a computer virus." The Post continues, "The e-mails, using the name of the 95-year-old network of nonprofit groups that looks into consumer complaints, told businesses that they were the subject of a complaint and included a link to view related documents. Clicking on the link, however, accessed the address book of an infected computer and distributed the counterfeit e-mail to more recipients, said Steve Cox, spokesman for the Council of Better Business Bureaus. … The council is the umbrella group for the system's 129 local branches, which are funded by member businesses. … BBB members and nonmembers received the e-mail." The Post adds, "Confused business owners began calling the council's offices in Arlington at 6 a.m. yesterday, Cox said. By mid-morning, the organization had confirmed the attack was systemwide. … The counterfeit e-mails were traced to an advertising firm in Kennesaw, Ga., that had had its computer system hacked into Monday night, Cox said. The agency had no prior affiliation with the BBB."

States Mull Laws Allowing Homeowners To Shoot Burglars. The AP (2/14, Wetzel) reports from Bismarck, ND, "A proposed law that would let people shoot a burglar or carjacker without fear of facing arrest or a lawsuit is moving forward in one state, and the National Rifle Association is promoting it in others. … 'This bill is simply a citizen's version of homeland security,' said North Dakota state Representative Ron Carlisle." The AP continues, "The proposal would erase language that says retreat is better than deadly force, and it says a person is presumed to be justified if he or she shoots a burglar or carjacker in his or her home, workplace or vehicle. … Police and county prosecutors object to the proposal, saying that trying to disprove a shooter's self-defense argument would be more difficult. The law protects a shooter from arrest unless police have probable cause to believe the shooting was not justified." The AP notes, "Ashley Varner, an NRA spokeswoman, said 15 states, including South Dakota, have versions of the law. This year, it has been offered in legislatures in five other states."

Bipartisan Measure Would Strengthen Federal Worker Whistleblower Protections. The Washington Post's (2/14, D1, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Yesterday, advocates for whistle-blowers urged Congress to strengthen protections for federal employees who suffer reprisal in the workplace. The advocates were greeted with bipartisan support at a hearing held by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee." The Post adds that committee chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), "said the committee's bill would for the first time extend whistle-blower rights to those who work at the FBI and in intelligence agencies, and to people employed by federal contractors." While ranking member Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), "said the bill would clarify congressional intent as to what type of whistle-blowing is protected. He said 'the most significant reform' in the bill would guarantee federal employees a right to a jury trial in federal district court if the Merit Systems Protection Board, a federal agency that hears complaints from whistle-blowers, did not take action on a whistle-blower's claim in 180 days."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Releases Prince George's K-9 Unit From DOJ Oversight. The Washington Post (2/14, B1, Castaneda) reports, "The Prince George's County police canine unit, which in recent years operated under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, has improved to the point that the oversight is no longer necessary, a federal judge in Maryland has ruled." The Post continues, U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus on Monday granted a motion filed jointly by the Justice Department, the county and the police department to end the federal oversight that began in 2004, Prince George's officials said. … The judge's order means the department has succeeded in reforming the canine unit by dramatically reducing the number of bites inflicted by police dogs, beefing up supervision of canine teams, instituting reviews of biting incidents and improving documentation of such encounters, county officials said. … The oversight will formally end March 11." The Post notes, "A separate agreement between county officials and the Justice Department, which was negotiated to end a Justice investigation into allegations of excessive force by county police, is still operative. The department is in substantial compliance with the terms of that agreement, which calls for broad reforms regarding use of force, training and other issues, said Sharon Taylor, a spokeswoman for the police department. … On a practical level, the end of the consent decree means police officials will no longer undergo periodic Justice Department reviews and will no longer be required to file detailed reports to Justice officials. … However, the canine unit reforms will continue, Taylor said."

Georgia County Declines To Join Push For Probe Of 1946 Death Of Black Veteran. The AP (2/14, Minor) reports from Butler, GA, "A rural county's leaders declined to take action Tuesday on a request from two civil rights groups to support a federal probe into the unsolved 1946 killing of a black World War II veteran." The AP continues, "The groups and surviving relatives of Maceo Snipes, the first registered black voter in Taylor County, wanted the county commission's support before they mailed their request to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … But the relatives and activists stormed out to protest the line of questioning of an official who said local residents resent outsiders telling them what to do, and the commission did not act. … 'I'm disappointed at the outcome. We didn't come to fight,' said a cousin, Felix Snipes, 66, of Atlanta." The AP adds, "Commission member Patty Carson-James later said the state NAACP and the Prison & Jail Project did not need the commission's support for the probe." The AP notes, "Maceo Snipes, who served most of his two-year Army hitch in the Pacific, was shot in the back by four white men in 1946 - a day after the 37-year-old voted for the first time, relatives say. He collapsed in the doorway of his farmhouse about 90 miles south of Atlanta and died two days later. … While his death certificate says he died of 'gunshot wound by homicide,' there is no evidence of a criminal probe into the killing, and no one was arrested."

WRBL-TV, Columbus, GA (2/13, 10:59 p.m.) broadcasted, "Members of the NAACP are asking that another grand jury be convened to look into the Kenneth Walker case." President of the Georgia State Conference, Edward Dubose, wants District Attorney Gray Conger and US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "to conduct an investigation into whether criminal misconduct took place the night Kenneth Walker was killed three years ago."

Federal Appeals Court Hears Arguments Over Christian Prison Program. The New York Times (2/14, Henriques, 1.16M) reports, "Lawyers for Prison Fellowship Ministries and its affiliate, the Inner8Change Freedom Initiative, appeared before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in St. Louis yesterday to defend the constitutionality of an evangelical Christian rehabilitation program they operate in a state prison in Iowa. A federal judge ruled last June that the program, built around Bible study and prayer, violated the First Amendment's ban on government-sponsored religious indoctrination. Although inmates volunteered for the program, the judge, Robert W. Pratt of Federal District Court, found that they had been induced to join it to get safer housing and more accessible treatment options. … The prison program's lawyers emphasized the voluntary nature of the program, and the State of Iowa, a co-defendant, argued that it got valuable secular services for its money. The program is continuing during the appeal, lawyers for the state said."

Four Car Rental Brands In Merger Discussions. The New York Times (2/14, Sorkin) reports, "A deal to combine four of the nation's largest car rental brands — National, Alamo, Thrifty and Dollar — is being discussed as the industry continues to consolidate." The Times continues, Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, a unit of DaimlerChrysler, is in early talks to merge with Vanguard Car Rental, of Tulsa, Okla., which owns National and Alamo, in a deal valued at more than $3 billion, according to people involved in the discussions. … The negotiations, which have been taking place on and off for several months, are at a particularly delicate stage, these people said, and may still collapse." The Times adds, "If completed, a deal would create the third-largest rental car company in the United States behind leaders Enterprise Rent-a-Car and Hertz Global Holdings, but outpacing Avis Budget Group in terms of revenue. … A deal could push rental car rates higher. Prices have already risen 10 percent to 20 percent in the last year as the Detroit automakers have tried to move away from providing discounted fleet vehicles to rental car companies and focus on higher-margin retail customers. … And a deal would face antitrust scrutiny from regulators." The Times notes, "A merger would be the latest in a flurry of deals in the car rental business. Hertz was bought from Ford Motor in December 2005 by a consortium of private equity firms. In November, Hertz went public at $15 a share. (It closed yesterday at $20.36.) Avis Budget Group was recently spun off in the breakup of the Cendant Corporation."

Judge Delays Caremark Shareholder Vote On CVS Bid. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, B2, Berman, Armstrong) reports, "A Delaware judge waded into the thick of the two-way takeover struggle for Caremark Rx Inc., postponing a shareholder vote on CVS Corp.'s bid, while nudging Caremark to begin negotiations with rival Express Scripts Inc. … The rare step to enjoin -- or delay -- the vote gave a much-needed boost to Express, whose $27.3 billion bid for Caremark has been repeatedly rebuffed by Caremark's board." The Journal continues, "Coincidentally or not, Delaware Chancellor William B. Chandler III delayed the vote until at least March 9 from Feb. 20. The March date is the day after Express is supposed to receive government notice about the length of an antitrust review, a factor that has long loomed over the merger saga." The Journal adds, "Mr. Chandler questioned Caremark's insistence that it can't speak to Express because such a deal would likely run afoul of antitrust laws. He noted that Caremark appeared to have no such concerns when it reviewed potential transactions with Express in 2001, 2003 and 2005. The judge chided Caremark for disclosing those past discussions on Monday -- just eight days before the scheduled shareholder vote. … A shareholder might want more time to weigh his vote, Mr. Chandler wrote, 'in the face of Caremark's present protestations that antitrust difficulties loom so large as to prevent the board of directors from even discussing' the Express offer. … Antitrust worries are… a big part of any Express-Caremark combination, which would unite the country's second- and third-largest managers of pharmacy benefits. It is still quite possible that federal authorities could seek a 'second request' for information that would be a big blow to Express's ambitions."

The AP (2/14, French) reports, "The CVS offer has already won antitrust approval. But the offer from Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., has yet to receive antitrust clearance. Express Scripts is the third-largest pharmacy benefits manager and Caremark is No. 2." The AP adds, "Investment advisory firms Glass, Lewis & Co., CtW Investment Group and Institutional Shareholder Services have said that Caremark's board has not succeeded in getting the best deal for its shareholders and urged before the latest dividend increase that Caremark shareholders reject the CVS bid. … Express Scripts said in news release that Caremark shareholders should vote against the proposed merger of CVS and Caremark to 'send a message to the (Caremark) board that it is time to level the playing field.'"

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/14, Feldstein) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. on Tuesday got more time to charm Caremark Rx shareholders when a judge delayed a vote on whether the company should merge with CVS Corp. … The delay also gives Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, a chance to win regulatory approval for its bid before the shareholders' vote. … Express Scripts should learn by March 8 whether the Federal Trade Commission would approve a Caremark—Express Scripts deal or whether regulators require a lengthy investigation to decide the matter. Express Scripts' lack of FTC approval has hurt its ability to gain the support of Caremark's shareholders."

EU Raids Siemens, ABB Offices In Cartel Probe. The Financial Times (2/14, Buck, Milne) reports, "The antitrust problems that have engulfed Siemens and several of its engineering rivals deepened yesterday when the European Commission raided the offices of several manufacturers in Germany, France and Austria in connection with a cartel probe. … The Commission refused to identify the companies targeted in the raids but Siemens and ABB confirmed that their offices had been searched." The Times continues, "Brussels said the groups were suspected of forming a price-fixing cartel in the market for transformers, key components in the power grid in controlling the voltage. Siemens said in a statement that the Brussels antitrust watchdog was investigating five companies, and added: 'The EU Commission is investigating collusion in the area of power transformers in Germany, Austria and the Netherlands between 1999 and 2003.' … The Commission refused to confirm the precise extent of its probe." The Times adds, "The raids are deeply troubling for the groups involved, coming weeks after Siemens, ABB, Alstom and other engineering companies were found guilty of operating another cartel in the market for electricity transmission systems. The groups were together fined a record €751m ($978m), with Siemens alone accounting for €397m of the total. … Companies that are found guilty of operating a cartel face fines of up to 10 per cent of their global annual turnover. The Commission is particularly tough on repeat offenders and, under new rules introduced last year, Siemens and its peers could find their fines being double the normal level should they be found guilty in any new case resulting from this month's raids."

Aluminum Industry Seen Ripe For Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C3, Barta, Glader) reports, "Aluminum companies may be next in line for consolidation as mining conglomerates scour for takeover targets." The Journal continues, "Speculation is building that BHP Billiton Ltd., Rio Tinto PLC or another mining titan could bid to buy one of the world's aluminum heavyweights, particularly Pittsburgh's Alcoa Inc. or Alcan Inc. of Montreal. … Doing so would enable BHP or Rio Tinto to consolidate its position in the growing aluminum market, while preventing competitors from snatching up the few remaining blue-chip players at a time of accelerating consolidation in the natural-resources sector." The Journal adds, "The price of aluminum, which is used to make everything from soda cans to airplane parts, has lagged behind some other metals in the recent commodity boom. In part, that is because China -- a driver of demand -- produces significant quantities of its own, diminishing the need for imports. Still, analysts believe global demand will continue to rise. … Rumors of a large aluminum deal have floated for more than a year, heating up again in recent days, after the Times of London reported that BHP and Rio Tinto had both 'drawn up plans' for a $40 billion takeover of Alcoa. Rio Tinto and BHP declined to comment on the speculation, and Alcoa officials have played down the report. 'We view this as rumors and rumors only,' said Kevin Lowery, a spokesman for Alcoa." The Journal notes, "There are good reasons why a big aluminum deal might be attractive. Mining companies have struggled in recent years to find and develop new sources of raw-material supplies, and many of them believe it is safer to pick up assets through acquisitions than attempting higher-risk exploration projects. … Also, mining companies are awash in cash on profits earned since the commodity boom took off four years ago. Shareholders are clamoring for the companies to find new ways of spending that money to ensure they have strong growth prospects in the next decade."

Belgian Court Rules Google Violated Copyright Laws With Newspaper Links. The New York Times (2/14, Crampton) reports from Paris, "A Brussels court ruled Tuesday that Google had violated copyright laws by publishing links to articles from Belgian newspapers without permission. Legal experts said the case could have broad implications in Europe for the news indexes provided by search engines." The Times continues, "The ruling, which Google said it would appeal, was hailed by some newspaper industry representatives and may also have an impact on a lawsuit against Google by the news service Agence France-Presse. … 'As the first decision to condemn a search engine for indexing news articles, you can be sure publishers around the world are paying attention,' said Cyril Fabre, a lawyer in Paris at Alexen, a law firm specializing in Internet law and intellectual property. 'The implications in Europe are particularly strong since copyright law is so uniform across the Continent.'" The Times adds, "The Brussels court ruled that Google, which operates the dominant Internet search engine, must pay 25,000 euros, or $32,600, for each day it displayed content from the plaintiff publications in violation of copyright. The court scaled back a September ruling that called for damages of up to 1 million euros a day and required Google to publish the judgment on its home page. … The group that brought the case, Copiepresse, manages copyright issues for more than one dozen Belgian newspapers, most published in French. It said it had also asked the French division of Yahoo to stop showing the group's news reports."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, B3, Patrick, Jolis) reports, "As media companies around the globe grapple with how they are compensated when their material is shared online, a Belgian court said Google Inc. can't post news articles from local newspapers on its Web sites in Belgium." The Journal continues, "In a closely watched ruling, the Brussels Court of First Instance said Google can't offer any links to articles or post any articles or photographs from French- and German-language Belgian newspapers. (No Dutch-language Belgian newspapers participated in the suit.) The judgment upheld the court's initial ruling in September, which the Internet-search firm had challenged. … The ruling may provide ammunition for other news associations. Already, Agence France Presse, the French wire service, is suing Google in U.S. District Court in Washington, accusing it of violating AFP's copyright by using its headlines, photographs and story fragments in Google News. AFP is demanding payment when Google uses excerpts of its articles and photographs in the U.S. … Also in the U.S., the Authors Guild and a group of major publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have brought two separate suits against Google in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, alleging Google is abusing their copyright by digitizing books without permission in order to make their contents searchable on the Web. Google has denied wrongdoing in all three cases; all are still pending."

Mills Corp Board Spurns Brookfield For Higher Bid From Simon, Farallon. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, D4) reports, "Mills Corp., the troubled Chevy Chase mall developer, said yesterday that it favored a $1.6 billion offer from Simon Property Group and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management instead of an earlier takeover agreement with Brookfield Asset Management." The AP continues, "Mills said its board of directors concluded that the Simon-Farallon offer, $24 per share, was "superior" to Brookfield's proposed deal of $21 per share, valued at $1.35 billion. The board authorized Mills to end the deal with Brookfield. When it was offered in January, Brookfield's bid represented an 18 percent premium over the price of Mills stock, but the share price has since jumped on news of a possible merger." The AP adds, "Mills, which owns 38 shopping centers nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, said in a statement that it would give Brookfield three days to top its previous offer, however, before it breaks the agreement signed Jan. 17. The company said it was 'ready and willing to negotiate such an amendment' with Brookfield, which is headquartered in Toronto. .. Along with the higher price, Mills said its board preferred the Simon-Farallon deal because it could be closed more quickly. If it ends the Brookfield agreement, Mills would likely absorb a $40 million breakup fee, but some Wall Street analysts said that was not a considerable amount." The AP notes, "Mills, one of the first developers of oversize malls known as mega-malls, has struggled in the past year with accounting problems and heavy debt that the company said in January could push it into bankruptcy. … The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating Mills's accounting missteps, which the company said were widespread and could cost shareholders up to $352 million in equity. Mills has yet to file its 2005 annual earnings report and plans to restate earnings as far back as 2001."

Honeywell Settles Chemical Plant Death Charge With DOJ For $12 Million. The AP (2/14) reports from Baton Rouge, "Honeywell International Inc. has agreed to pay $12 million in fines and restitution resulting from a fatal accident at its Baton Rouge chemical plant in 2003, the Justice Department said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Honeywell agreed to plead guilty to violating the federal Clean Air Act, U.S. Attorney David Dugas said in a news release. A court date for formally entering the plea has not been set." The AP adds, "The charge stemmed from an accident at the plant on July 29, 2003. A plant worker, Delvin Henry, was doused by a corrosive material after opening a vat that had been labeled as containing a benign refrigerant. He died from his injuries the next day. … Through the plea agreement, Henry's three children will receive $2 million. The company also will pay an $8 million criminal fine, $750,000 to the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality, $750,000 to the Louisiana State Police hazardous materials unit and $500,000 to the state police emergency operations center."

Judge Rules Agriculture Department Violated Law In Seed Case. The New York Times (2/14, Pollack) reports, "A federal judge ruled yesterday that the Agriculture Department violated the law by failing to adequately assess possible environmental impacts before approving Monsanto's genetically engineered alfalfa." The Times continues, "Judge Charles R. Breyer of Federal District Court in San Francisco said the agency had been 'cavalier' in deciding that a full environmental impact statement was not needed because the potential environmental and economic effects of the crop were not significant." The Times adds, "Plaintiffs in the case — some alfalfa seed companies and environmental and farm advocacy groups — said they would push to stop the sales and planting of the alfalfa, which is resistant to Monsanto's Roundup herbicide. … Joseph Mendelson, legal director of the Center for Food Safety, a Washington advocacy group that organized the lawsuit, said the decision by itself could block commercial sales of genetically engineered alfalfa seeds but that the plaintiffs would ask for an injunction to make sure. Judge Breyer asked the parties to meet and propose remedies to him by Feb. 26." The Times notes, "A federal judge in Washington said last week that the Agriculture Department had not done adequate assessments before approving field trials of genetically engineered grass. And last August a federal judge in Hawaii, in a case involving field trials of crops engineered to produce pharmaceuticals, ruled that the Agriculture Department had not adequately assessed the possible impact on endangered species. … Mr.

Mendelson of the Center for Food Safety said yesterday's decision could set a precedent that would require the Agriculture Department to do full impact statements for other biotech crops before they are approved."

Corporate Executives Call For Emissions Caps In Senate Testimony. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Simon, 850K) reports, "Corporate CEOs do not usually come to Capitol Hill to lobby for more government regulation. But that's what a group of executives did Tuesday, urging Congress to cap emissions blamed for global warming." Advocates "of a mandatory program for reducing greenhouse gas emissions see support from such businessmen as critical to getting legislation through Congress and past President Bush's veto pen. The executives were invited to appear at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing by its chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., who has made passage of legislation addressing global warming her top priority." The testimony "was intended to rebut arguments that mandatory caps on emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases would be bad for business and drive up costs."

Exxon CEO Warns Against Damaging Economy With Emissions Curbs. The New York Times (2/14, Krauss, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports, "The chief executive of Exxon Mobil, Rex W. Tillerson, warned Tuesday that governments should not rush into policies that could damage the global economy in order to limit carbon emissions. In a speech at a major industry gathering, Mr. Tillerson acknowledged that the planet was warming while carbon dioxide levels were increasing, suggesting a more accommodating position than the hard-nosed stance Exxon had held." But he "gave an unalloyed defense of the oil industry and predicted that hydrocarbons would dominate the world's transportation as energy demand grows by an expected 40 percent by 2030. There is no significant alternative to oil in coming decades and Exxon will continue to make oil and natural gas its primary products, he said." Tillerson's "statements suggested that Exxon was navigating between positions defending oil as an energy source and its core business, and showing sensitivity to growing public concerns about a warming climate."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

WPost Runs Excerpt From IG Report On Missing FBI Laptops. Under the headline "Audit Faults FBI on Missing Laptops, Weapons," the Washington Post (2/14, A17, Eggen, 690K) ran a 212-word excerpt from the IG report released Monday which found "that 160 weapons and 160 laptop computers were missing at the FBI." The Post noted that the report said, "We recognize that in any organization the size of the FBI some weapons will inevitably be stolen or go missing. However, it is important that the FBI take appropriate steps to minimize these losses. … Our audit found that the FBI has not taken sufficient corrective action on several recommendations outlined in our 2002 audit report to address the issue of missing or stolen equipment. … Moreover, during this follow-up review, the FBI could not identify for us the contents of many of the lost and stolen laptops, including whether they contained sensitive or classified information . . ."

Philadelphia Cocaine Dealer Sentenced To 24 Years In Prison. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/14, Caparella, 106K) reports, "Mario Luis Rojas Jr., 39, a fugitive for 7 ½ years, a $3-million con man and bigtime cocaine trafficker, officially closed the family business Friday. His new life begins in a federal prison, where he'll serve a 24-year sentence thanks to U.S. District Judge Bruce Kauffman." The Daily News notes that after Rojas was arrested in 1998 and promised to cooperate with police, he "bribed a high school buddy, state trooper Antonio Romero, Jr., with a promise of a $3 million payday in return for a key to escape. Rojas then reneged on the $3 million and his deal to cooperate and fled to Mexico, where he resumed shipping cocaine to Philadelphia," according to Assistant US Attorney Ewald Zittlau. "During an investigation of the escape, the FBI conducted a 'reverse sting' and supplied the trooper's cousin, Jose L. Davila, with five kilograms of 'sham' cocaine as if it were a partial payment of the $3 million owed by Rojas."

Judge Says Supply Of Marijuana For Medical Research Is Inadequate. McClatchy Newspapers (2/14) reports, "In an emphatic but nonbinding opinion, the Drug Enforcement Administration's own judge is recommending that a University of Massachusetts professor be allowed to grow a legal pot crop. … 'The existing supply of marijuana is not adequate,' Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen Bittner ruled. … The federal government's 12-acre marijuana plot at the University of Mississippi provides neither the quantity nor quality scientists need, researchers contend." The Bush administration's "anti-drug stance may make it unlikely that the pot-growing rules will loosen. A decision is still months away, the DEA said."

In a longer version of the story, McClatchy Newspapers (2/13) wrote that both sides "will now get a chance to file comments on the opinion before DEA administrators make their ruling. 'We could still be months away from a final decision,' DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said Tuesday afternoon, adding that 'obviously, we're going to take the judge's opinion into consideration.'" The McClatchy story was used by the Denver Post, Fresno Bee, San Jose Mercury

News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, Detroit Free Press, and Kansas City Star.

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/13) reported the ruling "is actually only a recommendation to the DEA, which supports the current policy." Courtney "said a deputy administrator would make the final decision after reviewing arguments from lawyers for the DEA staff and for [Lyle Craker, a University of Massachusetts professor of plant biology.] The agency's decision could be appealed to a federal court in Washington, D.C. 'It's going to be a hard case to win,' said Anjuli Verna of the American Civil Liberties Union's drug law reform project, which represents Craker. She said the court could overturn a DEA veto of Bittner's ruling only if it was found that the agency was acting arbitrarily."

The North County Gazette (2/13) reported, "Thirty-eight members of Congress and a broad range of scientific and medical organizations have joined professor Craker in challenging the federal government's policy of blocking administrative channels and obstructing research that could lead to the development of marijuana as a prescription medicine. These organizations include the Lymphoma Foundation of America, the National Association for Public Health Policy, the Multiple Sclerosis Foundation, as well as several state medical and nurses associations."

Purported Ringleader Of Arizona Meth Operation Gets Life Sentence. The Arizona Daily Star (2/13) reported the "ringleader of one of Tucson's largest methamphetamine organizations was sentenced to life in prison Monday. Timothy Owens, 50, was convicted last month on 22 felony counts following a three-week trial in Pima County Superior Court." The Counter Narcotics Alliance "was asked by the Tucson Police Department for help in investigating the burgeoning methamphetamine business in Midtown. It was soon afterward that Rich Kivi, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, discovered that many of the same people were being arrested again and again on drug-related charges only to be released to commit new crimes while awaiting trial." The Daily Star says Owens was included on the list of repeat offenders.

The AP (2/14) reports a similar story.

Former New York Trooper Pleads Guilty To Impersonating DEA Agent. The Newark Star Ledger (2/14) reports Michael Gluchowski, a former New York state trooper, has admitted posing as a DEA agent in a "raid." The Star Ledger says Gluchowski "could face up to three years in prison and a $250,000 fine." The Star Ledger reports John Yauch, the public defender representing Gluchowski, "had [an] innocent explanation for his client's actions: He was doing research for a book about his years with the DEA."

Congress Expected To Evaluate 2006 Anti-Meth Package. In the Modesto (CA) Bee (2/13) Michael Doyle wrote, "The House meth caucus is bigger than ever. … But none of this means the 110th Congress will do something new about the drug. Instead, 2007 may turn out to be a year for consolidation, as lawmakers evaluate results from their most recent anti-meth package signed by President Bush in March." The 2006 legislation "authorizes $99 million a year for meth-related enforcement, training and research. Next year, though, lawmakers must decide how much money to actually provide." Lawmakers "also must decide how much money will be devoted to the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas, such as the Fresno-based program targeting the valley methamphetamine trade."

Former Customs Agent Gets 9-Year Sentence In Cocaine-Smuggling Case. The Arizona Daily Star (2/14) reports a former customs officer "was sentenced to nine years in prison Tuesday after he knowingly allowed a vehicle with 440 pounds of cocaine inside to come into the United States. Fernando Arango, 52, was working for U.S. Customs and Border Protection at the port of entry in Nogales when he decided to counsel a person who he believed to be a drug trafficker on how to purchase an RV and have it altered to smuggle drugs into the country, according to…the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona."

The Arizona Republic (2/13) reported Officials "said while he still worked for the Border Patrol, Arango taught a person, whom he believed was a drug smuggler, how to have a vehicle altered with a hidden compartment to smuggle drugs into the United States."

The AP (2/14) reports Arango "was caught in a sting operation in October, 2005 when a law enforcement informant met him and paid him for his help."

IMMIGRATION:

Bank Of America To Issue Credit Cards Without Social Security Numbers. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Reckard, Streitfeld, Uribarri) reports, "Bank of America said Tuesday that it was issuing credit cards to Spanish-speaking immigrants who may not have Social Security numbers, triggering complaints that the nation's largest retail bank is tacitly endorsing illegal immigration." The Times continues, "The bank described the program as a pilot, limited for now to 51 branches in Los Angeles County, and said it could go national this year. … The credit cards are not aimed specifically at illegal immigrants, a bank spokeswoman said, but instead people who lack solid credit histories. Even so, the bank was bombarded with angry phone calls." The Times adds, "On Capitol Hill, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) accused the lender of aiding terrorists, while the Department of Homeland Security worried that the program could be exploited by criminals. … 'At face value the program seems to be problematic,' said Russ Knocke, a department spokesman. 'It seems to be lending itself to possibilities of perpetrating identity theft or creating more risk for money laundering.'" The Times notes, "The bank's program may be controversial, but it also vividly demonstrates that businesses view the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants not as lawbreakers but as customers. … Other major banks including Wells Fargo & Co. and Citibank have launched similar initiatives to gain customers in the burgeoning Latino community. … Wells Fargo began a pilot program last year in Los Angeles and Orange counties to offer home mortgages to immigrants who have lived in the United States for at least two years. The customers are allowed to identify themselves using taxpayer numbers issued by the Internal Revenue Service instead of Social Security numbers. That's the same type of identification number an immigrant can use to obtain a credit card under Bank of America's pilot program. … A Justice Department official declined to comment on the legality of the program."

Feinstein Wants Explanation For Ex-Border Agents' "Extreme" Sentences. The Washington Times (2/14, Seper, 88K) reports Sen. Dianne Feinstein has written Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking them "to explain the 'extreme' prison sentences two US Border Patrol agents received for shooting a fleeing drug-smuggling suspect." The senator wrote "that the government's prosecution had a 'chilling effect' on the ability of other agents to carry out their duties and had significantly affected their morale." Feinstein said Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean "were given 'sentences that some individuals who are convicted of murder wouldn't receive.'"

TAX:

Bill Would Reduce Underpayment Of Capital Gains Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C3, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that in an effort "to raise government revenues without raising taxes, a bipartisan group of lawmakers will join President Bush today in supporting a plan to require securities brokers, mutual funds and others to report the original purchase price that an investor paid for stocks, bonds and other securities, and thus cut down on underreporting of capital gains." The proposal "aims to help close the 'tax gap' -- the difference between what the government collects in revenue each year and what it believes it is entitled to collect." Internal Revenue Service researchers "estimate the gap at about $290 billion a year, and lawmakers -- as well as Mr. Bush -- would like to tap into that money to help pay for other priorities."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Negroponte Confirmed At Deputy Secretary Of State. The Washington Post's (2/14, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that the Senate on Monday confirmed former national intelligence director John Negroponte as deputy secretary of state. Kamen sys "Negroponte's portfolio as deputy was expected to include the pesky North Korea nuke problem. But Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill appears to have hammered out an agreement on that. Maybe it was because the North Koreans heard Negroponte was coming?"

White House Sends Khalilzad Nomination To Senate. The Washington Post's (2/14, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that the White House "has sent up to the Senate the nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, now our man in Baghdad, to be ambassador to the United Nations." The move Monday came "nearly two months after his selection was announced," but the Senate, "barring some unforeseen fracas, may confirm him in early March." Meanwhile, Ford M. Fraker, an investment banker and former head of banking at Saudi International Bank, was nominated to be ambassador to Saudi Arabia, while Lt. Gen. Dell L. Dailey, "now director of the center for special operations at MacDill Air Force Base, has been tapped to be the State Department's coordinator for counterterrorism."

Bush Criticized For Lack Of Black Judicial Nominees. The National Law Journal (2/14, Maclean) reports, "In nine of 11 Southern states, President George W. Bush has never nominated an African-American for any of 62 openings for federal trial court judgeships, according to federal court data." The Journal continues, "In his home state of Texas, the president has not nominated a single black judge to the federal bench in 18 nominations sent to the Senate during the past six years, according to Leslie Proll, director of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund's Washington office." The Journal adds, "The lack of black nominees has caused some African-American lawyers to express concern that retiring black judges appointed years ago will leave a new crop of Southern lawyers who may never see a black judge on the federal bench. … Mississippi and Alabama have not had a black judge appointed in more than 20 years, a situation Proll called, 'very egregious. So many of the Carter judges are leaving the court through death or retirement. Generations are changing on the bench, and nobody is following them,' she said." The Journal notes, "In Alabama, where all nine Bush nominees have been white, U.S. Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., said, 'It is inconceivable to me that there has not been a black judge of caliber to serve on the federal bench in the last 20 years. .. The first thing you hear is they can't find anyone qualified. That is not plausible, given the number of black lawyers in the state,' Davis said." The Journal notes, "The more powerful federal appellate courts of the 4th, 5th and 11th U.S. circuit courts of appeals have fared little better with black nominations. Of 14 nominees, no blacks have been proposed for the 5th or 11th circuits. … Bush has nominated three blacks to the 4th Circuit -- Claude Allen of Virginia, who later withdrew in the face of Democratic opposition; Judge Roger Gregory, originally a recess appointment by President Clinton renominated by Bush in 2001; and Judge Allyson Duncan of North Carolina, confirmed in 2003."

Black Lawmakers Have Low Expectations For Bush Meeting. Roll Call (2/14, Yachnin) reports members of the Congressional Black Caucus "said Tuesday they weren't getting their hopes up in advance of this week's private meeting with President Bush, the first such planned encounter in two years." Even as "many of the group's 44 lawmakers confirmed they plan to attend Thursday's White House meeting, acknowledging the event's importance, Members offered doubt that the session would yield any tangible results." Rep. Elijah Cummings said, "It's only logical that we have to consider what has happened in the past at these meetings." Roll Call adds Rep. John Conyers "asserted that even the power-switch that put Democrats in control of Congress — although nonpartisan, the CBC's membership includes no Republicans — will have little impact on the session's outcome." Conyers said, "I expect nothing from the president."

ABA Supports Pay Raises For Federal Judges. The AP (2/14, Sherman) reports, "The 420,000-member American Bar Association came to the defense of judges during its Miami meeting, expressing support for a pay raise for federal judges and pledging to defend aggressively against ballot measures that compromise judicial independence." The AP continues, "ABA President Karen Mathis told her membership Monday that district judges, who earn $165,200 a year, certainly should be paid more than first-year lawyers at New York City firms. Starting annual salaries there now are $160,000." The AP adds, "Former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker recently wrote that district judges would be making roughly $100,000 a year more today had their pay risen at the same pace as U.S. salaries generally. .. .Chief Justice John Roberts also highlighted judicial pay in his year-end report, noting that judges were leaving their lifetime-tenure jobs at an alarming rate for much better-paying jobs in the private sector."

House Panel Would Curb Government Review Of Foreign Investments. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A11, Hitt, 2.04M) reports a House committee "voted to curb the government's ability to reopen reviews into how foreign investments in U.S. companies might affect national security. But some business leaders said the proposed change doesn't go far enough." The issue concerns "the Bush administration's decision to reserve the right to revisit -- and potentially unwind -- foreign-led deals, even after they have been cleared by the U.S. government." The Bush administration "insisted on including such an 'evergreen authority' clause as part of its approval in November of the $11.6 billion purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by France's Alcatel SA. Business, concerned about the uncertainty added by such a clause, has lobbied Congress over the issue." The House Financial Services Committee, "acting on an amendment advanced by its chairman, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), yesterday approved a measure requiring that any decision to expose business deals to additional security reviews be triggered at the most senior levels of the government."

Bush Budget Ties Increased Drug Industry Fees To FDA Funding. USA Today (2/14, 1B, Schmit, 2.27M) reports President Bush's proposed budget "will create new industry fees to help finance the Food and Drug Administration, tying it more closely to the businesses it regulates." The FDA says "fees help it get good products to market faster, but critics say they give business too much influence. At a congressional hearing Tuesday on the FDA's drug-review record, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said the drug-review fees already in place have helped compromise the FDA's ability to ensure a safe drug supply." Of the FDA's "proposed $2.1 billion budget for fiscal 2008, 21.3% would come from user fees paid mostly by drug, medical device and food companies. That's about the same as in last year's proposed budget." In addition "to criticism from some members of Congress, the drug industry is questioning the growth of user fees, too."

Senators Offer Healthcare Reform Plan To Bush. The AP (2/14, Freking) reports that five Republican senators and five Democratic senators "told President Bush on Tuesday that they have agreed on a blueprint for increasing health insurance coverage, and they would like to work with him on it," and the White House "quickly took the lawmakers up on their offer." The AP continues, "The senators said they disagreed that the Senate is too divided to pass comprehensive health care legislation. Their blueprint, while vague on many points, contains two proposals that are essential, said Sen. Ron Wyden," an Oregon Democrat. The AP continues, "The first point was a 'big lift' for Republicans, he said. It acknowledges that legislation should ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality health insurance, while protecting current government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid. The second point required compromise from Democrats, he said, because they agreed with Bush that the current federal tax rules for health insurance disproportionately favor the rich while promoting inefficiency." The AP also notes that "Wyden said the lawmakers were not endorsing the president's tax proposal. They only acknowledged that the current tax rules were problematic."

Medical Establishment Said To Oppose Healthcare Reform. The Washington Post's Steven Pearlstein (2/14) writes, "It's hardly an original point, but now that health-care reform is back on the political agenda, it's worth emphasizing: The reason the system has been so resistant to change is that lots of powerful interests do very nicely with things just the way they are. Or, put another way: Although doctors, hospitals, insurers and drug companies say they, too, want things to change, any comprehensive reform would reduce their incomes and their profits."

Senate Poised To Pass $464 Billion Spending Bill. The AP (2/14, Taylor) reports, "The Senate is poised to send President Bush a huge spending bill that strikes a balance between Democrats controlling Congress and Republicans whose budget work stalled last year." The "catchall $464 billion measure would fund 13 Cabinet agencies covering foreign aid and every domestic agency save for the Homeland Security Department." A final vote "is slated for Wednesday after Democrats on Tuesday won a key vote to limit debate by a lopsided 71-26 margin." The measure "will be the first major bill to work its way through both the House and Senate since the Democratic takeover, but it also has support from Bush because it sticks within the overall budget limit he and congressional Republicans set last year." The Washington Times/AP (2/14) says the bill "reflects the priorities of its authors, the Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, who shifted funds from Mr. Bush's requests for foreign aid and military base projects to popular programs such as health research, law enforcement and low-income housing. Most of the funding shifts were small but were needed to avoid furloughs or other problems at agencies such as the FBI that are limping along at or below last year's funding levels."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A13, Rogers, 2.04M) notes the Senate vote "came as the House began debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush's decision to send at least 21,500 more U.S. troops to try to curb sectarian violence in Iraq. The twin events underscore how central defense spending will be to the 2008 budget debate this spring, and how emotions over the Iraq war can make the debate more difficult for both parties."

Democratic Spending Bill Said To Include "Accounting Gimmicks." McClatchy (2/14, Rosen) reports that when President Bush "sent Congress his 2008 budget last week, Democratic lawmakers accused him of using accounting gimmicks to appear fiscally responsible and intent on reducing the federal deficit." But it "turns out, the Democrats have some accounting tricks of their own. A massive spending bill to fund the government through September contains billions of dollars in savings that exist only on paper, but which free up real money to spend on discretionary programs Bush has sought to cut." The House "passed the $463.5 billion appropriations legislation Jan. 31, and the Senate took it up Tuesday." Budget experts "from both parties, including current and former lawmakers and senior aides, said the Democrats' legislation relies on various types of creative accounting and side deals in order for it to appear to avoid new deficit spending." Among other "gimmicks," the measure "provides $2.49 billion for the ongoing realignment and closing of military bases, less than half the amount authorized by the last Congress. There is bipartisan agreement to make up the difference - $3.14 billion - in subsequent 'emergency' supplemental appropriations." The measure also "eliminates $3.5 billion in 'contract authority' for federal highway projects, but it doesn't decrease 'obligation limitations' by an equivalent amount."

Business Groups Ready Opposition To Union Organizing Bill. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A13, Cummings, 2.04M) reports business interests "are bracing for their first clash with the Democratic Congress, raising millions of dollars to defeat a proposal to ease labor-organizing efforts." A House committee "is set to begin work today on the Employee Free Choice Act, which would give greater legal protection for union organizers and would let workers choose to organize simply by signing pro-union cards rather than holding a federally supervised election." Labor leaders "made enactment of such a law a priority, after spending heavily in last year's elections to help their Democratic allies win control of Congress." The AFL-CIO "and other labor groups say that having the ability to organize workers through a card-signing process will help them to stem the multidecade decline in union representation."

Roll Call (2/14, Newmyer) reports that in "what is set to be their first major showdown since Democrats took control of Congress, business and labor interests are poised for a multimillion-dollar clash over a measure to make it easier for workers to unionize." The "deep-pocketed corporate lobbying groups have joined together to defeat the proposal, today announcing the launch of a new coalition to coordinate their activities. The effort, called the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, has the backing of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business, among others." On the other side is "an informal alliance of labor groups, headed by the AFL-CIO and the breakaway Change to Win unions, working across a divide in the labor movement to advance the measure. They also have the backing of Americans United, a liberal group closely aligned with Congressional Democrats." The bill at issue "in the fight is the Employee Free Choice Act. A top priority for labor unions and Democratic leadership, the bill would allow employees at a workplace to organize once a majority sign cards indicating they want to join a union."

Sweeney Says Lindsey Mischaracterized Union Organizing Bill. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (2/12), AFL-CIO president John Sweeney says, "In response to Lawrence B. Lindsey's mischaracterization of the Employee Free Choice Act ('Abrogating Workers' Rights,' editorial page, Feb. 2): In fact, workers can still petition for a union election under the Employee Free Choice Act. The new legislation simply gives workers another choice, to form unions when a majority signs authorization cards. Such procedures have been in place since 1935 -- but today the choice is up to the boss, and it should be up to workers." Lindsay "claims that under the new legislation, workers couldn't decertify a union by signing a card. The fact is, they already can, and that wouldn't change. If workers present to their employer a petition or other evidence that a majority no longer want the union, the employer can legally withdraw recognition and refuse to bargain."

Norwood Dies Of Lung Disease. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There was a pause in that Iraq debate today in memory of Republican Congressman Charlie Norwood, who died this morning at his home in Augusta, Georgia after a long battle with lung disease. He was a conservative, swept into office in the GOP wave of 1994. He was a dentist and a passionate advocate of a patients' bill of rights, aimed at giving consumers better access to healthcare in this country. Charlie Norwood was 65 years old."

The AP (2/14, Evans) reports Norwood, "a blunt-spoken Georgia Republican who sold his dental practice and ran for Congress at age 52, died Tuesday after battling cancer and lung disease." President Bush, "in a statement, described Norwood as 'a good friend and a strong, spirited legislator who always stuck to his principles.'" The "vacancy created by his death will be filled by a special election." Norwood "wasn't afraid to criticize his own party when he thought it was veering off course. Last year he called Republicans who backed compromise immigration legislation 'turncoats.'" Norwood's "passion was health care. Taking on insurance companies, he spent much of his political career pressing for a 'patients' bill of rights' aimed at giving consumers better access to care, including greater ability to sue insurers."

Roll Call (2/14, Whittington) reports that as "politicians from Capitol Hill to Atlanta mourned the death of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.) on Tuesday, calculations and preparations already were under way for a special election to fill the vacancy in the Augusta-based 10th district." Among the "local GOP lawmakers considered most likely to run to succeed Norwood are state Rep. Barry Fleming and state Sens. Ralph Hudgens and Jim Whitehead." Former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) and state Rep. Ben Harbin (R) "also have been mentioned as possible candidates. However, Harbin's perch as chairman of the Appropriations Committee is a powerful incentive for him to stay put." In Georgia, "state lawmakers must resign their seats once they qualify to run in a special election — a requirement that could severely limit what otherwise would be a large field of candidates." Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) "now has 10 days to issue a writ of election, which will allow the Georgia secretary of state's office to set the date for the special election. The contest, which must occur 30 days after the writ of election is issued, will be an all-party primary in which the first-place finisher must get more than 50 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff."

Bush's Comments About His Father Noted. The New York Times (2/14, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "It was a moment of public sentimentality that seemed almost un-Bush-like. Speaking on C-Span on Monday, President Bush said of his father, 'I am actually more concerned about him than I have ever been in my life, because he's paying too much attention to the news.' Mr. Bush continued: 'I understand how difficult it is for a person who loves somebody to see them out in the political process and to kind of endure the criticism. My answer to him is, 'Look, don't pay attention to it. I'm doing fine.' His comments were a rare window into a complicated father-son relationship that has been a source of endless fascination in Washington and promises to fascinate future historians no less."

Ellison Complains To Police About Tancredo's Cigar Smoke. The Hill (2/14, Rothstein) reports Rep. Keith Ellison "called the Capitol Hill Police on" Rep. Tom Tancredo last Wednesday night "as Tancredo was in his office smoking a cigar. The lawmakers have neighboring offices on the first floor of the Longworth House Office Building. Tancredo was still stunned a day later. 'It's very bizarre,' said Tancredo, who has never met Ellison. 'Seemed to me not a good way to say hello.'" The Hill goes on to report that a police officer "walked in to check on the smoke. The officer told Tancredo that the officer came because he was required to do so and not because the officer wanted to. The officer had already told Ellison that Tancredo was permitted to smoke in his office. The visit was more a formality."

NYTimes Seeks Ban On Congressional Leadership PACs. The New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) reports, "Critics in Congress know the free-flowing PAC's, as the next big scandal waiting in the wings, should be banned under campaign finance law. The leaders of the House Democratic campaign committee, in fact, have already canceled the committee's annual ski weekend for lobbyists. Members should follow suit and ban the grossly misnamed leadership PACs as a step toward serious campaign finance reform."

OTHER NEWS:

Trade Deficit Hits New Record. USA Today (2/14, 2B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "Here's a news flash: The U.S. trade deficit set a record last year. If that seems pretty much like a dog-bites-man story, maybe it's because 2006 marked the fifth-consecutive year that the trade deficit hit a new high." The US "last ran an annual trade surplus in 1975 as the Vietnam War wound down and Saturday Night Live made its television debut. … There's hope, however, that the US trade imbalance with the rest of the world in goods and services may have peaked. 'It's going to get a bit better,' says Nigel Gault, chief US economist at Global Insight."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A2, Price, 2.04M) reports "economists said trade is likely to contribute to growth in coming months, as exports continue on an uptrend and oil prices, which surged in December, fall back. Economists have long predicted that as economic demand among top US trading partners caught up with rapid US economic growth, the US trade deficit would shrink."

The New York Times (2/14, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "The record trade deficit was no surprise, since it had been foreshadowed in monthly figures over the last year. But in the current tense political climate in Washington, it was seized upon by both the Bush administration and its critics. It also seemed certain to become a factor in the accelerating presidential race." The Times adds, "Leading Bush administration officials noted that although the deficit had reached new levels, exports of American products were also growing at record rates, in many cases to the countries with which the United States had signed trade deals in the last six years. 'Our exports for the last year are up by nearly 13 percent,' Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, said in a telephone interview. 'We've said all along that our strategy is to grow exports and ensure that companies know about the trade agreements we have, rather than a protectionist strategy of cutting off imports.'" Democrats "used the latest trade numbers to demand what the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, called 'a new direction' in trade policies, placing more emphasis on opening foreign markets to American goods, protecting American products from piracy and counterfeiting, and helping American industry become more competitive."

The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Goodman, Henderson, 690K) also says the data "raised tensions in Washington, unleashing criticism on Capitol Hill of the Bush administration's pursuit of new trade deals. They also provoked a fresh round of demands for action against China, whose trade surplus with the United States swelled to a record $233 billion last year, according to the Commerce Department." In Congress, the Democratic leadership "used the record deficit to accuse the Bush administration of selling out the interests of American workers in pursuit of trade deals. In a letter to President Bush, top Democrats, including…Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, called the trade deficit 'unsustainable,' listing among its consequences 'failed businesses, displaced workers, lower real wages and rising inequality.' … A White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, said the letter was 'not the most helpful approach.'" But "he added that the White House would 'work with Congress' in seeking approval for new trade deals."

Stocks Up. NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 8, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the blue chips spiked on rumors that aluminum giant Alcoa is somehow a takeover target. The Dow finished up at 102 points to close at 12,654.85] on the day. NASDAQ was up nine and a half points [to close at 2,459.88] on the day." The Wall Street Journal (2/14, C1, Browning, 2.04M) notes "the blue-chip average is up 1.5% for 2007. The last record close was 12673.68, on Feb. 1." Also yesterday, "the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.76%, or 10.89 points, to 1444.26, up 1.8% in 2007." The Washington Post (2/14, D1, Tse, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports on the stock market.

Bernanke To Testify Before Congress. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, 2.04M) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke begins his two-day semiannual economic report to Congress, with financial markets braced for hawkish signals on interest rates. The economy continues to chug along despite the drag from the slower housing market, and investors are concerned that a future rate increase is still on the table. Mr. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill begins at 10 a.m. EST." USA Today (2/14, 3B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) says Bernanke "will likely be peppered with questions about why wages are not rising at a more rapid pace. But he may have to leave lawmakers guessing." USA Today adds, "That's because economists aren't sure why wages haven't increased at a faster pace even though the labor market is tight. A tight labor market is often a precursor to a big pickup in pay as employers enter into bidding wars to attract and retain workers."

Economist Sees Budget Surplus In 2009. In a Wall Street Journal (2/14, A-21, 2.04M) op-ed, economist Brian Wesbury writes, "In relative terms, the first five years of the current recovery have been much better than the first five years of the 1990s recovery. But all this has not softened the pessimism of many pundits and politicians who are either unimpressed or expect the whole thing to come crashing down any minute. That is, unless the government firmly grabs the reins of the global economy and steers it clear of disaster." Wesbury adds, "Many believe that the debate is over on global warming, nationalized health care, tax hikes, rich-versus-poor, the trade deficit and 'obscene' oil company profits. Forgotten in this rush to pass judgment on capitalism is the fact that the last two times government seriously tried to control the U.S. economy -- in the 1930s and in the 1970s -- they made a terrible mess of it." Many "of the more acute economic problems supposedly facing the U.S. are evaporating quickly. My models of the federal budget forecast a $115 billion dollar deficit this year, just 0.8% of GDP, less than half the size expected by the White House." A "budget surplus in 2009 is likely," and "[s]urpluses will change the calculus on tax hikes in dramatic fashion. Any argument to repeal the Bush tax cuts will face a strong headwind. This is great news for investors and the economy."

Romney Makes His Candidacy Official At Michigan Event. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney officially declared his candidacy for president yesterday at the Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn, Michigan. Romney's decision to kick-off his candidacy in Michigan capitalizes on the reputation of his father, who served as Michigan's governor, and, according to Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume), allows Romney "to portray himself as someone outside Washington D.C., and outside the sort of thinking and dealing that goes on here. … Casting himself as an outsider, he underscored his commitment to new and innovative thinking, something he pointedly suggested his GOP rivals are incapable of." All three network devoted significant time to covering the announcement, focusing on Romney's Mormonism and formerly liberal views on social matters. ABC World News (2/13, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "what he said and where he said it, spoke volumes about his candidacy. … In front of a new Ford hybrid and a 1963 Rambler once championed by his father, the former Governor of Massachusetts talked about the need for innovation." ABC noted Romney is "eager to highlight his Midwestern values and distance himself from some of the moderate stands he took as governor," but "biggest challenge may be his religion." According to the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 9, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M), "apparently many people are asking, Mitt who? A new CBS News poll found that 72% of Americans haven't heard enough about the former Governor of Massachusetts to form an opinion. Then there's the issue of his religion. Romney is Mormon, and that…may prove to be an obstacle as he embarks on his campaign. … A CBS News poll shows that most Americans don't know enough about the religion to have an opinion. Yet, more than two-thirds say they could vote for a qualified Mormon."

NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 9, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) said Romney "has real challenges. He says he is the true social conservative in the race, opposed to abortion and gay marriage. But here was Romney in 1994." Romney was shown saying, "I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country"; and "I feel that all people should be allowed to participate in the Boy Scouts regardless of their sexual orientation." NBC also characterized Romney's religion as his "biggest hurdle."

Despite an enormous amount of recent media attention, the AP (2/14, Sidoti) portrays Romney as "a lesser-known Republican in a jam-packed presidential field." The AP notes the symbolism of yesterday's event and emphasizes that Romney is "casting himself as a political outsider with the managerial skills necessary to fix a flawed Washington." The AP adds, "His political resume thin…Romney sought to turn that potential weakness into a strength, portraying himself as the best candidate to meet the country's challenges given his venture capitalist background and proven leadership in the public, private and volunteer sectors. In doing so, he attempted to draw a stark distinction between his qualifications and those of" Sen. John McCain.

USA Today (2/14, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports, "Only one Republican presidential candidate has run a business, governed a state and turned an ailing Olympics into a success story. That record…Romney said Tuesday, makes him uniquely qualified to transcend Washington's 'petty politics' and deliver change. … The Michigan launch allowed Romney to focus on his Midwestern roots rather than the liberal state he governed until last month." USA Today notes that Romney's challenges include "his Mormon religion and changing positions on issues such as abortion, gay rights, emergency contraception and stem cell research."

The Politico (2/14, Martin) reports, "Along with two of his siblings, his wife, five sons and daughters-in-law and a bevy of grandchildren, the son of an automobile executive-turned-Michigan governor spoke to about 600 people. … Pivoting into his campaign message, the former venture capitalist declared in his 20-minute speech that 'if there ever was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it is now.' Romney would return again and again to those buzzwords. He used 'innovation' 10 times and 'transformation' eight times." The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Pearson, 617K) reports, "Though he didn't mention Democratic Sen. Barack Obama or any other candidates by name, Romney also said voters should not be content with candidates who make broad appeals to voters' hopes. 'Our hopes and dreams are going to inspire us, because we are an optimistic people,' he said. 'But let me tell you, just hoping is simply crossing your fingers. What we really need are hands that will go to work. It's time for hope and action. It's time that we do as well as dream.'" The Boston Globe (2/14, Helman, 413K) reports, "Even with the soaring language, Romney…at times struck an uncharacteristically subdued tone, especially in the beginning of his address. The crowd also missed some applause lines, making for some awkward pauses."

Romney Struggling To Establish Conservative Bona Fides. The Washington Post (2/14, A1, Kornblut, 690K) describes Romney as a "Mormon father of five," who "brings personal wealth, dashing looks and business credentials to a race that is relatively open." The Post goes on to report that while Romney "focused…on his executive experience over the past decade and a half, his political evolution during that time is proving problematic: A significant obstacle is his history as a self-described moderate Republican during his 1994 Senate campaign. On issues such as abortion and gay rights, Romney has made sizable shifts since then, exposing himself to charges of inconsistency and political opportunism. He spoke directly about social issues in his announcement. … The emphasis contrasted with his words in 1994, when he at one point argued that the 'gay community needs more support from the Republican Party' and presented himself as the candidate to make that happen." Romney "says that he no longer favors a federal nondiscrimination law for gay men and lesbians, and that he would not support allowing them to serve in the military. He has also altered his stance on abortion, saying he would now support overturning the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A12, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "For months, Mr. Romney has struggled to persuade conservatives that he opposes abortion and gay rights, despite videotaped comments to the contrary from his past campaigns in more liberal Massachusetts. Yesterday, he struck the notes that Christian conservatives listen for." The New York Times (2/14, Nagourney, 1.16M) notes Romney "made only passing mention to abortion and gay rights and used the kind of coded language that would be recognized by people familiar with the debate, in what appeared to be an accommodation to the larger audience a candidate faces when announcing. And he dropped a description of Americans as 'God-fearing' that was included in his prepared text." The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Barabak, 850K) reports Romney "spoke of God, family and morality…but made only passing mention of abortion and gay rights."

McCain Event Showcases Former Romney Supporters. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) noted that McCain's campaign "is playing hardball, staging a news conference with former Romney supporters who switched to McCain. While Romney is pro-life now, he supported abortion rights in the nineties. McCain, they said, had been a reliable conservative all along." Michigan state Rep. Judy Emmons: "His commitment to protecting life at every level from conception on, and the fact of the matter is that he has been strong in his convictions…for decades."

Morris Says Romney Has Been Overtaken By Gingrich As Conservatives' Alternative. In his column for The Hill (2/14) Dick Morris claims that former House speaker Newt Gingrich "appears to be moving up into contention, overtaking former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and battling to be the conservative alternative to either former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani or Arizona Sen. John McCain. … Unnoticed by most pundits, Gingrich seems to be building a lead over Romney and a host of conservative wannabes." Morris adds, "As McCain drops in the polls…some conservatives seem eager for a 'real Republican' to challenge for the nomination. … Hungry for new ideas and desperate after losing Congress, Republican voters seem to be rallying to the only real genius in the race — the former Speaker. The statute of limitations seems to have expired on his personal scandals and Gingrich is striking a responsive chord among conservatives."

USA Today/Gallup Poll Shows Clinton, Giuliani Maintaining Leads. USA Today (2/14, 6A, Page, 2.27M) reports that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) and ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "widened leads over their rivals in recent weeks as they began to openly campaign for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. The survey taken Friday through Sunday…shows Clinton with a 19-percentage-point edge over Illinois Sen. Barack Obama among Democrats and Giuliani with a 16-point margin over Arizona Sen. John McCain among Republicans. A month earlier, Clinton had led by 11 points and Giuliani by 4. Though Clinton and Obama have faced questions about whether the nation is ready to elect the first woman or African-American as president, the poll finds that other traits may pose higher hurdles. More than four in 10 say they wouldn't vote for a 'generally well-qualified person' for president who was 72 years old -- the age McCain will reach in August 2008. Three in 10 say they wouldn't vote for someone who has been married three times, as has Giuliani. In contrast, 11% rule out voting for a woman and 5% for a black." USA notes, "In potential general-election matchups, Giuliani defeats Obama by 9 points and leads Clinton by 2 points, within the survey's three-point margin of error. McCain ties Obama and trails Clinton by 3 points."

By 45-31, More Voters Intend To Vote For Democratic Candidate. The Wall Street Journal (2/14,

2.04M) reports Clinton "is leading the pack of presidential hopefuls as the campaign for the 2008 election begins, a new poll indicates. The Harris Interactive poll, which was conducted online Feb. 2-8, among 3,423 adults, shows that 20% of U.S. adults would most likely vote for Ms. Clinton if they had to choose one candidate from a list of those who may run. Ten percent of those surveyed said they would vote for Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) and 8% said they would choose former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani. The poll indicates that for 45% of respondents, their first choice for president would be a Democratic candidate, while 31% would choose a Republican candidate. When asked to pick from a list of leaders they would consider for president, 45% said they would consider voting for Hillary Clinton, while 37% said they would consider Mr. Obama, 32% said they would consider Colin Powell and 29% said they would consider Mr. Giuliani. Forty-one percent of Republicans polled indicated they would consider a Democratic leader for president, while 35% of Democrats said they would consider a Republican candidate."

Giuliani Hedges His Support For Bush's Handling Of Iraq War. The New York Times (2/14, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports, "In every speech he makes…Giuliani talks about Iraq and makes clear that he sides with President Bush, endorsing the war and the deployment of 21,500 more troops. His chief rivals…take the same stances. But in discussing the deployment of more troops, Mr. Giuliani has been alone in saying that such a strategy may not succeed, potentially providing him cover should the situation in Iraq deteriorate further. And he has put the strategy in a broader context that plays down the importance of Iraq. Terrorists 'are going to continue to be at war with us, no matter what the outcome in Iraq,' Mr. Giuliani said recently in New Hampshire. The night before, he said that 'there are no sure things,' and that if the United States fails in Iraq, 'we have to be ready for that, too.' In California a few days later, speaking of 'the danger of focusing on Iraq too much,' he said that complete success there would not win the fight against terrorism, and that failure there would not lose it."

Giuliani's Speeches Stick To Familiar Themes. The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Finnegan, 850K) reports, "In five days of campaigning in California, Giuliani has made terrorism his paramount focus -- that and his story of a New York turnaround on his watch at City Hall. … But while testing themes, he has stuck to tightly controlled events that minimize his exposure to tough questions on the Iraq war, domestic policy or the private business deals and speeches that have made him wealthy. A supporter of President Bush's troop buildup, Giuliani has framed Iraq as a battle in the war on terrorism without addressing questions on its original rationale."

1994 Campaign Memo Analyzes Giuliani's "Weirdness Factor." The Washington Post (2/14, A3, Kurtz, 690K) reports that a "vulnerability study" undertaken by former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani's own 1994 campaign, "including warnings about his 'weirdness factor' and other perceived liabilities, surfaced. … The 1993 report by two aides in Giuliani's mayoral campaign was obtained by Village Voice reporter Wayne Barrett for a book on Giuliani and was posted on the Smoking Gun Web site." The Post goes on to report, "The 'weirdness' question involved Giuliani's first marriage, to his second cousin. He had his 14-year union with Regina Peruggi annulled on grounds that the Roman Catholic Church had never properly approved the marriage. The 1993 memo said that Giuliani had given a 'wide array of conflicting answers' about his personal life, bringing 'the soundness of his judgment' into question. … The memo also reported the 'charge' that 'Giuliani received special treatment from a friendly federal judge to avoid military service during the Vietnam War,' and later 'hypocritically prosecuted draft dodgers.' Giuliani, who was dropped by an Air Force ROTC program because of a hearing problem, received a rare occupational deferment in 1969 after a federal judge wrote a letter about the importance of his duties as a law clerk."

McCain To Officially Announce His Candidacy March 12. Fox News' Special Report (2/13, Hume) reported that Sen. John McCain "is now making plans for his announcement, targeting March 12th to join the race officially."

Second Controversial Edwards Blogger Quits. The New York Times/AP (2/14) reports, "A second blogger working for the Democratic presidential campaign of former Senator John Edwards quit Tuesday under pressure from conservative critics. The blogger, Melissa McEwan, wrote on her personal blog, Shakespeare's Sister, that she had made the decision to quit 'with the campaign's reluctant support, because my remaining the focus of sustained ideological attacks was inevitably making me a liability to the campaign.' On Monday, another blogger, Amanda Marcotte, left the Edwards staff, also after being accused of religious bigotry for earlier writings."

Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, on The O'Reilly Factor (2/13) said Edwards "remains defiant. … Everybody knows that Edwards or any other politician would never employ an anti-Semite, Klan member or a homophobe, while had no problem standing by two anti-Christian women even after seeing the vile things they had written."

Many Senators Considered Potential VP Picks. Roll Call (2/14, Billings) reports, "At least seven Senators are weighing or are engaged in a 2008 presidential run. … Any of those Senators also could be a vice presidential pick if unsuccessful in their respective campaigns to sit atop the 2008 ticket. But beyond that group, a handful of other Senate Democrats and Republicans could be attractive No. 2 picks for their party's presidential candidates." Roll Call continues, "Among them are: Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), the affable Midwesterner who himself was briefly a 2008 presidential candidate; Dianne Feinstein, the experienced, steady Democrat from the electoral-rich state of California; Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Senate leader and strong party loyalist; Jack Reed (R.I.), a West Point graduate and point man for the Democrats on military matters; Jim Webb (Va.), the freshman Democratic rising star whose national security credentials are difficult to match; Ken Salazar (Colo.), a Westerner with a law enforcement background as state attorney general; and Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), a well-versed and well-liked Southerner. Senate Republicans have picks on their side as well, beginning unsurprisingly with presidential hopefuls Brownback, Hagel and McCain. … Beyond that trio, other GOP Senators likely to get strong consideration include Sens. John Thune (S.D.), the telegenic first-term Senator who knocked off then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) in 2004; Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), the conservative Republican Policy Committee chairwoman who has hinted at a possible interest in the job; Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), a one-time presidential hopeful himself; Judd Gregg (N.H.), the wonky Easterner who has become one of his party's most loyal attack dogs; and David Vitter, the conservative Louisianan whose work on behalf of Hurricane Katrina recovery could play heavily in his favor."

Clinton Said To Risk Suffering Muskie's Fate. The Washington Post's Harold Meyerson (2/14, A19) writes, "A specter was haunting Hillary Clinton as she campaigned in New Hampshire this weekend: the specter of Ed Muskie. As the ancient or merely studious among us will recall, the Democratic senator from Maine, who'd been Hubert Humphrey's running mate in 1968, entered his party's presidential contest in 1972 as the front-runner. His prospects were dashed in the New Hampshire snows, however. As popular memory has it, an indignant Muskie started crying while refuting a silly attack on him. … Muskie's more serious problem, however, was the Vietnam War, which he opposed. His opposition, though, had none of the fervor or long-term consistency of another Democratic senator and presidential aspirant, George McGovern." Meyerson adds, "Today, Hillary Clinton seems almost uncannily positioned to become the Ed Muskie of 2008. She opposes the U.S. military presence in Iraq but not with the specificity, fervor or bona fides of her leading Democratic rivals. As Muskie did with Vietnam, she supported the legislation enabling the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and she has been slower and more inconstant than her party rivals in coming around to opposing the continued U.S. occupation."

Dowd Analyzes Obama's Weaknesses. The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (2/14)writes that Sen. Barack Obama "is backed up by a strong, smart wife and a professional campaign team, but he doesn't have a do-whatever-it-takes family firm with contract killers and debt collectors, like Bush Inc. and Clinton Inc. He was eloquent, if not as inspiring as his advance billing had prepared audiences to expect. He made his first Swift-boat-able slip when he had to apologize for talking about soldiers' lives 'wasted' in Iraq. He sounded self-consciously pristine at times, as if he was too refined for the muck of politics. That's not how you beat anybody but Alan Keyes."

DCCC Targeting Ferguson After Extremely Close 2006 Race. The Hill (2/14, Youngman) reports, "Even though Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), is targeting Republican-held seats in New Jersey, state GOP consultants say if Democrats couldn't capitalize on their own party's electoral successes last year, then those seats aren't attainable in 2008. … Perhaps the most vulnerable of those seats is Rep. Mike Ferguson (R), who narrowly defeated state Assemblywoman Linda Stender (D), winning by just more than 1 percent in the wake of press reports alleging inappropriate conduct with a female college student at a Georgetown bar in 2004. Ferguson, who denied the allegations, did not comment for this article. Stender told The Hill this week she is 'looking seriously' at going up against Ferguson again in 2008, and she will make a decision by 'late summer, early fall.'" However, Ed Traz, "a GOP consulting heavyweight in the Garden State," said "taking on Ferguson in 2008 would be a 'waste' of the DCCC's money in light of the large number of resources the committee will need to devote to defending freshman incumbents in Republican districts."

Both Parties Avoid Debate Over Entitlement Spending. The Washington Post's Robert Samuelson (2/14, A19) writes, "The welfare state has made budgeting an exercise in futility. Both liberals and conservatives, in their own ways, peddle phony solutions. Cut waste, say conservatives. Well, network news reports of $20 million federal programs that don't work may seem -- and be -- scandalous, but like Amtrak they're usually mere blips in the total budget. For its 2008 budget, the Bush administration brags it would end or sharply reduce 141 programs. But most are microscopic; total savings would be $12 billion, or 0.4 percent of spending. Worse, Congress has previously rejected some of these cuts."

Nuclear Pact With North Korea Met With Criticism By Conservatives, Democrats. ABC

World News (2/13, story 3, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that under "the potentially historic agreement" signed Tuesday by North Korea, Pyongyang "has 60 days to begin dismantling its nuclear program. In exchange, the US will begin the process of ending trade sanctions and moving North Korea from the list of terror-sponsoring nations. North Korea will also receive almost 1 million tons of fuel."

A number of media reports note the agreement is coming under fire from "both sides of the political spectrum," as the New York Times (2/14, A10, Cooper, Yardley, 1.16M) puts is. The Times says "hardliners argued that the United States should have held out until North Korea agreed to fully declare and dismantle its entire nuclear program," while Democrats "argued that the deal was no better than one they said the United States could have gotten four years ago." Regardless, the Times say the deal "represented a bureaucratic victory for [Secretary] Rice, who has pushed for a more diplomatic approach with North Korea than more hawkish administration officials would have liked. In the end, it was Ms. Rice who convinced President Bush to sign onto the pact, administration officials said."

The Washington Times (2/14, Miller, 88K) says the deal received "faint praise" from Senate Democrats. Majority leader Harry Reid called it a "first step," but said it "still can't fix the mess this administration has created by ignoring North Korea for the past five years."

The CBS Evening News (2/13, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) said "the biggest reason to be skeptical" is whether "North Korea's Kim Jong Il [is] ready to honor this deal. Maybe. But as this unpredictable leader has shown over and over, if his mood changes next month or next year, he may be just as ready to torpedo it." Separately, the CBS Evening News (2/13, story 4, 1:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "no one is popping any champagne corks yet" due to "the unpredictability of Kim Jong Il. However, "North Korea had every reason every incentive to come to the table, the electricity and the oil it so badly needs."

The AP (2/14, Gearan) says the Bush administration called a deal a "breakthrough," but Pyongyang's "history of broken promises kept the celebrations to a minimum." There was "worry, too, that accommodation of North Korea would encourage brinksmanship by Iran or other would-be nuclear states."

The Washington Post (2/14, A11, Kessler, Cody, 690K) also reports the deal "came under attack yesterday, with conservatives labeling it a betrayal and Democrats charging that Bush allowed North Korea to become a nuclear-weapon state without gaining much improvement over a Clinton-era deal that collapsed during Bush's first term." Bush, however, pronounced himself "pleased" with the accord, and Secretary Rice said it is just the beginning of a long process. "This is not the end of the story," she said, calling it the result of "patient, creative and tough diplomacy."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Richter, 850K) says the deal "marks a fundamental shift in direction for the Bush administration," which "provoked outrage from conservative allies of the administration who said it flatly contradicted Bush's previous policy." Meanwhile, "some former Clinton administration officials termed it a step in the right direction but questioned why it took Bush so long."

The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A4, King Jr., Ramstad, 2.04M) says "fading options for the US and North Korea led to a landmark agreement designed to shut down Pyongyang's nuclear program. But the follow-through needed to reach the goal of a denuclearized Korean peninsula could be thwarted by the same problems that plagued earlier deals."

On its front page, the Washington Times (2/14, A1, Lanfranco, 88K) says the "next 60 days will determine whether the new document to halt and eventually eliminate North Korea's nuclear programs will create the momentum to ease tensions in Northeast Asia or will become just another diplomatic chapter in a series of broken promises."

The Los Angeles Times (2/14, Magnier, 850K) says "troublesome signs are already emerging" about Pyongyang's intent to "honor the disarmament promises it made."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/14, Ford, 59K) reports, "Some observers suggest that this agreement could either resolve years of conflict or collapse amid more conflict, crisis, and rhetoric as has happened so often."

A number of different local TV stations across the country broadcast reports on the deal, often contrasting Secretary Rice's positive reaction to the agreement against Bolton's comments. Some examples: KXMC-TV Bismarck (2/13, 10:00 pm) showed Secretary Rice saying, "It is a part of a broad and comprehensive effort not only to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula, but also to advance the future of peace and prosperity in northeast Asia." The station added, "But not everyone thinks this is a good deal. Former UN Ambassador John Bolton says it sends the wrong message and that North Korea should not be rewarded for only partially dismantling its nuclear program." NECN-TV Boston (2/13, 9:23 pm) showcased both Rice and Bolton, and reported, "There is both optimism and criticism about a plan designed to denuclearize North Korea." Bolton was shown challenging the deal, saying, "I just think it's a bad sign. It's a reward for the persistence of the North Koreans that they don't deserve." Other stations offering similar quotes from Bolton and Rice were KGO-TV San Francisco (2/13, 6:34 pm), WIBW-TV Topeka (2/13, 5:18 pm), KJUD-TV Juneau (2/13, 5:14 pm), and KAIT-TV Jonesboro, AR (2/13, 5:11 pm).

Bush's "Weakened" Position Seen As Impetus For Deal. In its analysis, the Financial Times (2/14, Fifield) notes some see the deal as "a partial capitulation by a weakened administration…badly in need of a diplomatic breakthrough to set against his Middle East troubles."

DOJ_NMG_0131784

In a front page analysis, the New York Times (2/14, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) says, "It is hard to imagine that either George W. Bush or Kim Jong-il would have agreed even a year ago to the kind of deal they have now approved. … But in the past few months, the world has changed for both Mr. Bush and Mr. Kim." Bush, "bogged down in Iraq, his authority undercut by the November elections, any chance to show progress in peacefully disarming a country that detonated a nuclear test just four months ago could no longer be passed up."

The Chicago Tribune (2/14, Fang, Osnos, 617K) calls the deal "a rare foreign policy victory at a time when the US faces severe difficulties in Iraq and elsewhere." The AP (2/14, Hutzler) says negotiations now give way "to a more arduous phase: making sure the communist country keeps its promises. Secretive, belligerent and with a reputation for skirting past deals, North Korea makes a rough prospect for arms control inspectors, experts said."

McClatchy (2/14, Strobel) says the deal "blossomed from the sort of diplomatic give-and-take with an adversary that the White House had rejected until recently." Two senior State Department officials said the deal "reflected, in part, Rice's desire for a visible foreign-policy victory to offset setbacks across the Middle East, from Iraq to Iran and Lebanon." It also reflects "a changed power balance within the Bush administration, with Rice at the forefront and Vice President Dick Cheney's influence diminished, at least on this issue and for now."

Deal Seen As Signaling China's Growing Stature In World Stage. Calling it a "sweeping and potentially historic deal," the Financial Times (2/14, A1, Fifield, Dombey) says the accord "cemented China's emergence as a significant power-broker on the world stage" for its "crucial role" in brokering the deal.

Bolton Says Deal Sends "Bad Signal." NBC Nightly News (2/13, story 3, 2:10, Mullen, 9.87M) showed former UN Ambassador John Bolton warning, "I am afraid North Korea has won. Once again they have made a hollow promise and they are going to get tangible economic benefits as a consequence of it."

The Washington Times (2/14, A1, Gertz, 88K) reports in a front page article that Bolton criticized the deal for "making too many concessions" and "gives up key US leverage that blocked illicit financial activities by Pyongyang in the past." In an interview, Bolton said, "It's a bad signal to North Korea and it's a bad signal to Iran" that "if you hold out long enough and wear down the State Department negotiators, eventually you get rewarded."

Berlin Meeting "Critical" In Reaching Final Accord. The New York Times (2/14, Yardley, 1.16M) says talks late last month between Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and North Korean negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, in Berlin were "critical in resuscitating the talks and in shaping the agreement reached Tuesday in Beijing," according to a senior United States official familiar with the American negotiating team.

More Commentary. George Perkovich, director of the nonproliferation program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M), "If the current deal keeps North Korea from producing more bomb material and conducting more nuclear tests, it will be a good thing. If further pay-offs can induce Pyongyang to reduce the stockpile and reassure us that security and control procedures minimize the risks that nuclear materials or bombs could be transferred to terrorists, we should haggle over the price." Therefore, he urges Republicans and Democrats to "urge extending the six-party negotiating forum into a broader exploration of steps to prevent instability in Northeast Asia" and turn "this modest nuclear deal" into "the start of something bigger."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/14, A20, 2.04M) says the deal "strikes us as something close to faith-based nonproliferation." Calling the deal ""marginally better" than the 1994 Agreed Framework reached by the Clinton Administration, the Journal says, "Perhaps Mr. Bush feels this is the best he can do in the waning days of his Administration. Or perhaps, in the most favorable interpretation, he wants to clear the decks of this issue in order to have more political capital to control Iran's nuclear ambitions. Iran may look at this deal, however, and conclude it has little to lose by raising the nuclear stakes. We'd like to believe this will turn out better, but history doesn't support such faith."

The New York Times (2/14, 1.16M) editorializes, "It is welcome news that North Korea has agreed to move toward dismantling its nuclear weapons program," but "there are a lot of other dangers out there. And we hope that Mr. Bush learns the most basic lesson of this week's deal: sometimes you really do have to talk to your enemies, even if you have to grit your teeth."

On its editorial page, the Washington Post (2/14, A18, 690K) writes, "Along with many experts on North Korea, we're skeptical that Mr. Kim would choose to give up nuclear weapons unless he were convinced that the survival of his regime depended on it." Trying to "push Mr. Kim into a permanent shutdown of plutonium production over the next year is certainly worthwhile," the Post continues, but "yesterday's announcement was a start, but as the football-loving Ms. Rice said, 'This is still the first quarter.'"

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/14, 850K) call the deal "score one small point for pragmatism and global sanity." The Times, however, concedes that it is a "very tentative one-page agreement" that "could well collapse within its first 60 days." Conservatives, "predictably, are hollering betrayal," but there are "right," say the Times, "President Bush has changed course." However, "The tactical shift doesn't mean that the US has abandoned its principles; the White House still needs to be prepared to abort this deal if it ultimately proves as hollow as previous accords."

Israeli, Palestinian Officials Differ On Agenda Ahead Of Summit. The AP (2/14, Federman) reports Israeli and Palestinian officials said Tuesday they have "vastly different agendas" for next week's meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "raising serious doubt about the summit's prospects." For their part, the Palestinians "want to jump to talks on a final peace agreement at the Feb. 19 meeting," while Israel said it "will not discuss 'substantial issues' until it learns more about Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' power-sharing agreement with the Hamas militant group."

Jordan, Russia Call For Mideast Accord. The AP (2/14, Halaby, Gavlak) reports Jordan's King Abdullah II and Russian President Vladimir Putin Tuesday called for "a stronger international push for lasting Mideast peace and urged for a diplomatic solution to Iran's nuclear standoff." King Abdullah said he and Putin "agreed that negotiations for the establishment of a viable Palestinian state should be accelerated," calling the Palestinian-Israeli conflict the "core conflict" in the Middle East.

Abbas Still Faces Troubles Forming Unity Government. The Washington Times (2/14, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "As Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas seeks international support for a Hamas-Fatah power-sharing agreement, Palestinian observers warn that formidable obstacles remain, including who will control the security forces." The agreement reached last week in Mecca "lays out principles for cooperation, but implementation still must be worked out." According to the Times, the "most sensitive problem will be overhauling the Palestinian security forces to incorporate thousands of members of a controversial Hamas unit, and the appointment of an interior minister to oversee the job."

Bombings Kills 3 In Lebanon Ahead Of Hariri Anniversary. The New York Times (2/14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "A day before Lebanon prepared to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of its former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, three people were killed and about 23 others wounded when two minibuses were bombed." In a country "so fragile and on edge because of its internal political struggles," the bombings "managed to heighten tensions" in the "first such attack…since the end of Lebanon's 15-year civil war in 1990."

The Washington Post (2/14, A11, Shadid, 690K) reports "in past days, speculation has risen that a deal is possible" between Lebanese factions "with Iranian and Saudi Arabian blessing. But in a visit Monday to Syria, Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa said 'complications' remained. Rumors swirled Tuesday over whose aims the bombings would serve, and some suggested that foreign powers opposed to a deal might have played a role."

American Charged With Aiding Islamic Militants In Somalia. The Washington Post/AP (2/14, A15) reports a former Houston resident "has been charged in Texas with teaming with al-Qaeda" in Somalia. Daniel Joseph Maldonado, also known as Daniel Aljughaifi, "was ordered held without bail Tuesday on federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device." Arrested in Kenya last month, Maldonado is "the first American to be prosecuted on suspicion of joining terrorists in Somalia," Assistant Attorney General Kenneth L. Wainstein said in a statement.

Paulson Outlines Plans For Economic "Dialogue" For China. The Wall Street Journal (2/14, A2, Phillips, 2.04M) reports Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, "under pressure from impatient China-bashers on Capitol Hill, unveiled specific areas where he hopes the Bush administration's economic dialogue with Beijing will show concrete results in the coming months." Paulson said he "is seeking quick action from Beijing in opening Chinese financial markets to foreign firms, employing cleaner Western environmental services and products, enforcing patent and copyright protections and creating domestic pension and health-care benefits that will let ordinary Chinese spend more on consumer goods." Paulson said, "We're going to start making progress [by May, when the next round of talks takes place in Washington]." The Journal adds Paulson's "comments came as he named a former drug-industry lobbyist and former deputy U.S. trade representative, Alan Holmer, to coordinate the strategic dialogue." Meantime, House lawmakers "said they plan to introduce legislation today that would make it easier for the U.S. to retaliate against China for its currency practices."

White House Drops Outreach To Chavez. McClatchy (2/14, Bachelet) reports the Bush Administration "has abandoned efforts to reach out to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, blaming Caracas for showing little interest in taking up U.S. overtures. But even as U.S. officials harden their criticism of Chavez, they say the doors are still open to dialogue." After Chavez "won a big re-election victory in December, Washington seemed to reach out to the feisty socialist leader who routinely lashes out at President Bush as the main cause of the world's ills." Now, "the tough talk is back. In recent weeks, U.S. officials have stepped up their criticism of Chavez's latest moves, such as nationalizing the phone and electricity companies and securing a law so that he may pass legislation without congressional approval."

Putin Said To Be Exploiting Fallout From NATO Expansion. In his New York Times column (2/14), Thomas Friedman says, "Now that high oil and gas prices have made Russia powerful again — the gasman of Europe — Mr. Putin is shoving Russia's resurgent pride right back in our face. In effect, he is saying to America: 'Oh, you talkin' to me? You thought you could tell me that the cold war was over and that NATO expansion was not directed at Russia — but we couldn't be members anyway. Did you really think we were going to believe that? Well, now I'm talkin' to you. Get out of my face.'" Friedman adds, "I'm not here to defend an iron-fisted autocrat like Mr. Putin. But history is prologue. The fact is, we helped to create a mood in Russia hospitable to a conservative cold warrior like Mr. Putin by forcing NATO on a liberal democrat like Mr. Yeltsin. It was a bad decision and one that keeps on giving. Just when we need to be getting Russia's help, we're getting its revenge."

In his Washington Post column (2/14, A19), David Ignatius says, "Putin's comments" in his Munich speech "may be jarring to Americans, but they express a bitterness that's widespread here. His generation of Russians grew up in a country that claimed the status of 'superpower,' and they don't like being taken for granted. Putin, a former KGB officer with a black belt in judo, has been pugnacious in standing up for his country's interests, and Russians seem to like that. In the latest opinion polls, his popularity is well above 70 percent." Russia is "back. That's the real lesson I take from Putin's blunt comments. A country that was near collapse after the fall of Soviet communism has regained enough confidence and stability to take a verbal shot at its old rival."

Bodman Warns Against Possibility Of Gas Cartel. In its "Washington Wire" online column, the Wall Street Journal (2/14, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says the U.S. should continue to develop the infrastructure to import and use liquefied natural gas and warns against the possibility that producing countries could form a cartel to control the price of natural gas. In a speech prepared for delivery Wednesday at an energy conference in Houston, Bodman said that 'initiatives, new or old, which seek to control the flow of energy supplies to the market' and set prices "are contrary to the long term interests of both producers and consumers.'" Bodman "didn't mention any countries, but it just so happens that his remarks coincide with Russian President Vladimir Putin's visit to the Middle East, where he is talking up an international natural gas cartel."

UN Secretary General Faces Backlash For Improving Ties With US. The Washington Post (2/14, A14, Lynch, 690K) reports when UN Secretary General Ban Ki Moon "paid his first official visit to Washington last month, he received the White House version of a seal of approval: a presidential pat on the back and an invitation to phone President Bush whenever he needs help in responding to an international crisis." Ban's "warm reception appeared to signal an end to an era of U.S. confrontation with the United Nations that was marked by quarrels over the Iraq war, Republican-led corruption hearings on Capitol Hill and relentless threats of funding cuts." But "such a turn of fortune in Washington comes at a price: Ban is facing a diplomatic backlash from developing nations, which suspect the former South Korean foreign minister of seeking to reshape the United Nations to accommodate U.S. interests and the desires of other wealthy member nations. They have stonewalled his early attempt to reorganize the U.N. bureaucracy." The standoff "has weakened Ban barely a month into the job, as he faces one of the top challenges confronting every U.N. leader: how to strike a balance between the organization's most powerful member and an influential bloc of developing countries that instinctively resist policies that appear to track with U.S. interests."

Graham Says Sudanese President Deserves Some Credit. The Washington Post (2/14, A15, McCrummen, 690K) reports the "first time that Omar Hassan al-Bashir, the Muslim president of Sudan, met Franklin Graham, the prominent evangelical Christian, the conversation came to a kind of standoff." Graham, who "has called Islam an 'evil and wicked' religion, told Bashir in the 2003 meeting that he wanted to persuade him to become a Christian. Bashir, at the time fighting a civil war in the southern region of the country, told Graham that he wanted to make him a Muslim, Graham recalled." In a meeting "between the two men here Monday night, the semi-serious proselytizing continued. This time, though, Graham said he came away thinking that Bashir, who now stands accused of presiding over the killing of at least 200,000 people in the Darfur region in the country's west, deserves credit for signing the peace agreement with rebels in the south in 2005." Although human rights activists "and some U.S. officials are counseling tougher measures against Bashir's government to end the violence in Darfur -- and to more fully implement a faltering peace agreement with the south -- Graham said that a softer approach is needed." Graham said, "I'm not a politician, but I think our government does need to recognize some steps he's taken and reward this government in some way to show them we appreciate what they have done [regarding southern Sudan]."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror Suspect's Claim: Too Traumatized For Trial (USAT)

By Laura Parker, Usa Today

USA Today, February 14, 2007

The prisoner lived in isolation in a cell with only a steel slab for a bed. At times chained to the floor, he was deprived of light, sleep, a clock and heat. His interrogators injected him with "truth serum" drugs to try to loosen his tongue and threatened him with execution.

That's how Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen held without charge as an "enemy combatant," was treated for three years and eight months at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., his attorneys allege. In court papers, they say Padilla — initially accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" — was treated so severely that it amounted to torture and rendered him mentally incompetent to now stand trial on terrorism charges that could bring him life in prison.

That provocative claim — disputed by the government, which says Padilla was not abused and is fit for trial — will be the focus of a mental competency hearing for Padilla, scheduled for Feb. 22 in a federal court in Miami.

The long-shot effort to have him declared unfit for trial is the latest turn in a case that has become a test of how far the U.S. government can go in limiting the civil liberties of an American in the name of national security.

It pits Padilla — the first American since the Civil War to be held by the military solely on the president's orders — against a government that, under persistent legal challenges, has taken the case on an unusual journey from military detention to the U.S. Supreme Court and then to a federal trial court.

"I don't think there is anything to compare to this case," says Michael Perlin, a professor at New York Law School who specializes in mental health and the law. "This is an extraordinarily singular case."

Government lawyers decline to give details about how Padilla has been treated, but they flatly dispute the defense's version. "It has no merit whatsoever," prosecutors say in papers filed in the court where Padilla is scheduled for trial April 16. He is charged with conspiring to support terrorism overseas as part of a North American terror cell.

The government has said that however it handled the Brooklyn-born Padilla, 36, its actions were necessary to try to learn more about terrorism.

Civil libertarians have waged a marathon court battle challenging Padilla's detention, beginning two days after he was locked up in Charleston in June 2002. He was not allowed to talk with a lawyer until March 2004, 21 months into his confinement.

The accusations against Padilla have evolved as his case has shifted to different courts. Then-attorney general John Ashcroft initially linked him to a "dirty bomb" plot. The Justice Department later tied him to an alleged plot to blow up high-rise apartments in the USA.

However, the charges pending against Padilla mention none of that. He faces three counts that include conspiring to murder, kidnap and maim people overseas, and conspiring to support terrorism by supplying money and materials.

Focus for now is on fitness

For now, the focus is on whether Padilla is mentally fit to stand trial.

At next week's hearing, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke will examine competing assessments of Padilla's mental state by the defense and prosecution. In court documents filed last Friday, prosecutors Russell Killinger and Stephanie Pell cite an analysis by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons in arguing that Padilla is fit for trial. Defense attorneys say the bureau's findings are inaccurate.

Padilla's attorneys plan to call as witnesses civilian and military members of the brig staff who expressed concerns about the effects of extended isolation on Padilla's mental health.

Andrew Patel, one of Padilla's attorneys, describes his own conversations with staff members in court papers. Patel says they told him Padilla was so "docile and inactive that his behavior was like that of 'a piece of furniture.' "

Prosecutors say details about Padilla's detention should be kept out of the trial. They say in court papers that such information could "distract and inflame" jurors. It is unclear how much information Cooke will allow into next week's hearing.

Padilla's attorneys argue that the government's treatment of Padilla "injured" his brain and left him incompetent to understand the proceedings against him. The attorneys have asked Cooke to dismiss the charges, calling Padilla's treatment at the brig so "outrageous, it shocks the conscience."

According to court documents, two mental health experts who examined Padilla for the defense concluded that he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder, triggered by his time in the brig. They said he is unable to watch videos of his interrogations or read transcripts of wiretapped conversations that likely will be used against him in court.

Padilla suffers from memory gaps, is unable to place events in chronological order and has difficulty concentrating, according to Patricia Zapf, a New York psychologist, and Angela Hegarty, a New York psychiatrist. Padilla also suspects his attorneys are federal agents posing as lawyers in order to interrogate him, court papers say.

Padilla told his attorneys and the mental health experts that while he was at the brig he was placed in stress positions, assaulted and told that he would be sent to "an even worse" fate at the U.S. military's prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, where hundreds of foreign terrorism suspects have been held indefinitely. "The torture took myriad forms, each designed to cause pain, anguish, depression and ultimately the loss of will to live," Padilla's attorneys say in court papers.

The defense attorneys also allege that Padilla was injected with LSD or PCP as a sort of "truth serum." Padilla was denied "the most personal shreds of human dignity," his attorneys argue, when he was not allowed to bathe for weeks at a time. "One would have to revisit the history of the Tower of London to find more oppressive pretrial incarceration," the attorneys say.

Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman, won't discuss Padilla's specific claims. But he says, "The government, in the strongest terms, denies Padilla's allegations — allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence. It is and always has been our policy to treat detainees humanely."

Padilla's odyssey

Padilla was born in 1970, the second of five children. His widowed Puerto Rican mother moved the family to Chicago when he was in preschool, defense court papers say. By age 15, Padilla was in a juvenile detention facility. He later moved with his family to Florida, where he converted to Islam.

In 1998, Padilla went to Egypt. The defense papers say Padilla moved there to study Islam. The U.S. government contends in court papers that Padilla traveled to the region as a recruit to fight a holy war and made his way to a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan.

He did not return to the USA until May 8, 2002, when he was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport after stepping off a flight from Zurich. He was taken to New York and held as a material witness in connection with a grand jury investigation of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

On June 9, 2002, President Bush declared Padilla an "enemy combatant," a designation created by the administration for those it aimed to detain indefinitely during the war on terrorism. Padilla then was transferred to the Navy brig.

For the next 21 months, Padilla had little human contact except with his interrogators, court papers filed by the defense say. Guards delivered food through a slot in the door of his cell. In December 2002, a federal judge in New York ordered the government to give Padilla access to an attorney. The government complied 15 months later.

Urging the judge to reconsider, the government argued in court papers in 2003: "Providing him access to counsel … would break, probably irreparably, the sense of dependency and trust the interrogators are attempting to create."

Patel and his co-counsel, Donna Newman, visited Padilla at the brig for the first time in March 2004. There, they learned he was the only occupant in a unit with 10 cells, court papers say. He was kept, sometimes in shackles and manacles, in a 9-by-7-foot cell. The cell's windows were blackened so that no natural light came through.

The legal challenge to the government's right to hold a U.S. citizen without charges moved through federal courts in New York, South Carolina and Virginia, and twice went to the U.S. Supreme Court. Then, in November 2005 — just as the Supreme Court was about to take its second look at the case — the government abruptly shifted course.

Padilla was moved out of military control and into a federal court in Miami. On Nov. 17, he was indicted with four other men accused as operatives in a terror support cell.

The indictment accuses Adham Amin Hassoun, a Lebanese national, and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, a Jordanian and naturalized U.S. citizen, of recruiting Padilla as a mujahedin fighter. It accuses the group of giving money and supplies for undisclosed terrorist activities in Bosnia, Kosovo, Somalia and Chechnya. Two other defendants, Mohamed Youssef and Kassem Daher, are held at unspecified sites overseas.

The indictment does not directly allege that Padilla went to a training camp in Afghanistan, but it cites wiretapped conversations describing him as having gone to Afghanistan "to be as Usama's," an apparent reference to al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. The indictment says Padilla filled out a "Mujahideen (sic) Data Form," a camp application, in July 2000. In court papers, prosecutors say the form was found in Afghanistan in 2001. Padilla's attorneys are challenging its authenticity.

A month after the indictment, U.S. appeals court Judge Michael Luttig blasted the Bush administration for citing an alleged "dirty bomb" plot to justify holding Padilla at the brig — and then using "less serious" allegations to try to get a grand jury in Miami to indict him. Luttig wrote that the administration has risked "credibility before the courts."

Last July, Cooke, whom Bush appointed to the federal bench in 2003, called the government's case "light on facts" and asked prosecutors to offer more evidence. In August, she threw out the most serious charge against Padilla — conspiracy to murder, kidnap and maim — calling it redundant. It is the only charge that carries a life sentence; the other two each carry a sentence of up to 15 years. Prosecutors appealed, and an appeals court reinstated the charge Jan. 30.

Low standard for competency

Legal scholars disagree about the strength of the charges against Padilla. However, they agree that Padilla's attorneys are unlikely to prevail in their efforts to have him deemed mentally unfit for trial.

"The standard for competency in the U.S. is very low, so it's a tough hurdle for anybody," says Edward MacMahon, who defended Zacarias Moussaoui, a French citizen convicted of conspiracy charges as an al-Qaeda terrorist in 2005. Moussaoui's attorneys conceded he was mentally competent even though a defense psychiatrist testified he was a paranoid schizophrenic.

To be found mentally incompetent to stand trial, a defendant must be unable to understand the legal proceeding against him and be unable to help attorneys prepare his defense. "Does Padilla understand he's on trial for criminal violations?" MacMahon asks. "That's almost the entire test."

Zapf, who examined Padilla for the defense in October, says in her report that Padilla understands the proceedings against him and their consequences. "He has a factual and rational understanding of his case," she wrote.

Zapf added in her notes: "He does believe that he is being persecuted by the government, and he does demonstrate some paranoia about the government, but this does not appear to be delusional."

Hegarty, who examined Padilla for the defense in June and September, concluded that Padilla identifies with his interrogators more than his attorneys. After his attorneys cross-examined FBI agents about their interrogation of him in Chicago, Padilla felt the "proceedings were unfair" to the agents, Hegarty reported.

She said Padilla expressed concern that telling what happened to him in the brig "would cause great harm to the government."

Ex-Texan Charged With Aiding Terrorists (NSDY/AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 14, 2007

HOUSTON -- A former Houston man arrested in Kenya last month has been charged in Texas with teaming with al-Qaida to overthrow the Somali government and form an Islamic state there.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, was ordered held without bail Tuesday on federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device.

Maldonado was returned to the United States on Monday night and appeared Tuesday before U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley, the U.S. attorney's office in Houston said. A detention hearing is set for next week.

Maldonado's arrest marks the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining terrorists in Somalia, Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein said in a statement.

According to the criminal complaint, Maldonado, a Boston native, traveled from Houston to Africa in November 2005. By December 2006, the complaint says, he was in Somalia and had joined with the Islamic Courts Union and elements of al-Qaida to fight in a rebellion designed to overthrow the Somali government and install an Islamic state.

The complaint says Maldonado was issued an AK-47 rifle and attended two military training camps at which members of al-Qaida were present.

Maldonado was captured by the Kenyan military on Jan. 21 as he fled Ethiopian and Somali forces. He was expelled by Kenya and turned over to U.S. officials for his return to Houston.

It wasn't clear Tuesday whether Maldonado had a lawyer.

Maldonado told FBI agents in Kenya that he went to Somalia to fight "jihad," or holy war, for a true Islamic government, according to the complaint.

"I would be fighting the Somali militia, and that turned into fighting the Ethiopians, and if Americans came, I would fight them, too," he is accused of telling the agents. He also told the agents he had "no problem" with killing Americans or with the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the complaint says.

Somalia's last effective national government fell in 1991, when clan-based warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another. A transitional government was formed in 2004 with U.N. help.

American Citizen Charged With Training In Somalia With Al Qaeda, Learning To Become Homicide Bomber (FOX)

Fox News, February 14, 2007

An American citizen charged with receiving terrorist training at an Al Qaeda camp in Somalia — including classes in how to become a homicide bomber and "wage violent jihad" — was taken into custody by FBI agents and returned to the U.S. Monday night night, Justice Department officials told FOX News.

An indictment unsealed Tuesday by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston charges Daniel Joseph Maldanado, 28, a.k.a Daniel Aljughaifi, whose last known address was in Houston, with receiving training from a foreign terrorist organization and conspiring to use an explosive device outside the United States.

Maldonado was captured by the Kenyan military on January 21 as he fled to avoid capture by Ethiopian and Somali government forces battling Al Qaeda-backed rebels, Justice Department officials said.

He was turned over to U.S. law enforcement officials last weekend, and flown to Houston on Monday night accompanied by special agents of the FBI. He appeared Tuesday afternoon before U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley, who ordered him detained without bond pending a detention hearing on Feb. 20.

If convicted, Maldanado could face life imprisonment on the bomb-making charge, while receiving military training from a terrorist organization carries a maximum punishment of 10 years, the Justice Department said.

"Any who seek to aid terrorists in their mission to threaten our national security will be held to account for such serious criminal conduct," said Don DeGabrielle, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District in Houston. The investigation included elements of the Joint Terrorism Task Force and the Houston Police Department.

According to criminal allegations in the complaint, Maldonado traveled from Houston, Texas, to Africa in November, 2005 and then on to Somalia in December, 2006. At that point, he joined the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) and elements of Al Qaeda to fight "jihad" against the Transitional Federal Government to establish of an independent Islamic State in Somalia.

In the fall of 2006, the ICU used suicide bombers and vehicles containing improvised explosive devices to target the leadership of the Transitional Federal Government of Somalia, the complaint said.

While in Somalia, Maldonado was, according to the complaint, provided an AK-47, equipped with military combat uniforms and boots in Mogadishu, and participated in training camps in Kismaayo and Jilib, Somalia.

The camps included physical fitness, firearms and explosives training all in preparation to go to the front to fight for the ICU.

DOJ_NMG_0131801

Al Qaeda members were allegedly present at the training camp. During the course of his training, the complaint alleges Maldonado spoke to an individual about his willingness to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded, and also observed the making and testing of bombs with the group's bomb-maker, the complaint said.

"This case represents the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining forces with Islamic extremist fighters in Somalia," said Kenneth L. Wainstein, Assistant Attorney General for the Justice Department's National Security Division. "The prosecution of Mr. Maldonado demonstrates the scope of our laws and serves as a warning to others who would travel overseas to wage violent jihad."

Joseph Billy, Assistant Director of the FBI Counterterrorism Division, said, "The FBI is working closely with our law enforcement and intelligence community partners in this country and around the world to bring all necessary resources to bear to protect Americans and its allies from terrorist attacks."

Former Houston Man Charged With Aiding Terrorists (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 14, 2007

A former Houston resident allegedly living in terrorist camps overseas now sits in Houston's federal detention center, accused of training to fight with al-Qaida.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, is the first American to be charged with joining Islamic extremist fighters in Somalia, an east African coastal nation where violence and instability has been commonplace since a transitional government took power in 2004 and warlords have fought to gain control.

The federal criminal complaint filed today against Maldonado alleges that, from September until January, he trained with the terrorist group and studied bomb-making with a man who assembled and produced explosives in Somalia.

Al-Qaida is blamed for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people at the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon.

Maldonado is a Massachusetts-born Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi who moved from Boston to Houston in August 2005 and lived here for at least two months.

He last resided at the Sovereign Townhomes in the 9800 block of United Drive in southwest Houston, the complaint says, and came to the attention of federal investigators during that time.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Abran "Abe" Martinez, who leads the special prosecutions unit in the U.S. Attorney's Office, which includes anti-terrorism, said the investigation originated in Houston, but declined to talk about what brought Maldonado here.

Maldonado's return trip to the U.S. began in Nairobi, Kenya. He was accompanied by FBI agents on a plane that landed at Houston's Ellington Field about 7:30 p.m. Monday, Martinez said.

Maldonado is charged with receiving training from a foreign terrorist organization and conspiring to use a weapon of mass destruction outside the U.S. He faces up to life in prison if convicted on the bomb charge and as long as 10 years for the training count.

Kenyan soldiers captured Maldonado on Jan. 21 as he tried to flee Somalia, according to the criminal complaint prepared by an FBI special agent. During several interviews with FBI officials in Kenya, Maldonado explained how he ended up living in Africa.

He decided to go to Somalia to wage jihad, which he described during an interview, as the act of "raising the word of Allah, uppermost, by speaking and fighting against all those who are against the Islamic State." He chose to help Somalia because he believed it was the only legitimate Islamic state.

"If Americans came, I would fight them too," Maldonado allegedly said.

He would have "no problem" killing Americans or fighting Americans nor had a problem with the Sept. 11 attacks. He also allegedly said he would be willing to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0131802

Maldonado said he never completed his physical training because he contracted malaria. He also is credited with saying that he participated in nightly gatherings where a Yemeni who personally knew Osama bin Laden would tell stories about the al-Qaida leader.

In a news release, Kenneth L. Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's National Security Division, noted the arrest as the first linked to Somalia.

"The prosecution of Mr. Maldonado demonstrates the scope of our laws and serves as a warning to others who would travel overseas to wage violent jihad," Wainstein said.

According to the State Department, al-Qaida poses a threat to the United States and to the stability of Somalia.

While in Mogadishu, the Somali capital, Maldonado was outfitted with an AK-47 assault rifle, ammunition, military combat uniforms, boots and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, the complaint says.

At training camps in Kismaayo and Jilib, southern Somali towns , where al-Qaida members allegedly were present, Maldonado received firearms and explosives training to prepare to go to the front to fight for the Islamic Courts Union, a rebel group.

Pentagon officials have acknowledged that in early January, U.S. airships targeted al-Qaida leaders in southern Somalia, the region where Maldonado is accused of living and training with al-Qaida forces.

Maldonado, who has wavy, shoulder-length brown hair, a mustache and long chin hairs, stood still as he listened to U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley at an initial hearing this afternoon.

Maldonado asked about being detained closer to his parents and children, who reside in or near New Hampshire, he said.

Botley said Maldonado will be held at the Houston federal detention center without bond pending a detention hearing Feb. 20.

Mass. Native Held In Terror Case (BOS)

By Raja Mishra, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 14, 2007

Accused of aiding Qaeda in Somalia

Spurred by radical Islamic beliefs, Massachusetts native Daniel J. Maldonado journeyed from the streets of Boston to the frenzied civil war in Somalia, where he allegedly conspired with Al Qaeda militants to establish a fundamentalist regime, only to end up in the custody of FBI agents when his insurgent efforts unraveled, according to court papers released yesterday.

The 28-year-old was ordered held without bail yesterday in Houston on charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device.

A conviction could mean life in prison.

Maldonado, also known as Daniel Aljughaifi , is the first American citizen to stand accused of terrorist activity in Somalia, where US troops recently conducted strikes on suspected terrorists in the wake of an Islamic insurrection there.

"Any who seek to aid terrorists in their mission to threaten our national security will be held to account for such serious criminal conduct," said US Attorney Don DeGabrielle in a statement.

Maldonado appeared in federal court in Houston yesterday after being flown to Texas from Africa by federal agents. His next court hearing is Feb. 20.

Maldonado, a Muslim convert who said in court he had also lived in New Hampshire, lived in the Boston area until August 2005, when he moved to Houston, prosecutors said.

He traveled to Cairo in November 2005, then to Somalia a year later, "in search of a country where he could practice true Islam," according to an FBI affidavit released yesterday that lays out the government's investigation.

On Jan. 21, he was captured by soldiers of the Kenyan military as he fled Somalia, where civil conflict between the government, aided by Ethiopian forces, and Islamic militias had broken out.

He was given over to FBI agents in Kenya. Maldonado told them he had been conducting jihad in Somalia, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0131803

"I would be fighting the Somali militia, and that turned into fighting the Ethiopians, and if Americans came, I would fight them, too," he is quoted as telling his FBI interrogators. He had "no problem" with the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, he said.

Maldonado also said he was prepared to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded or unable to fight.

Maldonado said he was given firearms, explosives, and combat training by Islamic groups in Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia. He said he was provided with an AK-47 assault rifle, ammunition, camouflage uniforms, and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. He was then taken to the city of Kismaayo, a stronghold for rebel Islamic militias. While there, he helped forcibly interrogate an alleged spy against the rebels, a flight attendant who was later reported killed.

But in Kismaayo, he contracted malaria, delaying his deployment, court papers say. Still, he managed to train with a bomb maker. During this time, Maldonado said, he came into contact with members of Al Qaeda.

He said one Al Qaeda member from Yemen would regale nighttime gatherings with tales about Osama bin Laden. The group discussed taking over Somalia, Ethiopia, and Egypt, and making them into fundamentalist Islamic states.

But when Ethiopian forces attacked their encampment, the group fled, taking a boat to another town, then traipsing through the woods for two or three days before Kenya authorities caught up with them.

A witness, identified by prosecutors as "Daniel a.k.a. Abu Mohammed," identified Maldonado from a six-man photo array as someone who attended the terrorist camp in Somalia. He also confirmed that Maldonado had engaged in weapons and bomb training.

US Man Charged With Training To Fight Jihad In Somalia (AFP)

AFP, February 14, 2007

A 28-year-old US man who converted to Islam was charged with training to fight a jihad in Somalia and accused of offering himself as a suicide bomber, the Department of Justice said.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, is accused of leaving his Houston, Texas home in 2005 "in search of a country where he could practice true Islam," according to FBI documents.

A year later, he joined the Islamic Courts Union and elements of Al Qaeda to fight for the establishment of an independent Islamic state in Somalia, the criminal complaint alleged.

During the course of his training, the complaint added, Maldonado spoke about his willingness to become a suicide bomber if he was wounded, and also observed how bombs were made and tested with the group's bomb-maker.

He was captured by the Kenyan military on January 21 as he fled to avoid Ethiopian and Somalian forces. At the weekend, he was handed over to US authorities and escorted back to Houston.

"This case represents the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining forces with Islamic extremist fighters in Somalia," said Kenneth Wainstein, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's National Security Division.

"The prosecution of Mr. Maldonado demonstrates the scope of our laws and serves as a warning to others who would travel overseas to wage violent jihad."

Maldonado was ordered detained without bond at an initial hearing Tuesday, the justice department said.

Charged with conspiring to use a destructive device and receiving military training from a terrorist organization, Maldonado faces up to life in prison.

Bill Would Restore Detainees' Rights, Define 'Combatant' (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

A group of Senate Democrats introduced legislation yesterday that would restore habeas corpus rights to all detainees in U.S. custody and would narrowly define what it means to be an "enemy combatant" against the United States, a measure designed to challenge laws ushered in by the Republican-controlled Congress last year.

The bill, titled the "Restoring the Constitution Act of 2007," strikes at the core of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 by giving detainees access to U.S. courts. It was introduced by Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0131804

The bill would also prevent the executive branch from making blanket determinations about who is an enemy combatant and would restrict the president's authority to interpret when certain human rights standards apply to detainees. The legislation would limit the label "enemy combatant" to a person "who directly participates in hostilities in a zone of active combat against the United States" or who took part in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Should such language become law, it could change the status of numerous detainees who were picked up in U.S. counterterrorism efforts.

The bill would also restore to the detainees numerous rights they lost under the Military Commissions Act, including the right, under a habeas corpus petition, to challenge their detention in federal court.

"I take a backseat to no one when it comes to protecting the country from terrorists," Dodd said in an e-mail statement yesterday. "But there is a right way to do this and a wrong way to do this. . . . In taking away their legal rights, the rights first codified in our country's Constitution, we're taking away our own moral compass, as well."

The Military Commissions Act was originally designed to fix problems in the wartime trial process for detainees in U.S. custody after the Supreme Court struck down the Bush administration's first set of rules. But the act also denied access to U.S. courts to those accused of being foreign enemy combatants.

In a panel discussion Monday night after the screening of an HBO movie about the Abu Ghraib prison abuse, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), a leading proponent of the Military Commissions Act, said he stands behind the existing law and believes that it will stand up to Supreme Court scrutiny.

The newly proposed legislation, however, has the potential to undercut last year's law before challenges reach the Supreme Court. There is bipartisan support in Congress for restoring the habeas corpus rights of detainees, many of whom have filed court cases with the help of civilian lawyers.

Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First, said the new bill would remedy several legal problems her organization has identified in the Military Commissions Act, particularly in the area of habeas corpus rights. She said the definition of "enemy combatant" is "hugely important" because it would draw a line between actual combat and the Bush administration's ambiguous "global war on terror."

"It would go to the question of whether the whole of our counterterrorism effort is going to be considered an actual and legal war," Massimino said. "Congress hasn't taken that issue head-on."

British Panel Urges Police To Apologize To Muslims For Raid (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 13 -- London police should publicly apologize to two Muslim families caught up in a mistaken anti-terrorist raid in which a man was shot, an independent oversight panel said Tuesday.

The Independent Police Complaints Commission was investigating the dramatic dawn raid of two homes in East London last June by about 250 officers, some in chemical protective suits. Police officials later said they believed that "a highly dangerous explosive device that could be set off remotely" was being made there.

Two men, Mohammed Abdul Kahar, 23, and his brother Abul Koyair, 20, were arrested, and Abdul Kahar was accidentally shot in the shoulder during the scuffle. A week later, after an extensive search of the houses, both men were released without charge.

Nine family members, including children and elderly, were also hauled into the police station, where DNA samples and fingerprints where taken, actions the panel called "insensitive and unnecessary."

Although it admonished the police for some of their procedures, the panel did not recommend disciplinary action in connection with the raid, which soured relations between police and many Muslims.

Alf Hitchcock, a deputy assistant police commissioner, told reporters that police had already apologized three times for the raid and would do so again.

The so-called Forest Gate raid, named for the neighborhood where it occurred, is frequently cited by Muslim leaders, who say that many of the nearly 2 million Muslims in Britain feel under siege and presumed guilty by police.

DOJ_NMG_0131805

Between Sept. 11, 2001, and the end of last September, police arrested 1,140 people for alleged terror-related offenses and released 631 without charge, according to Home Office statistics. Only 38 have been convicted of terrorism offenses, and 98 are currently on trial, according to the government.

Police say they have been under extraordinary pressure to stop attacks that could kill large numbers of people, especially after suicide bombers killed themselves and 52 other passengers on London trains and a bus in July 2005.

Last August, police arrested 25 people in an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic jets; eight were later released without charge. Last month, nine Muslim men were arrested in an alleged plot to kidnap and behead a Muslim serving in the British army; three have been released without charge.

Muslim leaders are increasingly calling police intelligence faulty and say officers are routinely picking up the wrong people. Also, they say, the whole Muslim community is tarred when police swoop in with massive force rather than quietly pulling people in for questioning.

Massoud Shadjareh, chairman of the London-based Islamic Human Rights Commission, said in an interview that the huge numbers of arrests of Muslims that result in no charges "are devastating individuals" and making many Muslims "extremely angry."

He said cases such as the Forest Gate raid are becoming typical, citing the lasting damage done to the Muslim community by publicity about Abdul Kahar and Koyair making a chemical bomb, even though they turned out to be innocent.

Shadjareh called Tuesday's official finding that police should apologize to the families "too little, too late."

Abdul Kahar told the BBC he was disappointed by the commission's findings. He said nothing justified the way police officers handled members of his family, including his 60-year-old father. "He was half naked, and they were beating him on the floor," Abdul Kahar said.

In all, the two families filed more than 150 complaints against the police. Deborah Glass, the panel's commissioner, dismissed nearly all of them but agreed that police should have handled the family members and the two men's accommodation in detention better.

"I've concluded that the police were right to take no chances with public safety," Glass said. But she added, "They must also plan more realistically for the possibility that their intelligence is wrong."

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Tracks Secret 'wiretaps' With Multilevel Security (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 14, 2007

The FBI has launched an application that monitors the preparation of requests for secret wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by using several levels of classification, ranked by the security level of the user.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 created the FIS Court (FISC). The court, which meets in secret, is formed of 12 judges who serve in rotating three-judge panels, sit continuously and review requests for electronic surveillance three days a week, according to various public reports and records.

An FBI special agent recently recounted the state of affairs regarding executive branch requests to the FISC for national-security wiretaps when FBI director Robert Mueller took office in August 2001.

“The director asked how many [FISA requests] were pending,” the FBI official said. “The answer was, ‘The FBI didn’t know.’ He asked, ‘How long does it take to approve one?’ We didn’t know. He asked, ‘What’s the holdup [main delaying factor]?’ We didn’t know.”

Information contained in the surveillance requests largely is classified at the secret or top-secret levels, the official said. Surveillance requests often come from the foreign intelligence groups in each of the bureau’s 56 field offices. “All of this information is coming in at different classification levels,” the official said.

“Because of the sensitivity of these things, they are some of the most reviewed documents in the government,” the official added.

DOJ_NMG_0131806

The Justice Department prepares the final version of each surveillance request after it has been repeatedly vetted. Only a handful of federal officials are authorized to provide the final approval. They include the FBI director, the deputy director of national intelligence, the secretary of state and the national security adviser.

"These are not the kind of people where you just come into their office with a stack of documents and say, 'Here's a stack of documents for you to sign,' " the official said.

When Mueller joined the FBI, officials transmitted FISA requests among agencies by sneakernet. Various networks played a part in the process, including FBI, Justice Department and Pentagon systems.

Regarding Justice's system, the FBI official said, "To give you an idea of their idea of connectivity, it was called Oasis [and wasn't connected to anything]."

To manage the information coming into the system at various levels of classification, the bureau turned to High Performance Technologies Inc. of Reston, Va.

"We have a system that takes information from the secret level and puts it up to top secret," the FBI official said.

The application, known as the FISA System, allows users to access information it holds based on the security clearances they hold, the official said. "The technicians don't need to see the secret and top-secret levels," he said.

Automating the system speeded the approval process from 120 days to 60 days, the official said. It also provides an audit trail of system activity, generates reminders about pending requests and has room to grow, the official said.

Federal officials have the right to launch a wiretap or electronic surveillance and seek retroactive court approval in urgent cases, according to various reports.

The Bush administration's decision to launch some surveillance operations without any court approval at all led to the resignation of one FISC judge and a flap over whether the rogue White House wiretaps would jeopardize other cases.

FISC has its hand full. From a workload of 932 FISA orders in 2001, the annual caseload reached 2,005 requests in 2005, the official said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Israel, Palestinians Disagree On Agenda (NSDY/AP)

By Karin Laub, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 14, 2007

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian and Israeli officials disagreed sharply Tuesday over whether next week's Mideast summit with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice should help relaunch peace talks, dimming hopes the session will produce results.

Israel will not talk about issues of substance until it learns more about the power-sharing deal reached last week between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the Islamic militant Hamas, said government spokeswoman Miri Eisin.

Israel's prime minister, defense minister and foreign minister met Tuesday evening to discuss the summit, Army Radio reported, but no decisions were announced.

The agreement falls short of international demands that a new Palestinian government, a coalition of Hamas and Abbas' Fatah movement, explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist.

Abbas has been trying to market the vaguely worded deal as the only way to co-opt Hamas, end deadly Palestinian infighting, and renew peace talks with Israel.

International reaction also has been vague, and the summit would be the clearest test yet of the Israeli and U.S. positions.

Nabil Amr, a senior Abbas aide who took part in the negotiations, said the agenda dispute with Israel does not bode well for winning international acceptance of the agreement.

"I think we will face a tough situation to convince Israel" to deal with a future Hamas-Fatah coalition, Amr said. "But what can we do? This is what we achieved in Mecca."

Amr said he had few expectations for the Feb. 19 summit in Jerusalem with Abbas, Rice and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

DOJ_NMG_0131807

Eisin said the time is not ripe for full-fledged peace talks.

"We're not talking about the substantial issues, we're just talking about the political horizon," Eisin said. But she said Israel expects any future Palestinian government to accept the international conditions.

"We're waiting to see when the new Palestinian government is put together, because it hasn't been finalized, what the new government policies are," she said.

In announcing the summit last month, Rice only said it should help restore confidence between the two sides, and that "we'll see what comes after that."

Alvaro De Soto, the U.N. special coordinator for the Mideast peace process, cautioned Tuesday that "excessive expectations should not be placed" on the summit.

A summit without achievements could weaken Abbas as he tries wrap up negotiations with Hamas.

He is heading to Gaza on Thursday for talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas. The Hamas-led Cabinet is to resign by Thursday, a formality that would leave Haniyeh five weeks to put together a new Cabinet, said Ghazi Hamad, a government spokesman.

The agreement between the two sides only settled two issues: the government's program, including a vague reference to "respecting" peace deals with Israel, and the distribution of Cabinet positions between Hamas and Fatah.

Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal wrote Tuesday that the unity government would support the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem.

Hamas leaders have previously said they would support a temporary state in the lands Israel captured in 1967, but have not said they would give up the fight to take over all of historic Palestine. Nevertheless, the statement was seen as a concession by the militant group.

"The national Palestinian agreement ... confirms establishing a Palestinian state with full sovereignty and independence on all the lands occupied in 1967 and its capital Jerusalem," Mashaal wrote in a commentary in the London-based daily Al Quds Al Arabi.

"When a chance is given for this vision to be translated into reality, it will form an important step toward achieving peace in the region," he wrote.

Abbas has called for establishing a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

Other disputes between Hamas and Fatah remain, including control over the security forces.

In other developments Tuesday, senior members of the violent Islamic Jihad group warned in Gaza City that American citizens could be in danger if any harm comes to their leader, Ramadan Shallah. The vague threats were made after Washington offered up to $5 million for his capture.

Judge Orders Deportation Of Driving Student (PROJO)

By Tom Mooney, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, February 14, 2007

BOSTON — A federal judge yesterday ordered an Indian national whose behavior at a Smithfield trucking school spawned a nationwide antiterrorism investigation be deported.

Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala la “is not the person who he claims to be,” said U.S. Immigration Judge Matthew J. D’Angelo, as a shackled Mullawala listened a few feet away at the court room’s defense table.

While Mullawala’s “ultimate intentions and motives have not yet been revealed in full,” the judge said, “this court reaches a finding that mirrors the grave concern expressed by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, The Rhode Island State Police and the Rhode Island Fusion Center” — which spearheads local homeland security matters.

D’Angelo ordered that Mullawala, 28, remain in the custody of Homeland Security officials while officials there continue investigating his alleged suspicious behavior.

Mullawala will not appeal the judge's order, said his lawyer, June Beack; "He just wants to go back to his home country." By law, she said, Mullawala is entitled to two case review hearings, after 90 days and in six months, during which federal officials must explain why they are still holding him. It's feasible, however, that the government could deport him before then.

Mullawala has been held since Dec. 5 at the Suffolk County House of Correction in Boston, on a civil violation of his student visa. No criminal charges have been filed against him; however, the Rhode Island Department of the Attorney General had issued a criminal extradition warrant alleging he submitted a false document to the Rhode Island Division of Motor Vehicles in order to obtain a Rhode Island driver's license. That charge, however, is expected to be dropped if Mullawala is deported.

He has been under investigation since Nov. 29, after an instructor at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School became suspicious of him and contacted authorities. According to court papers, Mullawala's lack of interest in learning how to back up a tractor-trailer, his request to buy software on hazardous materials and his queries on whether fingerprinting would be required for a commercial driver's license raised concerns with the instructor.

Six days after the investigation began, Mullawala walked into the state police headquarters in Scituate to file a harassment complaint against a detective who called him on his cell phone. After questioning, he was taken into custody on a student visa violation.

During an immigration hearing last month Mullawala admitted he lied to the state police, as well as on applications for permanent residency, admission to colleges, driver's licenses and the trucking school. But he denied being a criminal or a threat to anyone.

Mullawala appeared unfazed by the judge's quick summary from the bench yesterday of the 13-page decision he had rendered in the case. Beack said she was uncertain if he understood what the judge was saying.

In his written decision, D'Angelo said he was unimpressed by Mullawala's testimony.

"The respondent's admission to submitting false information was by no means rehabilitated by his testimony.

"Rather than fully responding to questions posed to him, the respondent's testimony was instead vague and evasive and attributed any discrepancies in his testimony or documentation to other individuals."

The explanations that Mullawala did provide, D'Angelo wrote, "were implausible and appeared to be those of an individual struggling to fabricate a cover rather than of one who truly wishes to explain his or her actions."

For example, said D'Angelo, when asked why he changed residences so frequently — 11 different places in four states since his arrival from India in 2002, and some in New York City where he stayed for only a month — Mullawala explained it was because he had "difficulty finding parking."

"While it is admittedly difficult to find parking in New York and other major metropolitan areas, it seems highly unlikely that one would change residences on what appears to be an almost-monthly basis simply to secure better parking."

D'Angelo said he also found "implausible" Mullawala's explanation for why he withdrew from Johnson & Wales University, where he was majoring in computer science, and transferred to the University of Bridgeport. Mullawala said he transferred — even though Johnson & Wales offered him a "substantial" scholarship — because the Providence-based school didn't offer computer engineering as a major.

Yet, the judge said, Mullawala described the two majors as "essentially the same."

"Not only was the respondent's testimony rife with vague, farfetched, evasive and implausible statements," D'Angelo wrote, "but the written documentation he submitted to both [the Department of Homeland Security] and various state government agencies contained numerous inconsistencies and outright falsehoods."

For example, in Mullawala's application for the Nationwide Driving School, he indicated he had lived in Providence for five years and listed an individual named "Jahdish" as one of his character references.

Later Mullawala admitted the application was a lie, the judge said: "… at the time he submitted his application, he had not even resided in the United States for five years and [admitted] that Jahdish was a 'fake character witness.' "

Mullawala's deportation could ban him from reentering the country for at least 10 years.

Appeals Court Upholds Terrorist Designation For Islamic Charity (AP)

By Sam Hananel

DOJ_NMG_0131809

AP, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld the government's decision to freeze the assets of a Missouri-based Islamic charity with alleged links to a foreign group that supports terrorism.

The Treasury Department claims the Islamic American Relief Agency-USA, of Columbia, Mo., is an affiliate of a Sudanese charity - the similarly named Islamic African Relief Agency - accused of financing al-Qaida and other terrorist organizations.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit agreed with a lower court's 2005 decision finding that the charity is a branch of the Sudanese-based agency.

Records describe the Missouri charity as an "affiliate" and a "partner" of the Sudanese group, and the charity sought permission to transfer funds to the group, the appeals court said.

The Missouri charity did not contest the terrorist designation of the Sudanese group, but claims the organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts. The Missouri-based group was founded by a Sudanese immigrant in 1985 to raise money for humanitarian activities around the world.

In 2004, federal agents raided the group's headquarters in Columbia, Mo., as part of a criminal investigation. No criminal charges have been filed against the charity or its employees.

While the court found the unclassified evidence was "not overwhelming," the three-judge panel noted that its review of national security cases is "extremely deferential" to the government. The court said classified records show more extensive evidence of a connection between the two groups.

The appeals court also rejected the charity's argument that blocking its assets violated its rights under the Constitution.

The law is clear that "there is no constitutional right to fund terrorism," the court said. "Where an organization is found to have supported terrorism, government actions to suspend that support are not unconstitutional."

Justice Department spokesman Andrew Ames said the government is pleased the decision "upholding the government's ability to freeze assets that may be used to support terrorism."

Shereef Akeel, the Michigan attorney representing the charity, did not return a call seeking comment.

Columbia Charity Loses Appeal In Terrorism Case (KCS)

By Mark Morris

The Kansas City Star, February 14, 2007

The U.S. Treasury Department properly froze the assets of a Columbia charity that authorities contend was linked to terrorism, a federal appeals court ruled today.

The ruling from a three-judge panel affirmed an order from a Washington D.C. federal judge, who found that the Islamic American Relief Agency-USA had financed terrorism.

Lawyers for the Missouri charity have denied any link to terrorism. Federal authorities have said the Columbia group was affiliated with a Sudanese organization, the Islamic African Relief Agency, which Treasury officials have designated a supporter of global terrorism. IARA-USA's lawyers have said the Missouri charity is entirely separate.

The FBI raided the group's office on Oct. 13, 2004, the same day Treasury agents labeled the group a terrorist supporter and froze its assets.

Malls Emerge As Another Front In Terror War (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Carol.eisenberg@newsday.com

Long Island Newsday, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The mall security guard scrutinizes the black backpack lying by the garbage bin. Should he open it? Ignore it? Call police?

In a world increasingly vulnerable to terrorism and random acts of violence like the rampage in a Salt Lake City mall Monday, security experts say that low-paid private security worker may be the front line of protection in one of the nation's most heavily trafficked places. And they question the adequacy of his training -- or of the malls' security measures -- to detect or deter an attack.

"For suburban America, the mall is the gathering place," said Mitchell Moss of New York University's Center for Catastrophe Preparedness and Response. "It's much more than just a place to shop. It's where huge numbers of people gather to go to the movies, eat and socialize -- therefore, making it a potential terror target."

Roosevelt Field, the state's largest mall, may draw as many as 100,000 people a day at holiday peak -- one reason Nassau police conducted a training exercise there a year after 9/11, based on the scenario of a plane crashing into the mall's food court.

The Department of Homeland Security has repeatedly warned that malls are potentially attractive targets for terrorists, although officials say there is no credible intelligence of imminent plots.

It cites al-Qaida training manuals that identify "places of amusement" and "vital economic centers" as targets and a pattern of such attacks worldwide. A Rand Corp. survey documented over 60 attacks since 1998 on shopping centers in places as diverse as Russia, Turkey and Israel.

This country has seen only lone-wolf attacks -- one of the bloodiest Monday night when an 18-year-old Bosnian refugee opened fire on shoppers in a Salt Lake City mall, killing five and wounding four before being gunned down by an off-duty police officer. Police are still investigating his motive.

But such cases underscore how potentially vulnerable the nation's malls and shopping centers are to acts of violence, according to a recent Justice Department report, which found that while many malls have tightened security since September 2001, much more could be done. The report cited inadequate training for low-paid, high-turnover security workers, as well as insufficient drilling and coordination between mall security and first responders.

"Turnover in private security is huge," said author Robert Davis, citing rates as high as 100 percent in some places. "So even if you have a good program and people are trained in it, chances are that at any given moment, half your staff won't know what the plan is."

But that assessment is disputed by the company that provides security to some of the area's biggest malls, all of which declined to participate in the survey, citing concerns about how the information might be used.

"The large developers -- the Roosevelt Fields, the Smith Haven Malls -- are far ahead in terms of quality of personnel and caliber of training," said Jon Lusher, senior vice president of IPC International Corp. of Illinois.

"Nine-eleven was a wake-up call," said Lusher, whose company provides security for 400 malls, including Roosevelt Field, The Source, Walt Whitman and Smith Haven malls"There have been many, many changes, both in training and in our liaison with law enforcement and the sharing of information."

Nonetheless, he acknowledged that malls balance the risk of terror against the costs of added security, and the economic imperative to be welcoming to shoppers.

He doubted, for instance, that most Americans would be willing to go through a metal detector and a bag search before entering a mall, as Israel shoppers do -- one of the few things that would have stopped the Salt Lake City shooter.

"Clearly, there are business decisions made, in terms of how realistic it is that a certain shopping center is going to be attacked," he said.

How big is the threat? And how much security are Americans willing to put up with?

While some prophecies potentially apocalyptic scenarios -- former National Security Adviser Richard Clarke predicted multiple attacks on malls and amusement parks in an article in The Atlantic two years ago -- others are frankly skeptical.

"Despite the ease of killing Americans in shopping malls and schools, it hasn't happened," said political scientist Ian Lustick, author of "Trapped in the War on Terror."

"The effort to master the unlimited catastrophes we can imagine by mobilizing scarce resources will drain our economy, divert and distort military, intelligence, and law enforcement resources, undermine faith in our institutions, and fundamentally disturb our way of life," Lustick said.

U.S. Homeland Security spokesman William Knocke said that the government has advised local officials to be vigilant, although "there is no credible intelligence to suggest any imminent threat."

DOJ_NMG_0131811

Most mall owners, including the Simon Property Group, which owns several Long Island malls, refuse to talk publicly about risk assessments. But police, security contractors and trade groups say that since 9/11, local malls have expanded closed-circuit television systems, redesigned entrances to block car bombers, and bolstered training for private security.

Members of the International Council of Shopping Centers -- including Simon -- spent $1.8 million to develop a terror prevention course that they expect to put 20,000 security workers through by spring, said spokesman Malachy Kavanagh.

Designed by the Homeland Security Institute at George Washington University, the 14-hour course includes video simulations of security guards confronting scenarios such as an abandoned backpack.

Guards are drilled to move shoppers away and to notify police -- and to avoid opening the pack or using a walkie-talkie close by because of the chance of setting off hidden explosives.

"The idea is not to turn security workers into G.I. Joes," said Paul Maniscalco at the Homeland Security Institute. "We're starting with the baseline education that the Department of Homeland Security has established for first responders, and customizing it to the shopping center environment."

What can they do about a man brandishing a shotgun?

Even Maniscalco acknowledged there are no good options, especially for mostly unarmed private guards.

"As soon as they see someone who's a hostile actor, they're trained to make immediate notification to law enforcement, and then to get people out of the facility as quickly as possible," he said.

But while no one disagrees that more rigorous anti-terror training is needed, some say that training alone is insufficient.

"By not providing a living wage, mall security will continue to be compromised by high turnover and inexperienced officers," said Local 32BJ Spokesman Matt Nerzig, who said that median pay for security workers in the metropolitan area is $11.56 an hour.

Lusher declined to say how much his company pays its guards. But he acknowledged that turnover -- between 30 and 40 percent nationally at IPC -- "makes training more difficult, more time-consuming and more costly. That's exactly the reason you do more."

IPC's guards undergo a mandatory 48-hour training, plus two additional hours every month, he said.

Local police stress that beyond private guards, Long Island's malls have an active police presence, both in uniform and plain clothes. Roosevelt Field, for instance, has a police substation in the mall. And both Nassau and Suffolk also have instituted systems to share information back and forth with area retailers.

They also plan to do more simulations like the one at Roosevelt Field four years ago.

"Could we increase training and make things better still?" asked Nassau Police Insp. Matthew Simeone. "Yes, I think we could. Do we need to go the route of the invasive security checks done in Israel? I don't think we're at that point.

"Of course, events here and around the world may change that, in which case, attitudes are likely to change."

Chertoff Defends Real ID Mandate (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday defended the federalization of driver's licenses and asked a Senate panel not to block the Real ID law, but he urged members to make security changes in the visa waiver program.

Mr. Chertoff said he is "pretty adamant" that the new identification for all U.S. citizens go into effect May 2008.

"We don't want to keep kicking the can down the road," Mr. Chertoff told the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and ranking member, will sponsor an amendment giving states more time to comply with the Real ID Act.

"It has been two years since the Real ID Act passed, and yet we don't have detailed regulations or guidance from the department setting forth the standards that the states are going to have to follow," Miss Collins said.

Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said that if states are mandated to follow federal guidelines, the federal government should carry the cost.

DOJ_NMG_0131812

"I can understand the need to get some delay if they were not going to fund it," Mr. Warner said.

The regulations will be issued later this month and will be subject to a comment period before being finalized.

"I do want to make it clear that one of the reasons it's taking awhile is we have actually done quite a bit of consultation even in the preliminary stage with state officials and privacy advocates and other folks," Mr. Chertoff said.

He also said the Senate should legislate changes in the visa waiver program to secure international flights and ensure foreign visitors are not terrorist threats or do not overstay.

"We are not going to sacrifice security for the sake of facilitating travel among our allies," Mr. Chertoff said.

The waiver program allows visitors from most European countries to travel to the U.S. without a visa for up to 90 days. About 18 million visitors enter the U.S. every year under the program.

"We know that terrorists study our screening and entry procedures and look for ways to do an end-run around these systems," Mr. Chertoff said.

Officials from the Homeland Security Department want information on travelers before they board airplanes, and countries that comply would be fast-tracked into the waiver program.

Mr. Chertoff said Congress should require participating countries to accept repatriation of its citizens who are ordered to leave the U.S., and encourage those countries to operate an air marshal program.

"Air marshals are our last line of defense against terrorists who manage to board an aircraft, and too few foreign countries have such programs," Mr. Chertoff said.

Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said the additional measures will be incorporated into legislation.

"Our public diplomacy probably is at the lowest it has ever been, and modifying this program will mean a great deal to these countries, because every time I talk to an ambassador or foreign minister, they're up in arms about this thing. They don't think they're being treated fairly," Mr. Voinovich said.

A Shameful Prosecution (NYT)

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

An immigration court judge's dismissal of 20-year-old deportation proceedings against two Palestinian men — and his criticism of the government's abusive conduct in the case — ought to prick the conscience of the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff. Rather than reflexively pursuing an appeal, Mr. Chertoff, a former federal judge, should see the wisdom of finally declaring an end to this sorry legal tale, which has become a big source of distrust in the Arab and Muslim community.

The two legal American residents at the center of the controversy, Khader Musa Hamide and Michel Ibrahim Shehadeh, are the sole remaining defendants in a Reagan-era cause célèbre known as the L.A. 8 case. They were arrested in Los Angeles and marked for deportation along with six others because of allegations that they supported the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which is classified as a terrorist group.

The charges against the two have shifted repeatedly. Originally, they were charged under the 1952 McCarran-Walter Act, a cold war relic that allowed the deportation of noncitizens linked to any group advocating "world communism." A federal court declared those provisions unconstitutional and Congress repealed them, but the government's obsession only seemed to grow. At least twice, government lawyers pressed Congress for statutory changes, then tried to apply them retroactively.

What makes this pursuit so bizarre is that the government long ago conceded it had no evidence that the two men had ever been involved in any terrorist act, or any criminal act. Had they been United States citizens, they could not have been arrested. The key allegation — that two decades ago the men distributed a magazine published by the Popular Front and raised money for lawful charitable institutions somehow connected to the group — suggests that the government's real motive all along has been to punish the exercise of free speech.

In dismissing the case, an immigration judge, Bruce Einhorn, cited the government's "gross failure" to comply with his instructions to produce potentially exculpatory and other relevant information. He fittingly denounced the 20-year pursuit as "an embarrassment to the rule of law."

Mr. Chertoff has until Feb. 28 to file an appeal. The only decent thing to do is to drop the case.

Top Senators Agree On Anti-terror Bill (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0131813

By Beverley Lumpkin

The AP, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - Top senators prepared an anti-terrorism bill Tuesday that could spark future clashes with the House, proposing more homeland security money for smaller and rural states and dropping requirements for tougher cargo inspections.

The Senate version of legislation implementing the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission was introduced by the chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., and the panel's top Republican, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine. Their panel was scheduled to vote on the measure on Thursday.

The Senate measure would drop House-passed provisions requiring that all containers on U.S.-bound vessels be screened in foreign ports for radiation, and that all cargo loaded onto U.S. airliners be screened for explosives.

Both were strongly opposed by the Bush administration on grounds that they are too costly and require the use of technology that does not exist.

However, the Senate Commerce Committee on Tuesday passed an aviation security bill that has a similar provision regarding screening of all air cargo.

The bipartisan 9/11 Commission investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and in its final report in 2004 made numerous recommendations on improving the nation's security.

Congressional budget analysts have estimated the House bill's cost at $21 billion over the next five years. The Senate bill does not yet have an overall cost estimate.

A fundamental difference exists between the two houses of Congress on the percentage of grants to states and localities that must be distributed according to risk factors rather than equally divided among states.

The House version places more emphasis on rating the risk factor - a formula that considers the intelligence threat, the locality's vulnerability and the consequences to its population and critical infrastructure of a terrorist attack. Such a formula tends to favor larger and more urban states.

The Senate version also considers risk but would spread the funds more broadly. For example, a program aimed at the urban areas considered most at risk - 46 such areas received funds for the current fiscal year - would allow the 100 largest urban areas in the country to apply for grants.

The minimum guaranteed amount to each state would also be higher in the Senate bill, 0.75 percent of the total to each state. The Senate's grants would cost $3.105 billion for each of the next three years.

The Senate version also contains a provision not in the House bill that would change a program that allows citizens of 27 countries considered close U.S. allies to enter the country without a visa.

The program has been criticized since the 9/11 attacks, however, and the administration has promised to strengthen its security and open it to additional allies, particularly Eastern European countries now aiding the U.S. effort in Iraq.

At a hearing on his department's 2008 budget request, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff on Tuesday warned committee members that the program's membership must be expanded to help solve "what is shaping up as a fairly ugly dispute" with several nations.

There is also a significant difference between the two houses of Congress concerning a privacy and civil liberties board. The House bill would make the board an independent agency and give it full subpoena power, while the Senate bill would keep the board inside the White House and permit it only to ask the attorney general to issue subpoenas on its behalf.

The White House signaled its strong opposition to the House version, asserting it would be an unconstitutional infringement of the president's powers.

Committee plans for a smooth process could be upended by Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., who has introduced nearly 200 amendments to the measure.

Coburn's spokesman, John Hart, said that in addition to his concern about the process being rushed, the senator believes some of the bill's provisions are unnecessary and duplicative of existing programs.

Coburn wrote to Lieberman on Monday, asking that he delay consideration of the measure until after the Presidents' Day recess, when the Senate is due to return Feb. 26.

Subway Security Devices Fail Tests (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, February 14, 2007

An ambitious test of machines for checking subway and rail passengers for bombs failed to find a technology that can reliably stop terrorists such as those who attacked trains in Madrid and London, according to a Homeland Security Department assessment.

The $7 million government program tested futuristic screening equipment in major rail systems last year and found that each of the technologies had significant problems.

Many machines triggered excessive false alarms, some took too long to screen passengers, and one "could not consistently locate the item that caused the alarm," according to the report, which was not made public but was presented at a recent rail-security conference in Arlington, Va.

The effort to screen rail passengers "needs significant investment," the assessment concludes. Democrats in Congress have recently pledged to boost spending on subway security systems by billions.

"There's no plan to put any of the technology that was tested in the pilot in broad-based use. We want to continue to do more research," said Robert Jamison, deputy administrator of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

The test indicates the limited role that technology can play for now in securing the nearly 12 million people who ride subway and rail systems each weekday. That contrasts with aviation, where 8,800 bomb detectors installed quickly in airports after 9/11 screen 535 million pieces of luggage a year.

"We're years away from any technological solution," said Brian Jenkins, director of the National Transportation Security Center in California.

The only near-term solutions are metal detectors and X-rays, as well as bomb-sniffing dogs, the report says. It says dogs tested in an Atlanta subway had to rest after 45 minutes and needed air flow to smell explosives. "Using canines for person screening is still a developing technology," the report says.

Both methods are costly. Using the machines or dogs in the New York City subway would cost about 40 cents per passenger trip. The cost in Cleveland subways, which have 19,000 passengers a day compared with New York's 6 million, would be $3.45 per trip.

The technological limitations are forcing the Homeland Security Department to find other ways to secure rail systems. "We're heavily pushing the visible, unpredictable deterrents," such as teams of dogs, transit inspectors and marshals, Jamison said. Passengers and rail workers are encouraged to report suspicious activity, and emergency responders get training in handling a rail bombing.

That emphasis "is the result of tests like this that show even this advanced technology is not really ready, and there are other things we can do better right now," said TSA chief Kip Hawley.

Former New York police commissioner Howard Safir advocates random passenger searches like those in the New York subways. "The fact that they're checking is going to be a deterrent," he said.

NFL Rejects Border Patrol Ad (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

The National Football League refused to run a recruitment ad for the U.S. Border Patrol in last week's Super Bowl program, saying it was "controversial" because it mentioned duties such as fighting terrorism and stopping drugs and illegal aliens at the border.

"The ad that the department submitted was specific to Border Patrol, and it mentioned terrorism. We were not comfortable with that," said Greg Aiello, a spokesman for the NFL. "The borders, the immigration debate is a very controversial issue, and we were sensitive to any perception we were injecting ourselves into that."

The NFL's rejection didn't sit well with Border Patrol agents, who called it a snub of their role in homeland security and said it was "more than a little puzzling."

DOJ_NMG_0131815

"The NFL missed a golden opportunity to reach countless patriotic citizens who want to answer the call to help prevent another terrorist attack on American soil," said T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents the agency's nonsupervisory personnel.

Border Patrol agents are assigned to protect the country's borders with Mexico and Canada between the ports of entry. The agency is trying to boost its force to 18,000, a goal President Bush outlined last year in a prime-time Oval Office address to the nation.

Other major leagues have had no problems running the ad, a Border Patrol spokesman said. It has been accepted to run in programs for the upcoming NBA All Star Game and the NCAA Final Four, as well as in Pro BullRider magazine, the spokesman said.

The NFL's snub came to light last week during Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's testimony before a congressional panel. Mr. Chertoff said the ad was rejected, "much to my chagrin."

Mr. Aiello said that the NFL offered the department a chance to run a generic recruiting ad, similar to ads the U.S. military runs, but that the league never heard back from it.

"We proposed a more generic recruiting ad for the department that didn't highlight the borders, which brings up the immigration issue and the immigration debate. That's controversial," he said.

That position stands in stark contrast to the ongoing debate in Congress, where among all the thorny issues related to immigration, the one that wins near-unanimous agreement is the need for more boots on the ground.

"Since almost every American favors securing our borders and the overwhelming majority of legislators on both sides of the immigration debate support significant increases in the number of Border Patrol agents, it is extremely difficult to imagine how those issues could be perceived as controversial," Mr. Bonner said.

He said the NFL's decision appeared to be an attempt to try to avoid upsetting the emerging market of football fans in Latin America.

The Super Bowl program is produced by the NFL, which printed about 200,000 copies this year, Mr. Aiello said.

The Border Patrol ad asks for "the right men and women to help protect America's southwest borders." It lists duties as preventing "the entry of terrorists and their weapons," blocking "unlawful entry of undocumented aliens" and "stopping drug smuggling."

The ad does not mention the ongoing immigration debate in Washington or touch on contentious subjects such as amnesty, a guest-worker program or legalization.

Mr. Bush has promised to double the size of the Border Patrol, which stood at 9,000 when he took office. His budget proposal calls for funding for 3,000 new agents in fiscal 2008 alone.

Customs and Border Protection Commissioner W. Ralph Basham, who oversees the Border Patrol, told The Washington Times last year that an aggressive recruiting effort by the agency had resulted in "no want for applicants."

Mr. Basham said the ongoing attrition rate for the Border Patrol of about 4 percent was significantly down from previous years and meant that 6,800 new agents would have to be hired and trained to fill the 6,000 slots sought to boost the agency's numbers to 18,000 and to make up for losses from attrition.

To meet the president's goal, Mr. Basham -- who once led the federal law-enforcement training center -- said the agency had reduced the total number of days trainees attend the academy, "but not the training they receive." He said the overall training schedule was reduced in October from 92 to 81 days.

Security Projects Get Review (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Problems in a $24 billion Coast Guard ship and aircraft program that have given black eyes to Lockheed Martin Corp. and Northrop Grumman Corp. underscore broader concerns about the government's use of private contractors to oversee vital homeland security programs.

DOJ_NMG_0131816

Congress this week is scheduled to hold its third and fourth hearings in less than a month to review the Deepwater project, an ambitious modernization effort by the Department of Homeland Security's Coast Guard arm that has been dogged by delays and design flaws. Lawmakers are also scrutinizing SBInet, a Boeing Co.-led project to build a high-tech border surveillance system. The Government Accountability Office, Congress's investigative arm, is to release a report card tomorrow assessing the Department of Homeland Security's plan for keeping Boeing accountable for a project initially valued at $8 billion.

The common theme for the two programs: Congress's new Democratic leadership's concern that the government has relinquished too much control to contractors, and fears that costs will grow.

In both big contracts, "the government is relying on private contractors to design the program, build them and even conduct oversight over them," Rep. Henry Waxman, chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said at a hearing last week focused on potential waste, fraud and abuse.

For contractors, the concern is that political pressure could prompt Homeland Security to revise contracts on less favorable terms. Coast Guard chief Adm. Thad Allen confirmed yesterday that the service will change the "structure" and "contractual relationship" with the Lockheed-Northrop joint venture, though details have yet to be worked out.

Lockheed and Northrop defend their work on Deepwater and say they are committed to fulfilling the Coast Guard's evolving requirements. Boeing says SBInet is progressing as planned.

The Deepwater program was awarded to Integrated Coast Guard Systems, a Lockheed-Northrop joint venture, in 2002. It aims to upgrade the service's cutters, patrol boats, airplanes and helicopters. Deepwater began as a $17 billion, 20-year effort, but was expanded to a $24 billion, 30-year program after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In November, the Coast Guard suspended from service eight cutters modified under the program because their hulls buckled in rough seas. Homeland Security's inspector general recently reported that the biggest new ship model under development, the 418-foot National Security Cutter, has design flaws that may limit its life. A separate inspector general report raises concerns about contractor conduct and the Coast Guard's technical ability to oversee the program after improper cables were installed in some ships.

A fresh Pentagon study delivered to the Coast Guard last week found that the Lockheed-Northrop team has wider latitude and more lenient cost terms than major defense acquisition programs, and the Coast Guard has a shortage of government acquisition and engineering experts, among other shortcomings. It recommended changing the program so that it "does not rely on a single industry entity or contract to produce or support all or the majority" of Coast Guard capabilities.

The Pentagon report also noted that new Coast Guard leaders are taking steps to improve its acquisition team. A Coast Guard spokeswoman said yesterday that the service is reviewing the report's recommendations.

The companies deny there are design flaws to the new big cutter, and note there have been numerous successes in other areas of the complex program.

Coast Guard Chief Announces Plans To Overhaul The Service (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — Acknowledging that the Coast Guard has failed to keep up with changing times, its commandant, Adm. Thad Allen, unveiled a plan Tuesday to restructure its management radically and expand its surveillance efforts along the nation's coasts.

The overhaul is intended to address mounting criticism of a $24 billion equipment program known as Deepwater, which is replacing or rebuilding most of the service's large ships, planes and helicopters.

But it is much broader, including revamping the way the Coast Guard manages its response to natural disasters and terrorist attacks, supervises its Atlantic and Pacific fleets, maintains its aircraft and ships and handles its payroll and financial systems.

Some of Admiral Allen's proposals could be felt by boat owners. He is advocating the mandatory use of devices like the automated identification beacons that are on large ships on smaller commercial fishing vessels and at least some pleasure boats.

The plan reflects changes that have already taken place at the service since 2001 when it assumed a broader antiterrorism mission and has had its budget grow by 50 percent, to $8.6 billion this year.

"We have been running some parts of the Coast Guard like a small business when we are a Fortune 500 company," Admiral Allen said in a speech on Tuesday to several hundred Coast Guard officials. "We need to evolve with changing times."

Instead of operating separate Pacific and Atlantic fleets, Admiral Allen said, all 35,000 active duty Coast Guard personnel on the service's nearly 250 large ships, 1,700 smaller boats, 200 aircraft and 750 shore-side units will now report to a single commander.

A hundred-person operations group will coordinate how specially trained Coast Guard units respond to terror attacks, natural disasters, chemical or oil spills and its war-time assignments with the Department of Defense.

A new deputy commandant for mission support will oversee the design, acquisition and construction of new ships and aircraft and the maintenance of the fleet once they are built, functions that are now managed separately.

That will allow the Coast Guard to avoid giving so much authority for design and construction choices to contractors, like Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, which renovated the first eight trouble-plagued ships in the Deepwater program.

The speech by Admiral Allen was in advance of the release of another scathing report by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general on the Coast Guard's management of its ship procurement program.

The newest report, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, confirmed safety complaints that had been filed by a former Lockheed employee, who was so frustrated that his observations had gone unheeded that he posted a Web video to detail them.

The report says that as the former employee, Michael DeKort, had asserted, Coast Guard contractors installed hundreds of cables on 123-foot patrol boats that could cause toxic smoke if they caught fire. The ships are now out of service because of hull breaches. The contractors also installed electronics equipment that was prone to failure in open-sea conditions.

Since 2001, the Coast Guard has become much more of an extension of the military, instead of a service that primarily focuses on safety, with law enforcement playing a secondary role.

"This is not my father's Coast Guard," Admiral Allen said. "And my father is in the room." Admiral Allen's father, Clyde Allen, served in the Coast Guard and was in the hotel ballroom to hear his son's speech.

It will be several years before all the changes are made, officials said, but the plan won early praise Tuesday. James L. Hested, the former commanding officer of the Coast Guard yard, said the service needed to go on a bureaucrat diet.

"You will have fewer fiefdoms," Mr. Hested said.

Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland and chairman of the House panel that oversees Coast Guard operations, said he hoped that Admiral Allen had time to complete the work before his four-year tour of duty ended in 2010.

"He has laid out for himself a very tall order," said Mr. Cummings, who attended the speech. "But I think he can do it."

Freedom For Sale? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

The Freedom Tower at Ground Zero in Manhattan still isn't much to look at -- a handful of beams rising from the pit roughly to ground level. But this week has brought the welcome news that private-equity funds and other investors are asking if its owner might be willing to sell the building that is supposed to replace the fallen twin towers. The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey has also hired a broker to shop the still-unbuilt tower.

A sale is far from certain. The rebuilding has been delayed by years of contentious negotiations with Larry Silverstein, who leased the entire World Trade Center site from the Port Authority weeks before the 9/11 attacks. But as a private investor, Mr. Silverstein is the only party so far who has managed to rebuild anything at the Trade Center. And he was able to do so because control over the site of 7 World Trade, just north of Ground Zero, was undivided, unlike the mess of interests that have delayed the development of the rest of the site. So putting the Freedom Tower into private hands would decrease the risks of further delay.

As part of the deal that finally got construction moving, the Port Authority agreed to retake control of the Freedom Tower from Mr. Silverstein. But the Port's record as a property manager is spotty at best, and taxpayers are not well-served by taking on the $1 billion or more that the Port would need to borrow to finish the tower.

The twin towers were underoccupied and underutilized for at least two decades after their construction. Letting private capital take on the risks of turning a profit on the new 2.6 million-square-foot, 1,776-foot tower would ensure that history does not repeat itself at taxpayer expense.

WAR NEWS:

Parties Put Their Vets Out Front For Iraq Debate (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats offered a display of military force Tuesday as the House began three days of debate on a resolution expressing disapproval of President Bush's decision to commit 21,500 more troops to the war in Iraq.

Eleven military veterans, whose service stretched from World War II to the current conflict in Iraq, were among Democrats speaking in favor of the resolution. They ranged from Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, a soldier during World War II and the longest-serving member of the House, to newly elected Rep. Joe Sestak of Pennsylvania, a former three-star admiral whose aircraft carrier battle group conducted operations in the Afghan and Iraqi conflicts.

Sestak questioned "the continuing use of our national treasure in what is an inconclusive, open-ended involvement." Dingell was more blunt, saying that the debate over Iraq boils down to whether "there will be more deaths if we leave or more deaths if we stay."

Republicans will counter on Thursday, when Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas leads a group of GOP veterans speaking against the resolution.

Johnson spent nearly seven years as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam after his plane was shot down; he was released 34 years ago this week. At a news conference Tuesday, he cited his experience in warning about the effects that debate could have on troops.

"Our captors would blare horrible recordings over the loudspeaker of Americans protesting back home, tales of Americans spitting on Vietnam veterans when they came home," he said. "And I promised myself many things I would do when I returned home safely to my family, and one was that I would fight to ensure America never lets our troops down in harm's way again. And that is what this is about."

By letting combat veterans take a lead role on the opening day of the debate, Democrats were directly confronting Republican accusations that any debate about the war will undercut U.S. servicemembers. "Our troops in the field, as long as they are in the field, will have our 100% support," vowed House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

The debate Tuesday was the first the House has held on the war since it passed a resolution Oct. 10, 2002, authorizing the use of force in Iraq. That 296-133 vote included 81 Democrats voting in favor. Many of them are now expressing regrets about the war.

"We find ourselves to be in the middle of what I consider to be a great American tragedy," said House Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., a co-sponsor of the current resolution who voted to authorize the use of force in 2002. "The mission of this Congress must be to change our course."

The intensity of the debate reflected the political significance of the non-binding Iraq resolution. Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., argued that a vote in favor of the measure would amount to "a vote of no confidence in our troops" and would "dishonor those who made the ultimate sacrifice." Meanwhile, Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, called it "a political charade" that demonstrated that Democrats lack the courage to go further.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said that the pending resolution was only the beginning of congressional steps to try to change Iraq war policy. "A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation, which will be coming to the House floor," she said.

All 435 House members will have a chance to speak for five minutes for or against the resolution before the vote Friday. The resolution states that lawmakers "will continue to support and protect" troops in Iraq but that the House "disapproves" of the president's plan to send more.

House Democrats' New Strategy: Force Slow End To War (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 14, 2007

Top House Democrats, working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to U.S. involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options.

Led by Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., and supported by several well-funded anti-war groups, the coalition's goal is to limit or sharply reduce the number of U.S. troops available for the Iraq conflict, rather than to openly cut off funding for the war itself.

The legislative strategy will be supplemented by a multimillion-dollar TV ad campaign designed to pressure vulnerable GOP incumbents into breaking with President Bush and forcing the administration to admit that the war is politically unsustainable.

As described by participants, the goal is crafted to circumvent the biggest political vulnerability of the anti-war movement -- the accusation that it is willing to abandon troops in the field. That fear is why many Democrats have remained timid in challenging Bush, even as public support for the president and his Iraq policies have plunged.

Murtha and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., have decided that they must take the lead in pressuring not only Republicans but also cautious Senate Democrats to take steps more aggressive than nonbinding resolutions in challenging the Bush administration.

The House strategy is being crafted quietly, even as the chamber is immersed this week in an emotional, albeit mostly symbolic, debate over a resolution expressing opposition to Bush's plan to "surge" 21,500 more troops into Iraq.

Murtha, the powerful chairman of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, will seek to attach a provision to an upcoming $93 billion supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Afghanistan. It would restrict the deployment of troops to Iraq unless they meet certain levels adequate manpower, equipment and training to succeed in combat. That's a standard Murtha believes few of the units Bush intends to use for the surge would be able to meet.

In addition, Murtha, acting with the backing of the House Democratic leadership, will seek to limit the time and number of deployments by soldiers, Marines and National Guard units to Iraq, making it tougher for Pentagon officials to find the troops to replace units that are scheduled to rotate out of the country. Additional funding restrictions are also being considered by Murtha, such as prohibiting the creation of U.S. military bases inside Iraq, dismantling the notorious Abu Ghraib prison and closing the American detention facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"There's a D-Day coming in here, and it's going to start with the supplemental and finish with the '08 [defense] budget," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, who chairs the Air and Land Forces subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee.

Pelosi and other top Democrats are not yet prepared for an open battle with the White House over ending funding for the war, and they are wary of Republican claims that Democratic leaders would endanger the welfare of U.S. troops. The new approach of first reducing the number of troops available for the conflict, while maintaining funding levels for units already in the field, gives political cover to conservative House Democrats who are nervous about appearing "anti-military" while also mollifying the anti-war left, which has long been agitating for Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., to be more aggressive.

"What we have staked out is a campaign to stop the war without cutting off funding" for the troops, said Tom Mazzie of Americans Against Escalation of the War in Iraq. "We call it the 'readiness strategy.'"

Murtha's proposal, which has been kept under tight wraps, is likely to pass the House next month or in early April as part of the supplemental spending bill, Democratic insiders said, if the language remains tightly focused and does not threaten funding levels for combat forces already in the field. The battle will then shift to the Senate. Anti-war groups like Mazzie's are prepared to spend at least $6.5 million on a TV ad campaign and at least $2 million more on a grass-roots lobbying effort. Vulnerable GOP incumbents like Sens. Norm Coleman of Minnestoa, Susan Collins of Maine, Gordon Smith of Oregon and John Sununu of New Hampshire will be targeted by the anti-war organizations, according to Mazzie and former Rep. Tom Andrews, D-Maine, head of the Win Without War Coalition.

Mazzie also said anti-war groups would field primary and general election challengers to Democratic lawmakers who do not support proposals to end the war, a direct challenge to conservative incumbents who are attempting to straddle the political line between their pro- and anti-war constituents.

If the Senate does not approve these new funding restrictions, or if Senate Republicans filibuster the supplemental bill, Pelosi and the House Democratic leadership would then be able to ratchet up the political pressure on the White House to accede to their demands by "slow-walking" the supplemental bill. Additionally, House Democrats could try to insert the Murtha provisions into the fiscal 2008 defense authorization and spending bills, which are scheduled to come to the floor later in the year.

"We will set benchmarks for readiness," said a top Democratic leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity. If enacted, these provisions would have the effect of limiting the number of troops available for the Bush surge plan, while blunting the GOP charge that Democrats are cutting funding for the troops. "We are not cutting funding for any [unit] in Iraq," said the aide, who admitted the Democratic maneuver would not prevent the president from sending some additional forces to Baghdad. "We want to limit the number who can go ... We're trying to build a case that the president needs to change course."

Mazzie, though, suggested that Democrats ought to directly rebut the Republican charge that Democrats are threatening the safety of American forces in the field by pushing restrictions on war funding. "Cutting off funding as described by the media and White House is a caricature," Mazzie said. "It has never happened in U.S. history, and it won't happen now."

Andrews, who met with Murtha on Tuesday to discuss legislative strategy, acknowledged "there is a relationship" with the House Democratic leadership and the anti-war groups, but added, "It is important for our members that we not be seen as an arm of the Democratic Caucus or the Democratic Party. We're not hand in glove."

Andrews's group has launched a new Web site, MoveCongress.org, and he has already posted an interview with Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of the founders of the "Out of Iraq Caucus" in the House. An interview with Murtha on his legislative strategy will be posted on the site Thursday.

"I don't know how you vote against Murtha," said Andrews. "It's kind of an ingenious thing."

Good report.

by Obvi on 02.13.2007 at 11:51 PM

I am sorry to have to say this Danae, but you are wrong. When determing the best means to fight terrorism, one must determine the roots of it. Terrorism is spawned and aided by the West's continued intervention and presence in the Middle East. By merely being in Iraq, the U.S. is creating a greater threat to its homeland.

One of the best ways to combat terrorism would be to stop giving them reasons and motivation to recruit new martyrs and suicide bombers to their cause. One way of doing this is by pulling out of Iraq as fast as possible. Please do not call me a coward or point out that I suggest 'cutting and running.' This is ridiculous rhetoric that is the only semblance of an argument against continued loss of American lives in Iraq, the siphoning of billions of U.S. dollars into a lost cause, and standing in the middle of a civil war. The only way we "win" the War in Iraq is if we stay there for another two decades and poor a couple trillion dollars into the stabilization of Iraq.

This is impractical and, for lack of a better word, stupid. The neocon arguments of staying in Iraq are feeble and play the 'patriotism' card when really, if they had America's best interests at heart, and understood the problem fully, would suggest that the U.S.'s war in Iraq is only increasing the threat of terrorism.

The terrorists who claim to desire jihad on the West are a minority in the Middle East, but continued intervention and presence in their region might turn them into a majority (one of the reasons that fueled Osama bin Laden's hatred for the West was U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia during the First Gulf War). Recent studies and polling data would suggest that the younger citizens of most Middle Eastern states see their job, the economy, and their family more important than religious ideology. Religious extremism is not in the minds of Muslims, until the U.S. gives reason for it to be.

DOJ_NMG_0131821

The U.S. should leave as quickly as possible to retain what resources it has

by Obvi on 02.13.2007 at 11:43 PM

I am sorry to have to say this Danae, but you have no clue what you are talking about. Recent polling data from the Gulf states and other Middle Eastern states would suggest that the younger generations favor economic stability, their jobs, and their family moreso than religious propaganda.

With this taken into consideration, our mere presence in Iraq is fueling terrorism. If one is to answer 'how do we win the war on terror,' one must ask why spawns terrorism. The simple answer to that is western intervention in the Middle East.

Do you think that radical Islamists will be better able to recruit new suicide bombers and martyrs if we are no longer directly antagonizing them?

The Islamists that would plan an attack on U.S. soil are in a small minority, and would only become smaller if the U.S. were to stop giving them reasons to hate us. Our mere presence in Iraq is one of those reasons why they hate us.

Osama bin Laden originally was upset with the U.S. because we stationed troopes in Saudi Arabia during the First Gulf War. Obviously if we remain there, all we are going to do is get caught in a civil war with no end in sight, billions siphoned to a lost cauuse, and a greater threat of terrorism.

The terrorists will not follow us back home if we leave Iraq because their cause will only be hindered by doing so.

by Danae on 02.13.2007 at 11:11 PM

John Murtha is a CRIMINAL, an Un-indicted co-conspirator. That he is still in office is repugnant. The man is not only a coward, he's a criminal. In other words, a Star in the Democratic Party. Go look it up. John Murtha is SLIME squared.

SeriousBob:

THEY SAY IT THEMSELVES! The IslamoFacists say Iraq is the FRONT LINE in the war against the West, the war THEY declared against US. Think its gonna end unless we DEFEAT THEM UTTERLY??? Then you are a moronic fool that deserves to be buyin a shiny new prayer Mat and Prayin to Mecca 5 times a day. READ what comes out of the Middle Eastern Newspapers, their TV their PROPAGANDA. They want to KILL you or force you to pray to Allah! There is NO middle ground with them. Welcome to the Crusades. Pray to Allah or die. Any Questions?

I choose to fight, I choose to support an Administration that recognizes this danger and will fight it to bloody well WIN. Liberals just want to roll over and hope that these Muslims will just let them be. Well, here's a news flash: Go buy a Prayer rug and a Koran if the Liberals win the Whitehouse, they don't have the balls to fight and the Muslims KNOW IT. They support Democratic United States Candidates for a REASON, they know that you are defeated already.

Will SOMEONE in the PRESS please do a story- The story is... the folks who keep claiming if we leave Irag the terrorists will follow us home- are merely asked, to explain how that works exactly?? simply ask them to spell it out.

All the Republican candidtates repeat this absurd concept and the press repeats it and no one seems to care that it makes no sense. NONE.

Are we expected to believe that if al-Qaeda had a choice to attack st louis - they would not because we are still in Iraq?. Whats the connection?. Trust me the number one priority is to attack us here... and whether we are in iraq or not, the number one priority is still to attack the US. By staying in Iraq the terrorist are not interested in us here? . insane.

I would argue that we are less safe here by being so strectched over there. But please someone -do a story and force these talking heads to explain how it decreases the chance that we will be attacked here by staying in iraq. Please debunk this insane and repeated claim that if we leave Iraq they will follow us home.... it is infuriating

Yep, the Democrats seem to be playing 'cut and run'. They know they don't have the votes to cut off spending (yet), so they they force four days of debate on an umammendable 'non-binding resolution' that serves no real purpose.

I like what Mike Pence had to say today...."What happens if the surge works?"

Intrepid -- i hate to burst your right-wing bubble, but not all of us who are against the war and against Bush are crazy lefties. I'm a registered Independent, a gun-owner, church-goer, meat-eater, etc. I still think Bush is a terrible president and that his war is a joke.

JOHN MURTHA IS THE ONLY ONE WHO TOOK AN INITAL STAND AGAINST IRAQ. HE IS A COMBAT VET,MUCH THE OPPOSITE OF THE DRAFT DODGERS SENDING OTHER PEOPLES' KIDS TO GET KILLED IN THEIR QUEST FOR OIL.ANYTHING HE AND NANCY PELOSI CAN DO TO CUT THE WASTED MONEY AND LIVES IN THAT SWAMP IN IRAQ, IS LONG OVERDUE. THE NEXT LOGICAL STEP IS TO CUT FUNDING COMPLETELY. WE LOST OUR CREDIBILITY IN THE WORLD,OUR FOCUS ON BIN LADEN,WHILE BUSH CONTINUES TO CHIRP ABOUT THE "WAR ON TERROR IS IN IRAQ". THE LIES AND DECEIT FROM THESE PEOPLE IN THE WHITE HOUSE IS REPULSIVE.WHY IMPEACHMENT HEARINGS HAVE NOT YET BEGUN,IS BEYOND ME.

The article by Bresnihan provides considerable facts and insights into the politicking over the ?troop surge.? The focus is clearly on the democrat party?s predictable, yet bizarre, change in strategy. My take is that they are simply hedging their bets.

SS: ?He?s got it coming.? Interesting line. I am having a hard time understanding how you conclude, or at least imply, that the slow bleed will lead to President Bush?s impeachment.

Capt D: For sure you?re no Shakespeare. I can actually understand what you write. But if the politicians worked to solve the problems in Iraq, they wouldn?t be politicians! Seriously, what I really want to know is, who are the sexy pundits?

by jameskbachman on 02.13.2007 at 09:43 PM

Yes, yes, yes, we want defeat. We want defeat of the ill-conceived war plan, not the surge, which was allowable under the Iraq Study Group report. After a few months, or whatever is reasonably considered a "short term" surge (no later than November), have the U.S. troops disengage from sectarian combat in Baghdad, and help those thousands of people there who have become refugees. Pressure the government to follow through on their plan for new housing for refugees. If the Sunnis and Shias are in safe areas, where they are each in the majority, and can rely on their own militias like the one in Kurdistan, there will be some kind of peace in Iraq. The U.S. can remain to deal with Al-Quaeda, which is the real enemy.

by tnproud2b on 02.13.2007 at 09:06 PM

PS

Don't hold you breath for an impeachment. At least not until Dubya boinks a chubby intern and lies about it.

by tnproud2b on 02.13.2007 at 09:04 PM

So the Democrats' plan for victory in Iraq is to chart a course for slow defeat.

by Steve Slatten on 02.13.2007 at 08:35 PM

CaptainDiv -- Someone's been reading too much Shakespeare. Forsooth from whence to be shamed... well, you know the rest. Anyway, yeah, you're pretty much dead-on when you say the Dems are slowly going to bleed Bush dry.

But then, he's got it coming. Bush took his crazy-right agenda and tried to ram it down the country's throat for six years. I know Republicans don't like compromise because they think they're right about everything, but you cannot govern as if the other party does not exist, the way Bush did for his first five years. The other party will always get ya in the end. Just ask Bill Clinton. He also acted like he had a mandate in '92 and like the Republicans didn't exist. Again, you know the rest of the story.

So, settle in and get ready for a niiiiiice lonnnnng impeachment hearing. I hope to have a front row seat (or at least C-Span and some popcorn). Like I said, he's got it coming.

by Intrepid1 on 02.13.2007 at 08:31 PM

Notice how the anti-war groups are firmly entreched in these acts of sedition. Remember how the Dems ran against lobbyists and special interests prior to the election? Well this proves they are much bigger special interest sluts than the GOP ever was.MoveOn and the other American Communist Workers Party commrades are the Dems puppet masters lol.

by Captain Div on 02.13.2007 at 08:23 PM

Is anyone actually fooled by this? The only reason the democrats are interested in crafting a "slow bleed" policy is because they know if they cut and bail right now, they're the ones who will be held responsible for the chaos that ensues. They want to win big in '08. They won't do that.

Instead, the idea here is to do as much as possible to ensure that the Bush administration's efforts are as handicapped as possible without actually forcing it to pull out. By ensuring that Bush slowly twists in the wind for the next couple of years, by ensuring that the state of things in Iraq stays the same and does not improve, they can improve their odds of winning the presidency in '08.

And there are those who will say that's just fine - the ends justifies the means. Shame! If only we could put politics aside and look at actually solving the problems in Iraq - first of all by listening to General Petreaus and giving him what he needs to win, instead of listening to the sexy pundits on TV. . .

But, politics are politics, and in the lust for power, ideology always wins over reason.

Shame!

House Begins Debate On War (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman
The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The House plunged into a heated, partisan debate yesterday on President Bush's war policy, with Democrats challenging lawmakers to take a stand against the deployment of more troops to Iraq while Republicans accused their political foes of emboldening the enemy with their symbolic resolution.

Democrats won control of Congress last fall in a political backlash against Bush's Iraq policy, and yesterday they decried a war they said was illegitimately launched and has been badly managed, with devastating consequences. They were helped by three newly elected Democratic lawmakers who were propelled into politics by their military experience in Iraq.

"We stand together to tell this administration that we are against the escalation, and to say with one voice that Congress will no longer be a blank check to the president's failed policies," said freshman Rep. Patrick J. Murphy (D-Pa.), who was a captain with the 82nd Airborne Division in Baghdad. "The president's plan to send more of our best and bravest to die refereeing a civil war in Iraq is wrong."

Republicans focused on loftier themes, warning darkly about ceding Iraq to Islamic radicals who are bent on destroying not only the Middle East but also the American way of life. "We are engaged in a global war now for our very way of life," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). "And every drop of blood that's been spilled in defense of liberty and freedom from the American Revolution to this very moment is for nothing if we're unwilling to stand up and fight this threat."

Scores of Democratic and Republican lawmakers took to the floor on the first of what is likely to be three days of intense debate on a tightly worded resolution opposing Bush's decision to deploy more than 20,000 additional U.S. combat troops to Iraq.

The resolution affirms Congress's support for "the members of the United States Armed Forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq" before breaking with the president's new strategy.

The debate is expected to extend late into the night today and tomorrow before culminating in a House vote Friday. It is not the first extended House debate on the war, but it is the first since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago that is likely to conclude with a vote against the president.

"In a few days and in fewer than 100 words, we will take our country in a new direction on Iraq," pledged House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "Friday's vote will signal whether the House has heard the American people: No more blank checks for President Bush on Iraq."

The House debate unfolded in an orderly, dignified fashion, in stark contrast to last week's tumult in the Senate, where Republicans blocked even a debate on the war resolution. Under House rules that heavily favor the majority, Democrats set the terms of the debate and even denied Republicans the opportunity to introduce an alternative measure. By the end of the week, only the Democratic resolution will come to a vote in the House, despite party leaders' pledges last week to give Republicans at least one vote.

The Democratic resolution is not binding on the administration, and both sides of the debate agreed that the real fight will come next month, when Democrats are to move to attach to a $100 billion war spending bill binding language that would limit future deployments to Iraq and begin to bring troops home.

Still, passage of the resolution this week would be a stinging repudiation of Bush's strategy to try to put down sectarian violence in Baghdad by bolstering troop levels, and Republicans struggled to discredit the importance of the measure.

Boehner denounced it "a political charade lacking both the seriousness and the gravity of the issue that it's meant to represent," even as he called the resolution "the first step toward abandoning Iraq."

House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) decried "a rather toothless 97 words" that "does nothing to help win the war" and "doesn't do anything to help stop it, either." Yet minutes later, he warned that its passage "puts us one day closer to handing militant Islamists a safe haven the size of California."

In a formal letter to GOP colleagues, Reps. Peter Hoekstra (Mich.) and John Shadegg (Ariz.) encouraged lawmakers to avoid discussing the resolution and focus instead on a wider war against Islamic radicals.

"This debate should not be about the surge or its details," they wrote. "This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date, mistakes that have been made, or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

Democrats, torn between their liberal wing wanting binding action to stop the war and their more cautious conservatives, were no less conflicted. Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (Calif.) promised that passage of the resolution would be only a first step toward ending what he called "this nightmare." But he also put Friday's vote in the starkest possible terms.

"This simple resolution will establish the first marker," Lantos said. "Those who want to draw down the U.S. presence will be on one side of that marker. Those who want to take further steps into the quagmire will be on the other."

Democratic leaders showcased the three veterans of the Iraq war in a bid to enhance the credibility of their case. Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.) brought to the debate the credentials of a retired admiral who commanded an aircraft-carrier battle group in Iraq. He condemned "the continuing use of our national treasure in what is an inconclusive, open-ended involvement within a country where the long-term benefits do not match what we need to reap."

Rep. Tim Walz (D-Minn.) fretted over the National Guardsmen he taught in high school and then trained for deployment to the war.

Said Murphy: "We often hear from our colleagues on the other side that the only way to support the troops is to blindly support the president. I ask anyone to look at Admiral Joe Sestak, a man who was responsible for the safety and security of 15,000 sailors and Marines, and tell him that he does not support the troops. I ask anyone to look at Sergeant Major Tim Walz -- a man who served his country for 24 years in the Minnesota National Guard as a noncommissioned officer, the backbone of our Army -- and tell him he does not support our troops."

"We are the troops," he concluded, "and we oppose the president's escalation of troops."

House Debate: Prelude To A Faceoff? (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — One by one they stepped to the front of the House chamber Tuesday, where lawmakers have debated every major U.S. military conflict since the Civil War.

There was the Iraq veteran elected to Congress in November who is pushing for an end to a war he said was "immoral." From the other side came the stepmother of a Marine pilot who warned that any retreat in Iraq would aid only "the suicide bombers, the leaders of Al Qaeda [and] the rulers of Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0131826

Deep into the night, a parade of lawmakers from both parties drew on philosophers, generals and former presidents to make their points. They talked of wars long over and those that haven't begun. It was the opening act in a weeklong rhetorical battle over a resolution renouncing President Bush's latest proposal to quell the violence in Iraq.

The measure is expected to pass in the Democratic-controlled House, but it will not have a direct effect on the president's plans to deploy 21,500 more troops in Iraq, in what has been billed as a last bid to restore order to Baghdad and other parts of the country.

The two-sentence, nonbinding resolution expresses "support" for U.S. forces and "disapproval" of the White House plan; Bush has said he will ignore it.

Still, Congress' first full-scale debate on the war since Democrats won control of Capitol Hill has been cast as the prelude to a looming faceoff over concrete efforts to end the U.S. involvement in Iraq.

In making their case for the resolution, Democrats on Tuesday said it would help end what Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri called a "great American tragedy" that was destroying the military and weakening the nation.

Republican after Republican countered that the resolution represented what Rep. Duncan Hunter of El Cajon termed "the first sign of retreat" by America in the war on global terrorism.

Dozens of speakers from both sides of the aisle aired their views. Dozens more will be heard from today. And by the time of Friday's scheduled vote, most of the 434 members of the House are expected to have said their piece — a rarity that underscores the importance of the topic.

Many Democrats, including Iraq war veteran Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania, made clear that they wanted to follow the resolution vote with binding steps to force the Pentagon to begin withdrawing the more than 135,000 U.S. forces now in Iraq.

"Walking in my own combat boots, I saw firsthand this administration's failed policy," Murphy said in his floor speech. "It is immoral to send young Americans to fight and die in a conflict without a real strategy for success."

Murphy is pushing legislation with California Rep. Mike Thompson of St. Helena, a Vietnam veteran, that calls for a phased withdrawal. So too are Democrats Lynn Woolsey of Petaluma, Barbara Lee of Oakland and Maxine Waters of Los Angeles, the leaders of the congressional "out of Iraq" caucus.

Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania — a Vietnam veteran whose call for a withdrawal more than a year ago helped energize Democratic opposition to the war — has said he plans to use congressional authority over the Pentagon budget to limit Bush's planned troop buildup.

"We must be mindful of the sacrifices our military personnel are being asked to make in this war and the toll it is taking on them, on their families and on our veterans," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said as she opened debate on the resolution Tuesday.

"In the spirit of responsibility for our troops and the patriotism we all share, let us consider whether the president's escalation proposal will lessen the violence in Iraq and bring the troops home," said Pelosi, who sought to focus the debate over the resolution on the well-being of the U.S. military.

Republicans have long tagged Democratic opposition to the war as an attack on the military.

On Tuesday, Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) — a Vietnam veteran who 34 years ago Monday was released after seven years in a North Vietnamese prisoner of war camp — called the Democratic resolution a "first step for them to cut funding for our troops in harm's way."

Johnson made his remarks to reporters; he and other Republican war veterans plan to deliver their House speeches opposing the resolution on Thursday.

Many GOP lawmakers who spoke Tuesday adhered to a message delivered by Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who cast the Democratic measure as a road to surrender.

"We know what Al Qaeda thinks when America retreats from the battlefield," he said. "They think we can't stomach a fight. This is why they haven't been afraid to strike us whenever they've had the opportunity."

Invoking President Lincoln's perseverance during the Civil War, Boehner said: "History does not long entrust the care of freedom to the weak or the timid."

Two other Republican lawmakers sent their colleagues a letter that made a similar point.

DOJ_NMG_0131827

"The debate should not be about the [troop] surge or its details. This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date," Reps. John Shadegg of Arizona and Peter Hoekstra of Michigan wrote.

"Rather the debate must be about the global threat of the radical Islamist movement…. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

Several Republican lawmakers — including Rep. Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, who is cosponsoring the resolution — have broken with their party over the war. Those voices were not heard Tuesday, however, and it remains uncertain whether the measure will attract a significant number of GOP votes.

Typical of the Republican message that emerged Tuesday were comments by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. Her stepson and his wife are Marine pilots, and she expressed concern that they would face a more determined enemy if the resolution were adopted.

"If we run, [terrorists] will pursue," she said, standing in front of large photos her two loved ones in uniform. "If we cower, they will strike."

Ros-Lehtinen closed by saying she was worried that her daughter-in-law, who is about to be deployed to Afghanistan, "could face a more deadly enemy" depending on what House lawmakers do this week.

In the Senate last week, another nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup was cut short when Democrats failed to gather enough GOP support to debate the measure. But Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said Tuesday he would bring up the House measure for discussion later this month.

Pelosi: Iraq Resolution Is Just The Beginning (HILL)

By Klaus Marre And Mike Soraghan

The Hill, February 14, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told her colleagues and the country yesterday that the non-binding resolution disapproving of President Bush's troop surge is only the first step in congressional action on Iraq, and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he is taking steps to bring the same measure to a vote in the upper chamber.

"In a few days and in fewer than 100 words, we will take our country in a new direction on Iraq," Pelosi said in her floor speech on the measure. "A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation which will be coming to the House floor."

Meantime, Reid said he prefers the House resolution to a bipartisan compromise that had been crafted in his own chamber.

"I think it's so much more direct: We support the troops; we're opposed to the surge. Perfect," Reid told reporters, adding, "I support what the House does. I'm very happy with what they're doing, and I like the way they're doing it."

While Democrats want to portray the debate as a referendum on the president and his Iraq strategy, House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the resolution is "criticizing the latest efforts by American forces to win in Iraq."

His remarks follow a "Dear Colleague" letter that Reps. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) and Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.) sent to Republicans yesterday, asking them not to debate the resolution on the Democrats' terms.

"The debate should not be on the surge or its details," the lawmakers said. "This debate should not even be about the war to date, mistakes that have been made, or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

Shadegg and Hoekstra attached to their letter a map showing where across the world terrorists had attacked since 2002, and they encouraged Republicans to ask the Democrats "the essential question: If we do not defeat radical Islam in Iraq, then where will we do so?"

Democrats, worried about being viewed as unpatriotic or disloyal to the troops, went out of their way to take any opportunity to praise the soldiers in Iraq. In addition, the Democratic lineup on the first of three days of debates on the resolution was laden with veterans of several wars.

Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), a retired general, began the debate by saying he is "opposed to a troop surge that doubles down on a bad military bet that has been tried already."

DOJ_NMG_0131828

Iraq war veteran Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), who served in Iraq until the beginning of 2004, said he saw "firsthand this administration's failed policy in Iraq," adding that more troops were needed four years ago, not now."

Republicans countered by saying passage of the resolution would hurt morale among U.S. forces while boosting it for the country's enemies.

Boehner called the measure a "political charade," adding that "non-binding means non-leadership. It's not accountable. And I don't think it's the right message for our troops."

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said the country should "see this move for what it really is: a political first step to cutting off funding for the dangerous mission our troops face."

Rep. Sam Johnson (R-Texas) wanted the House to also vote on an amendment that would have put members on the record that they would not cut funding for combat troops. It was rejected during a Rules Committee hearing Monday night.

When Republicans spoke to reporters yesterday to express their disappointment with the closed rule, Boehner began to cry when Johnson described how he learned of a cut to Vietnam War funding after he had spent seven years as a prisoner of war.

The resolution voicing support for the troops and disapproval of the troop surge is expected to be passed Friday. A vast majority of Democrats is expected to support it, as are several Republicans.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) yesterday declined to predict how many GOP members would support the resolution.

"I don't want to be an oracle in this case," he said, adding that he expects Republicans to be subjected to White House arm-twisting.

Hoyer continued to defend the Democratic leadership's decision to nix consideration of a competing Republican resolution. He admitted that "it sounds like we're not doing what we said we were going to do" because Democrats had promised a more open process.

"This is the only way to make a very clear, unambiguous statement," Hoyer said. "This is in response to a Republican president who's made a proposal."

House Begins Full Debate On The Iraq War (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Michael Luo

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — The House opened a full-throated debate on Tuesday over the Iraq war as lawmakers began considering a resolution to denounce President Bush's plan to add troops. Democratic leaders said the debate was the first step in using Congressional authority to intervene in the conflict.

"There is no end in sight," Speaker Nancy Pelosi said. "The American people have lost faith in President Bush's course of action in Iraq, and they are demanding a new course of action."

In the first hours, Democrats sought to present their case through the voices of veterans who are in Congress, offering a narrative running from World War II battlefields to Iraqi deserts.

The debate on the nonbinding resolution, scheduled to end on Friday, is the first substantive war deliberation since the Democrats won control of Congress last year.

Republicans said at least 24 members of their party might join the rebuke of Mr. Bush, and party leaders forcefully defended the Iraq strategy. The resolution would not only send a disturbing message to American troops, they said, but also endanger America.

"This is a political charade lacking both the seriousness and the gravity of the issue that it's meant to represent," said Representative John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican who is minority leader. "The question is. 'Do we have the resolve necessary to defeat our terrorist enemies?' "

After negotiations over competing proposals faltered last week in the Senate, the House picked up the discussion and boiled down its resolution to express support for American forces and disapproval for the plan to add 20,000 troops in Iraq.

On its face, several Republicans conceded, the resolution was difficult to oppose. Two Republicans, John Shadegg of Arizona and Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, instructed their colleagues to make the debate about the fight against terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0131829

"If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose," they wrote in a letter.

Many Republicans who spoke on Tuesday appeared to heed that message, framing the war as an important battleground in a global struggle against militant Islam.

"It's not George Bush's war," Representative J. Gresham Barrett, Republican of South Carolina, said. "This is our war. There is only one way out of this war — victory."

With Democrats controlling the chamber for the first time since the war began, they did not allow Republicans to present amendments to the resolution. The tactic drew objections from Republicans, including Representative David Dreier of California, who said, "Our Democratic colleagues are running roughshod over our national security."

Democrats dismissed the criticism, but sought to temper the tone of the debate, and the scope of the resolution, to avoid alienating all Republicans. Democratic leaders also distributed information sheets to help respond to Republican criticisms and shape floor speeches. Each representative is allotted at least five minutes for the floor speeches.

The debate, which was scheduled to proceed to midnight for three days in a row, was tightly choreographed. Democrats started with the war veterans, leaving many of the fiercest war critics until later. Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio, for example, did not speak until after the dinner hour.

"My experience during World War II was much different than the hell our men and women in Iraq now must face," said Representative John D. Dingell, Democrat of Michigan. "Sixty years ago, we knew our mission. We knew the outcome, and we knew the battle lines."

Representative Patrick J. Murphy, Democrat of Pennsylvania, is the lone Iraq veteran in Congress. Before winning election in November, he was a captain in the 82nd Airborne. He was awarded a Bronze Star for his Iraq service from 2003 to 2004.

"The president's plan to send more of our best and bravest to die refereeing a civil war in Iraq is wrong," said Mr. Murphy, who recalled leading convoys up what was known as Ambush Alley in Baghdad. "The president's current strategy is not resolute. It is reckless."

Off the floor, both parties monitored the debate, particularly its ramifications for new members who could be vulnerable in the next elections. Shortly after Mr. Murphy finished speaking, Republican strategists sent an e-mail message to reporters highlighting a quotation from 2004 when he spoke highly of the administration's Iraq plan.

Republican leaders and administration officials worked behind the scenes to prevent a wide defection. The White House arranged a briefing for selected members, linking them by secure satellite to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV in Baghdad, who spoke of the need for a troop increase.

Ambassadors from several Middle East countries met several Republicans and warned them of the consequences of withdrawing troops.

Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, ranking Republican on the House International Relations Committee, seized on that argument and suggested that a rebuke to the president would resonate far beyond the Capitol and make the United States look weak.

As Ms. Ros-Lehtinen spoke, she pointed to photographs of two family members in uniform who have served in Iraq.

"Our words will be heard by our friends, but also by our enemies," she said. "No weakness of ours will go unnoticed."

The discussion foreshadowed an intense debate as Democrats prepare to assert authority over war spending. To fight accusations that they are failing to support the troops, Democratic leaders are leaning toward attaching conditions to money, not simply blocking it for financing the Iraq and Afghanistan operations.

The conditions could include barring the financing of permanent military bases in Iraq and limiting deployments of National Guard troops to no more than two tours of duty.

As the debate proceeded, the rumblings of the far more complicated debate on financing began to surface from several Democrats who are urging the party to consider reduced war financing. Such a step is precarious, particularly for lawmakers outside Democratic strongholds.

Not so for Representative Maxine Waters of California, who leads the 75-member Out of Iraq caucus. Ms Waters called the resolution a first step in "reining in this president and his misguided policies."

DOJ_NMG_0131830

As her voice rose, she said she had no choice but to oppose continuing to funnel money to this “war giant whose appetite cannot be satisfied.”

Republicans Rip House Surge Resolution (WT)

By Jon Ward And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

Republicans yesterday criticized the House resolution condemning President Bush's plan to send reinforcement troops to Iraq, saying it sends a message to America's enemies that Congress is not willing to fight the war on terror.

"This is not the time to shrink from the battle," Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said at a morning press conference. "We're going to embolden our enemies, and they will in fact follow us home to America."

House Republicans made a concerted effort to begin, in their words, "elevating the debate" on Iraq, with the goal of emphasizing that Iraq is the central front in a global struggle against radical Islamic terrorism.

House Democrats, however, released an internal Republican memo that showed the minority party was also trying to avoid debating the specifics of the president's plan.

There are currently about 141,000 American troops in Iraq and 27,000 in Afghanistan. Mr. Bush is planning to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, a move intended to secure Baghdad and give the nascent Iraqi government some breathing room.

"The debate should not be about the surge or its details. This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date, mistakes that have been made, or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose," Reps. John Shadegg, Arizona Republican, and Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, wrote in a letter to their House Republican colleagues.

"Rather, the debate must be about the global threat of the radical Islamist movement," the letter stated.

Republicans repeatedly emphasized that theme yesterday, with Mr. Boehner saying that a withdrawal and retreat from Iraq -- which Republicans view as the Democrats' eventual goal -- would "jeopardize the safety of Americans tomorrow and for decades to come."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, criticized the Republicans for "avoiding" the debate.

"Republicans want to do anything but debate Iraq or this new policy of escalation," Mr. Emanuel said.

"Democrats are absolutely committed to winning the war against those who would employ terrorism to hurt our people and to put at risk our country, period," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer.

All 435 House members have been offered the chance to speak for five minutes on the president's "surge" policy in Iraq. Mr. Hoyer said he does not expect all of them to take him up on that offer, but has still scheduled debate from noon until midnight for today and tomorrow, after the same amount of debate yesterday.

Mr. Hoyer declined to end debate early yesterday, even though the rest of the federal government shut down at 2 p.m. because of inclement weather. A vote on the nonbinding resolution is scheduled for Friday.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the U.S. military is fighting a war with "no end in sight."

"The American people have lost faith in President Bush's course of action in Iraq and have demanded a new direction," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Rep. Tom Lantos denied any connection between terrorism and the battle in Iraq. "We are not fighting against terrorism in Iraq," the California Democrat said. "We are attempting to referee a religiously based civil war, which saps our strength."

Mrs. Pelosi said the resolution will pave the way for Democrats to begin restricting the White House's use of funds for the war, with an eye to gradually ending U.S. involvement in Iraq.

"In a few days, and in fewer than 100 words, we will take our country in a new direction on Iraq," she said, in a six-minute speech that began the 36 hours of debate just after noon. "A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation, which will be coming to the House floor."

And yesterday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said he will try to bring the House resolution over to the Senate for a vote on Feb. 27.

Analysis: Dems Barricade Iraq Debate (AP)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

AP, February 14, 2007

Rep. Joe Donnelly is one of a clutch of freshmen Democrats who snagged victories over Republican incumbents last fall amid public discontent over the war in Iraq. Now, as his party prepares to register its opposition to President Bush's plan to boost troop levels, Donnelly is on the fence.

"The most important part of this to me is standing up for the troops and making sure we have full funding for them," Donnelly said Tuesday, after a weekend meeting with veterans' groups and constituents back home in his conservative north-central Indiana district. "I haven't made up my mind yet."

The concerns of members like Donnelly are behind Democrats' strategy for this week's Iraq debate, which was carefully calibrated to bar votes on a GOP alternative that could expose a potentially messy divide within Democratic ranks over whether to cut off or restrict funding for troops on the ground.

Determined to send an unambiguous and bipartisan message of disapproval for the troop buildup, Democrats moved Monday night to block Republicans from proposing any alternative, including one that would have guaranteed funding for U.S. forces in Iraq.

The approach reflects the dilemma facing Democrats on the war, which figured prominently in their rise to power. There is broad support for the Democratic-written resolution opposing Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops. But many rank-and-file members — particularly moderate newcomers who rode to Congress on a wave of public discontent about Iraq — are wary of casting any vote that could be construed as ending funding for the mission.

Army Lt. "General (David) Petraeus is over there, and I want to give him every opportunity to succeed and all the funding and resources that would make that possible," Donnelly said, but he added that he was concerned that a troop increase could amount to "simply providing 21,000 more targets to the Iraqis."

House Republicans assailed Democrats Tuesday for barring them from offering their own Iraq resolution, accusing them of stifling votes on a vital issue.

Rep. David Dreier of California, the senior Rules Committee Republican, said the constraints rendered the 36-hour debate that opened Tuesday morning "really little more than a joke."

Democratic leaders had said earlier that Republicans would have a chance to offer their own measure, but quickly reversed course, and the leadership-controlled Rules Committee voted Monday night to deny the minority the option.

"It became clear to us that the only way we could give to the American people a very clear indication of where the Congress stood as it related to the president's proposal was this process," Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland said.

The tightly controlled approach to running the House is becoming a habit with Democrats, who complained bitterly during their dozen years in the minority about similar Republican tactics. When Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, groused about it on NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday, Hoyer shot back sarcastically, "Poor John."

On Iraq, the new House leaders' strategy is particularly important to holding together a newly shaped Democratic Caucus that includes several moderate newcomers who unseated Republicans amid public dissatisfaction with the war, but whose conservative constituents might balk at the notion of setting deadlines or spending constraints on troops in harm's way.

It also echoes the tack Senate Democrats took earlier this month, when they sought to head off a Republican-written measure declaring that Congress should not cut off funding for troops in the field.

Rep. Ed Perlmutter, D-Colo., a first-termer who said he plans to back his party's measure rejecting the troop increase, said he would be inclined to support a resolution committing Congress to funding U.S. troops.

"I don't want to cut off funding. Our troops are performing magnificently," Perlmutter said. But he added that a funding debate was premature, and said Republicans were trying to "trip us up" by proposing such a measure now, realizing there is "no consensus on funding" among Democrats

"What we are trying to achieve as a caucus is unanimity. We're pretty spread out in terms of where we are," said another freshman Democrat, Rep. Michael Arcuri of New York. "We feel that we want to do what is best for the troops, but we have some differences in terms of how you do that."

DOJ_NMG_0131832

Will Marshall of the center-left Democratic Leadership Council has consulted with freshman Democrats on Iraq. He said there is "broad unity on the fact that we have to start winding the occupation down, not doubling down on it, but after that, I think it's harder to find consensus."

The dilemma is especially profound for newer members.

"They're in marginal districts, competitive districts, almost by definition, so most of them would be leery of voting to cut off funding for the troops. It would be too easy to be caricatured by the Republicans as turning against the troops in the middle of a mission," Marshall said.

Democrats concede that by flexing their muscles to constrain the minority, they risk becoming what they criticized during last year's elections.

"We're going to run a fair House, but we're not going to be naive about it." said Stacey Farnen Bernards, Hoyer's spokeswoman. "We're just trying to give the American people a clear debate and a clear answer" on Iraq.

For Democrats like Donnelly, however, this week's vote is more complex. The Indianan said he's been consulting with other wavering members of his party, although he wouldn't name any.

"We're all trying to talk to each other and work through it," Donnelly said.

House Plunges Into Debate On Iraq War (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 14, 2007

Democrats relentlessly assailed President Bush's policy in Iraq as a catastrophic failure Tuesday as the House plunged into momentous debate on a war that has lost public support and cost more than 3,100 U.S. troops their lives. "No more blank checks," declared Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

"This battle is the most visible part of a global war" against terrorists, countered the Republican leader, Rep. John Boehner, hoping to limit GOP defections on what loomed as an extraordinary wartime rebuke to the commander in chief. "If we leave, they will follow us home. It's that simple."

The Democratic leadership set aside most of the week for the historic debate, expected to culminate in a vote on Friday on a bare-bones, nonbinding resolution that "disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush ... to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

The 95-word measure adds that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect the members of the United States armed forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq."

The debate was Congress' first on Iraq since Democrats gained control of the House and Senate in midterm elections shadowed by voter opposition to the war. Decorum carried the day in the chamber — where catcalls are part of near-daily discourse — as Democrats and Republicans took their five-minute speaking turns across the hours.

Passage was a virtually certainty. Democratic leaders said they expected no more than one or two members of their rank-and-file to oppose the resolution. Republicans said that despite quiet lobbying by the White House, they expected at least two dozen GOP lawmakers to swing behind the measure, suggesting that it would command the votes of at least 250 or 260 votes in the 435-member House.

Across the Capitol, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said he would attempt to pass an identical measure later this month. Republicans blocked debate on a different proposal critical of the troop increase earlier this winter, after Democrats refused to give equal treatment to a GOP-backed alternative.

Democrats made clear the nonbinding measure was the beginning of a longer campaign to bring the war to an end.

"A vote of disapproval will set the stage for additional Iraq legislation, which will be coming to the House floor," said Speaker Pelosi of California, who underscored the significance of the debate by delivering the first speech.

DOJ_NMG_0131833

"In a few weeks, the war in Iraq will enter its fifth year, causing thousands of deaths, tens of thousands of casualties, costing hundreds of billions of dollars and damaging the standing of the United States in the international community. And there is no end in sight," she said.

Boehner followed her to the well of the House seconds later, the first Republican to speak.

"There is no question that the war in Iraq has been difficult. All Americans are frustrated we haven't seen more success more quickly," he conceded. Pivoting quickly, he called the Iraq War the latest in a string of conflicts dating to the founding of the nation more than two centuries ago.

"Every drop of blood that has been spilt in defense of freedom and liberty — from the American Revolution to this very moment — is for nothing if we are unwilling to stand against this threat," he said.

Republican congressional aides said the White House was working against the measure, although presidential press secretary Tony Snow, asked if that was the case, said "no."

"We've made our views known, in terms of what people have to keep in mind. But members of the House and members of the Senate have the freedom to go ahead and write their resolutions and do what they want with them," he said.

Additionally, ambassadors from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and Qatar met with several Republican lawmakers during the day and warned them of the consequences of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., said one ambassador compared the U.S. involvement in Iraq to open-heart surgery — requiring the surgeon to stay until the job was finished.

One by one, Democrats cast the war in starkly different terms.

"The administration's policy on Iraq has failed. It failed yesterday, it's failing today, and it will fail tomorrow," said Rep. Peter Welch of Vermont, serving his first term in Congress after winning his seat last fall. "These failures have left America weakened, not strengthened."

Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, who served in World War II and has been in Congress since 1955, joined the chorus of critics. "When faced with a choice of approving of the president's policy or giving a vote of no confidence, the choice is easy," he said. "I cannot support, nor will I condone, any policy that continues the long train of failure that brought us to this point."

Republican supporters of the administration countered, but were urged to do so carefully.

"If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge (in troops) or the current situation in Iraq, we lose," Reps. John Shadegg of Arizona and Pete Hoekstra of Michigan said in a letter to fellow Republicans.

"As in the Cold War, our current struggle is one of survival," Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., said in floor debate. "The enemy does not mean merely to chase us away. The goal of the Islamist extremist radicals is to destroy us. If we run, they will pursue. If we cower, they will strike."

"The world is watching. The radical jihadists who oppose us are watching," said Shadegg, warning against anything that could signal weakness on the part of the United States.

Republicans had sought to offer an alternative measure, drafted by Rep. Sam Johnson, R-Texas, that would have prohibited Congress from cutting off funds for the troops. Johnson was a prisoner of war during Vietnam, and Boehner teared up before reporters as he listened to the Texan describe his reaction at the time when he learned of anti-war protests back in the United States.

But Democrats decided not to allow a vote on the GOP proposal, and the House decided, 227-197, to uphold the rejection. Republicans said if it had been allowed to come to a vote, their measure would have exposed divisions among Democrats, some of whom have said they will not vote for any more money for the war.

Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., echoing the remarks of other party leaders, said Democrats would protect the members of the armed forces in harm's way. "There will be no defunding which will cause any risk to the troops," he told a news conference.

Numerous Democrats have expressed a determination to withdraw combat forces from Iraq, but they also say they would do so in a way that did not expose the troops to additional danger.

Iraq War Debated In House (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House began a heated debate Tuesday on President Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq as Democrats pushed a resolution that would mark the strongest and most formal rebuke of the administration's conduct of the war.

The resolution crafted by the Democrats is a sparely worded measure stipulating that Congress supports the forces already serving in Iraq but disapproves of Bush's plan to send more troops into the conflict.

Previous attempts by Democrats to influence war policy, including bills calling for a phased withdrawal of troops and the cutting of war funding, have drawn little support. But this non-binding House resolution is expected to pass on Friday, adding momentum to the opposition against the administration's war policy.

"At the end of the debate, we will vote on a straightforward proposition: Whether we support the president's plan or oppose it," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "That vote will signal whether the House has heard the message the American people have sent about this war. The current policies have not worked, will not work and must be changed."

Each of the 434 representatives and five non-voting delegates has been allotted five minutes of floor time for the debate, which will be Congress' most extensive discussion of the war since it began four years ago.

House Republicans pushed an alternate resolution that would have encouraged the White House to implement the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, including talks with Iran and Syria. But the Democratic leadership turned away the GOP measure.

The resolution is designed to attract support from Republicans, many of whom have expressed concern about the troop buildup. The House measure comes a little more than a week after Republicans blocked debate on a lengthier Senate resolution disapproving of the war.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said he plans to call the House resolution for a vote in his chamber Feb. 27.

House Republicans complained that Democrats were pushing the resolution through under a rule that bars amendments or substitute language.

'A political charade'

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the resolution would embolden the terrorists. He also criticized the Democratic leadership for not giving the Bush plan a chance to work, and said the resolution was "a political charade lacking the seriousness or the gravity" of the situation it affects.

The troop buildup has begun in Iraq, with two extra brigades—one Iraqi and one U.S.—already deployed to Baghdad. A brigade is made up of several thousand troops. The Iraqi brigade, however, has already been plagued by high absenteeism.

Dozens of GOP House members are expected to break ranks and vote in favor of the resolution. The White House downplayed the significance of the resolution, although historians say congressional admonition of a president during wartime may be unprecedented.

Stories from back home

White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "Members of the House and members of the Senate have the freedom to go ahead and write their resolutions, and do what they want with them. We do expect those who say they're going to support the troops to support them."

In the first day of 36 hours of scheduled debate, supporters of the resolution accused the president of being misguided in escalating the war, while opponents said the measure was unhelpful to the troops in the field.

Both Democrats and Republicans stood on the House floor and told harrowing stories from constituents in their districts to explain their positions.

Rep. Peter King of New York, the ranking Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, said the war in Iraq is part of the struggle against "militant Islamists" and referred to the hundreds of friends and constituents who died in the Sept. 11 attacks on New York.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) relayed a conversation he had with the mother of a soldier who was killed in a helicopter crash.

DOJ_NMG_0131835

Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.), a freshman congressman and Iraq war veteran, said he had witnessed first-hand the failure of Bush's policy.

"The time for more troops was more than four years ago," Murphy said. "The president's plan to send more of our best and bravest to referee a civil war is wrong."

But Republicans said Democrats were being shortsighted with the resolution.

"What if the 'surge' ... and our brave men and women in Iraq succeed?" asked Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.). "My Democratic colleagues would do well to reflect on this truth: The American people hate losers, but they hate quitters even more."

Democrats have framed the resolution as part of their effort to reduce the involvement of U.S. forces in Iraq and to send a stern message to Iraqi leaders that they must address serious problems plaguing their country. But it remains unclear what other steps the Democrats may take to try to stop Bush's troop buildup.

Obama, Feingold measures

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) has introduced legislation calling for an immediate troop cap and withdrawal of all U.S. combat troops by March 2008. Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) has introduced legislation to cut funding, and a similar measure has been floated in the House.

But the Democratic leadership is wary of being seen as against the troops, and such legislation has gained little traction. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) told reporters Tuesday that the Democrats would not cut off troop funding.

Democrats, however, have discussed the possibility of attaching conditions to the supplemental appropriation for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, requiring changes in the conduct of the wars in exchange for continued funding.

Veterans Take The Lead In House Debate Over Iraq War (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -Veterans from World War II through the current conflict in Iraq led off debate Tuesday as the House of Representatives took up a resolution to oppose President Bush's troop increase for Iraq.

"Walking in my own combat boots, I saw firsthand this administration's failed policy in Iraq," said Rep. Patrick Murphy, D-Pa., a 33-year-old freshman and the first Iraq combat veteran to serve in Congress.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, 58, a California Republican and Vietnam veteran, argued a widely held opposing view, that the resolution signals "the first sound of retreat in the world battle against extremists and terrorists."

With the nonbinding resolution expected to clear the House on Friday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he'll attempt to pass the same language in the Senate at the end of this month, after Congress returns from a weeklong recess. The Senate deadlocked last week on a wordier resolution; the House's is 97 words.

Bush has said he doesn't plan to watch the debate. He said he intends to pursue the troop buildup whatever Congress says.

Even as the nonbinding debate goes on, lawmakers on both sides are looking ahead to binding legislation that Democratic leaders might push through next.

The real wrangling begins next month when the House and Senate tackle Bush's $93.4 billion extra spending request for the current year's fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan. This summer Congress will debate another $623 billion in spending on defense, including the wars, for the coming fiscal year.

It's on these war-spending measures that Democrats, especially in the House, will attempt to set conditions on which troops may be sent, when troops must come home or where they should be deployed.

On Tuesday, opponents of Bush's 21,500-troop increase called on World War II, Korea and Vietnam vets, but ultimately they looked to Murphy to personalize the debate.

"I led convoys up and down Ambush Alley in a Humvee without doors," Murphy said. "The time for more troops was four years ago. Congress will no longer give the president a blank check."

Murphy told colleagues that his parents named him after a Vietnam veteran, Patrick Ward, who had a Philadelphia park named in his honor after being killed in action.

DOJ_NMG_0131836

"How many more street-corner memorials are we going to have for this war?" Murphy said. The president's plan "sends more of our best and bravest to die refereeing a civil war."

Some Republican veterans who disagree with the resolution, including Rep. Sam Johnson of Texas, who was tortured in Vietnam as a prisoner of war, won't speak until later in the week.

Others argued Tuesday that the resolution would demoralize U.S. troops and is the first step toward Democrats cutting off funds for the war.

Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., an Army veteran from the 1950s and `60s, said any sign of weakness by the United States would embolden Iran to develop nuclear weapons and ratchet up prospects of a bigger war in the Middle East against Islamic fundamentalism.

"When you see people die in combat, you just can't hardly stand it," Burton said. "War is hell. But sometimes it's necessary."

Lawmakers for and against the resolution say the debate could serve as a turning point in Congress' support for the war. But the opening hours of debate were marked by a lack of urgency.

The House chamber was largely empty as Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., delivered the opening remarks. She left the chamber in the middle of comments from Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Dozens of Republicans are contemplating joining the near-unanimous Democrats in the final vote for the resolution.

One will be Rep. Steven LaTourette, R-Ohio, who made up his mind weeks ago. "I don't happen to believe escalation is the way to go," he said in an interview Tuesday. "It should be a matter of redeployment."

Although the White House dispatched national security adviser Stephen Hadley to advise any lawmakers who wanted to listen, LaTourette said neither Republican congressional leaders nor the White House was twisting arms.

"The attitude is, it's a vote of conscience," LaTourette said.

Pelosi and Boehner each offered unlikely analogies in their floor speeches.

Pelosi tipped her hat to mid-20th-century Sen. Robert A. Taft, a Republican from Ohio whose isolationism and opposition to World War II helped dash his chance to be president. But she recalled approvingly his line shortly after Pearl Harbor: "Criticism in a time of war is essential to the maintenance of a democratic government."

Boehner suggested that Congress' splits over how to counter Islamic terrorism are as divisive as the rift over slavery during the Civil War era. Invoking President Lincoln's line, he said, "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Bush Stays Out Of Fight, Opts For Lighter Fare (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

While the House of Representatives debated weighty matters of war and peace yesterday, President Bush headed to the YMCA.

In a brightly lighted basement gym, he visited children bending paperclips into different shapes and urged Americans to volunteer as mentors. He talked not of armies in Iraq but of "armies of compassion" at home. Even the kids seemed confused. One asked why he came. "I came to see you," the president responded. As the cameras clicked away, a 7-year-old boy made peace signs. "Put your hands down," Bush chided playfully.

That was the most extensive case made yesterday by the commander in chief against the growing antiwar sentiment gripping Congress and the nation. As lawmakers joust over the wisdom of his decision to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq, Bush is publicly ignoring the clash -- a display that is part strategy and part concession to reality.

By not engaging in the debate, Bush sends the signal that it does not matter to him what Congress says in a nonbinding resolution, hoping to minimize the impact of what the White House considers the inevitable outcome. And according to strategists in both parties, he has limited influence on Capitol Hill at this point, even among fellow Republicans.

Bush has opted to focus on policies and issues that may seem small by comparison. In recent weeks, he has participated in events focused on childhood obesity and national parks. He hosted photo opportunities with last year's Stanley Cup and

NASCAR champions. And this week, he is meeting with three foreign heads of state -- the presidents of Lithuania, Liberia and Panama -- representing a combined population smaller than that of Michigan.

"I don't think he's going to be able to change the subject," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who supports the troop increase as a last chance to turn around the situation in Iraq. "The subject of politics right now is Iraq. Every single person out there running for president, Republican or Democrat, is going to be talking about it. The White House needs to be talking about it every day, too."

Bush has scheduled one speech this week on the war on terror. It is set for Thursday at the American Enterprise Institute, and he will address Iraq at that time. But he made clear in an interview with C-SPAN this week that he does not see a need to talk about Iraq every day. And given that a resolution seems likely to pass, the White House has concluded that maybe it is good for lawmakers to vent frustration in a political but intangible way.

White House press secretary Tony Snow shrugged his shoulders when asked at his daily briefing if the president's team is working to stop the House resolution. "No," Snow said. "I mean, we've made our views known in terms of what people have to keep in mind. But members of the House and members of the Senate have the freedom to go ahead and write their resolutions and do what they want with them. The one thing we do expect is we do expect those who say they're going to support the troops to support the troops."

That suggests the White House is holding back for what could be the more significant battle if Democrats try to limit funding for the troop increase or require forces to be withdrawn by next year, as proposed by Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), a Democratic presidential candidate. "They seem to be saving their energy for that," said Robert Walker, a Republican lobbyist and former congressman. Allowing the current debate to become "a real confrontation between the House of Representatives and the White House on something that has no real impact, that serves the Democrats' purposes, not his," he said.

A USA Today-Gallup Poll released yesterday found that Americans are eager for stronger action than the House is now contemplating. Although 51 percent support a nonbinding resolution condemning the troop increase, 57 percent want a cap on troop levels and 63 percent favor a timetable to withdraw all U.S. forces by the end of the year. At the same time, cutting funding is more controversial, with 58 percent against denying money for the additional forces Bush wants.

"He's in real trouble in many ways," said Tom Andrews, a former Democratic congressman from Maine who now serves as national director of a coalition called Win Without War. Andrews suggested that the president is trying to ignore the current debate "because perhaps if too much attention is paid to it, it will be another step toward the end of his policy."

Bush's newfound zeal for small-bore initiatives is reminiscent of President Clinton's tactical switch after his party's midterm congressional election defeat in 1994. Clinton tacked against an opposition Congress by turning to micro-policies that polled well with the public, such as school uniforms and mobile phones for neighborhood-watch programs.

Gene Sperling, a top adviser to Clinton, said those policies had meaning. "If you can show that you are waking up every day focused on getting things done, even modest measures that people really care about outside the Beltway, it can be a positive sign," he said. "If it just looks like you're trying to change the subject and do symbolic things, it doesn't work."

Bush tested that thesis by navigating his motorcade across a snowy city to the YMCA Anthony Bowen Center. Protesters outside held up signs with messages such as "Bush Lied" and "Peace Surge."

"The reason I'm here is that we're heralding volunteerism in America," Bush said. "No better place to come where volunteers are doing their work."

He observed four activity stations where youngsters were being guided by adult mentors, including one station where they disemboweled a computer. As Bush chatted with some children, other youngsters were overheard by a pool reporter.

"He's my favorite president," one said.

"My favorite president is President Obama," another replied.

"Who's that?"

"He's the first black president."

For The GOP, Taking The War Out Of The War Debate (WP)

By Dana Milbank

DOJ_NMG_0131838

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Rep. Adam Putnam of Florida, the man in charge of Republican strategy in this week's great debate on Iraq, was a study in nervous energy as he waited to speak on the House floor yesterday.

He paced behind the back row. He cracked his neck to the left and right. He wrung his hands. He buttoned, unbuttoned and rebuttoned his suit jacket. He cracked his neck some more, checked his BlackBerry, rocked on his heels, coughed, stroked his chin, folded and unfolded his arms, coughed, scratched behind his ear, swallowed heavily, and coughed again.

There was good reason for this anxiety. As head of the House Republican Conference, the 32-year-old redhead is leading his caucus into a public-opinion meat grinder: supporting President Bush's increase of U.S. troops in Iraq, against the wishes of more than 60 percent of Americans. Worse, he is leading them with a pair of somewhat contradictory arguments: (a) that the Democrats' resolution opposing Bush's Iraq buildup is a meaningless gesture, and (b) that the Democrats' resolution will cause the end of civilization as we know it.

"This is a rather toothless 97 words," Putnam began in his floor speech, calling the proposal "a narrow nonbinding resolution that misses the bigger picture." Minutes later, he changed his view. "The majority would have us consider a resolution that puts us one day closer to handing militant Islamists a safe haven the size of California."

So which one is it: toothless or catastrophic?

Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) wasn't sure. In his floor speech, he called the resolution "nonbinding" six times, labeling the resolution "a political charade lacking both the seriousness and the gravity of the issue that it's meant to represent." And yet, he also thought the resolution "is the first step toward abandoning Iraq by cutting off funding for our troops that are in harm's way."

Neither had Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) found harmony between the competing talking points. "This resolution just says enough not to say anything at all," he judged. In another breath, however, he called it a "first step to cutting off funding for the dangerous mission our troops face" and a debate that "bolsters those radical terrorists whose sole goal is to destroy America."

The Republican complaints brought to mind the Woody Allen joke about two old ladies at a Catskills resort. "One of 'em says, 'Boy, the food at this place is really terrible.' The other one says, 'Yeah, I know, and such small portions.' "

Republicans knew they had a weak hand to play as the House began its three-day debate on Iraq and whether to support Bush's 20,000-troop "surge." "The debate should not be about the surge or its details," Republican Reps. Peter Hoekstra (Mich.) and John Shadegg (Ariz.) wrote to colleagues in a letter intercepted by Democrats. "This debate should not even be about the Iraq war to date, mistakes that have been made, or whether we can, or cannot, win militarily. If we let Democrats force us into a debate on the surge or the current situation in Iraq, we lose."

To help Republicans with the task of conducting an Iraq debate without talking about Iraq, Putnam set up a "war room" in the Longworth office building to provide research and debate material, parliamentary experts, and a "rapid response system."

But when two reporters arrived at the war room yesterday afternoon, the occupants were deep in a bunker. "I apologize," the receptionist announced after checking with the war room. "They just started a meeting."

Ah, a "meeting." The reporters found a back door to the war room that was open. Inside, four men sat quietly at their desks, watching the debate on TV.

The bunker mentality went beyond the war room. While Republicans from competitive districts watched on television, their colleagues from safe seats did battle with Democrats on the House floor. Of the first 16 Republican speakers, only three won reelection in 2006 with less than 60 percent of the vote, and none won with less than 56 percent.

Those who did brave the hostile climate to come to the House floor preferred to talk of wars other than the one underway in Iraq.

Blunt (67 percent of the vote in November) chose Vietnam. "President Johnson was criticized a generation ago, and still today, for choosing bombing sites in Vietnam," he argued. "But his actions made infinitely more sense than this."

Boehner (64 percent) opted for the Civil War. "Surrounded by personal and political rivals, Lincoln could have given up," the minority leader said. "He could have recalled the Union forces and sent them home. But he didn't."

Like many speakers, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida (62 percent) saw echoes of the Second World War. "The threat of Hitler did not appear suddenly out of a vacuum," she said, in front of a poster of a pilot in uniform.

DOJ_NMG_0131839

Putnam (69 percent) opted for the war in the Pacific. "It's easy enough to go back and list all the disappointments we've had in Iraq," he said. "But it's like focusing on one jungle, on one atoll on the march to Tokyo over 60 years ago."

A dazzling debate it wasn't. At the start, there were 75 members of Congress on the floor. By the time Putnam spoke about half an hour later, the number was down to 36; before long, the chamber returned to its usual, depopulated state.

But Putnam, host of the war room, had only begun to fight. He called a news conference in the Capitol basement with Boehner and distributed orange juice made with fruit his family had grown in Florida. Sipping the juice, he repeated his dueling points: (a) "This is just the first step to defunding troops in harm's way," and (b) "This week's resolution is really just a stunt."

The Post's Jonathan Weisman asked for a clarification. "Is this resolution a meaningless stunt or is it very consequential?"

Boehner struggled through an answer about "two levels and two different points." Putnam frowned but said nothing.

Voices From The House Floor (WP)

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.)

"In order to succeed in Iraq, there must be diplomatic and political initiatives. There has been no sustained and effective effort to engage Iraq's neighbors diplomatically, and there has been no sustained and effective effort to engage Iraqi factions politically. . . . President Bush's escalation proposal will not make America safer, will not make our military stronger and will not make the region more stable. And it will not have my support."Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio)

"War is never easy and almost never goes according to plan. Al-Qaeda and their supporters in the region have been steadfast. . . . But because they cannot defeat Americans on the battlefield, al-Qaeda and terrorist sympathizers around the world are trying to divide us here at home. Over the next few days we have an opportunity to show our enemies that we will not take the bait."Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee

"We are here to say [the Iraq policy is] not a good idea. The series of irretrievable mistakes is a serious list: the skewed intelligence; . . . the postwar phase of conflict that did not have sufficient planning; . . . allowing the uncontrolled looting and the breakdown of law early on after the occupation began; the dismissal of the Iraqi army; . . . the de-Baathification that put so many thousands of people . . . out of work. . . . The administration has consistently refused to adjust its overall strategy."Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), ranking GOP member of Armed Services

"This resolution by the Democrat leadership sends a message to three parties: America's enemies, America's friends and America's troops. And I think it's going to be received by friend and foe alike as the first sound of retreat in the world battle against extremists and terrorists. . . . It's the wrong message, because this nation has been for the last 60 years involved in spreading freedom."Rep. Patrick J. Murphy (D-Pa.), Iraq veteran

I rise to give a voice to the . . . veterans across the globe who are deeply troubled by the president's plan to escalate the number of American troops in Iraq. I served in Baghdad from June of 2003 to January of 2004. I saw firsthand this administration's failed policies in Iraq. . . . The time for more troops was four years ago, but this president ignored the military experts. . . . Now . . . our president is ignoring military leaders again. . . . The president's plan to send more of our best and bravest to die refereeing a civil war in Iraq is wrong."Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.)

"Do any of us really believe that the resolution in front of us today is a serious piece of legislation? Does it properly recognize all of America's military and other national security professionals who defend us day and night? . . . This resolution is all about staying the course. It says, support our troops and don't engage in new tactic. Just keep going down the same path. That's not good enough. There are people who hate us enough to want to kill."

Give New Strategy A Chance (WT)

By Mike Pence

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

Last month, President Bush delivered a speech to the nation outlining a new way forward in Iraq. It has since met with resistance from both parties on Capitol Hill. I support the president's call for reinforcements and a change of our strategy because we must do everything in our power to see freedom prevail in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0131840

A few days before the president addressed the nation, I was invited to the White House to discuss his plan to increase troop levels in Iraq. What I found most persuasive was that the president didn't just lay out a plan for more troops for more troops sake. He laid out a new strategy, including new tactics, new rules of engagement on the ground, and a plan to work alongside Iraqi military forces to give priority to securing Baghdad. This was first recommended by the Iraq Study Group and I believe we owe it to our military and Iraq's people to give it a chance to work.

This is not to say I never had my doubts about the president's new strategy. I went into the meeting very skeptical of the "surge." During my four trips to Iraq, our military commanders told me a large American military footprint in Iraq would be counterproductive to our interests there and to the interests of freedom.

At that time, there was a general consensus among our military leaders that we ought to move toward a smaller American military presence, to ensure the Iraqi military would step up and the Iraqi government would take responsibility for the country. But that was then, this is now.

That advice predated the extraordinary increase in violence that began in late summer 2006. Then it became clear our strategy and tactics were not working. That is why I believe the president's change in strategy along with the addition of six brigades to support an Iraqi-led effort to quell violence in Baghdad is an idea whose time has come.

Given that reinforcements will strengthen the hand of the U.S. military in Iraq and give us more leverage in the region, I find it curious that many in Congress in both parties are taking a wait-and-see approach or openly oppose the president's plan.

Ironically, most of my colleagues who oppose the president's plan say they still support the troops and want to see us succeed in Iraq. However, the alternative strategies they have put forward will do nothing but promote withdrawal and defeat. It is hard to understand how legislators can claim to support our troops while advocating abandonment of all they fought and died to accomplish.

History leaves little doubt that fundamental disagreements between the president and Congress over strategic decisions are not new. Many members of the legislative branch disagreed with wartime decisions of Abraham Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt. In fact, in a bit of irony, some Republicans complained Roosevelt was focusing too much on Europe rather than the enemy in the Pacific who attacked us.

However, the roles of Congress and the president are clearly defined in the Constitution. Under Article I of the Constitution, Congress has the authority to declare war, prescribe rules governing military discipline and regulate the capture of enemy property and appropriate funds for the military.

Under Article II of the Constitution, the president is the commander in chief of the Armed Forces and is responsible for tactical, operational and strategic decisions involved in war fighting. The Supreme Court has reaffirmed these functions and the president has had this role ever since George Washington was entrusted as our nation's first commander in chief. Our Founders expressly rejected vesting Congress with warmaking power, fearful as they were of ineffective "war-by-committee."

Each branch of national government has a clearly defined role in the declaration and conduct of war. As such, while Congress has a role in formulating military policy, it is constitutionally questionable for Congress to impose timetables, benchmarks or tactical decisions on our commander in chief or our troops in the field.

There is no question that even in the heartland of America, people are troubled with our lack of progress in Iraq. I understand the temptation of many in Congress to go backward but I disagree with it. The temptation to retreat must be ignored. Winston Churchill gave us this counsel: "One ought never to turn one's back on a threat in danger and try to run away from it. If you do that, you will double the danger. But if you meet it promptly and without flinching, you will reduce the danger by half."

It is time for an unflinching American response. I support our commander in chief. I support our new way forward. We must come together as a nation and choose to see freedom prevail in Iraq.

Democratic Lawmakers Denounce Troop Surge With A Passionate Letter To Capitol Hill (WP)

By Maryland Notebook

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131841

As Congress debates President Bush's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq, Democrats in the Maryland legislature are weighing in with a resounding no.

A one-page letter signed by 83 lawmakers and sent yesterday to the delegation on Capitol Hill starts: "The people of Maryland have not been shielded from the horrors taking place in Iraq."

"When will it end?" the passionate letter continues, urging the delegation of eight Democrats and two Republicans to oppose the president's proposed surge of 20,000 troops. "It is a scandal to spend hundreds of billions of dollars on prolonging a reckless and futile war."

State legislatures don't traditionally dip their toes into matters of foreign policy. But on the Iraq war, the General Assembly has a lot of company: Twelve other states, including California, Illinois, New Jersey and New Mexico, have gone even further this year, approving formal resolutions of opposition.

"People have said, 'Should the state legislatures be weighing in on this?' " said freshman Sen. Jamie Raskin (D-Montgomery), who wrote the letter with Sen. Paul G. Pinsky (D-Prince George's). "The answer is yes." At a news conference yesterday, a dozen other Democrats expressed their distaste for a troop buildup, saying that their constituents have spoken.

Pinsky said he approached several Republicans to sign the letter but was rebuffed. He opted for a letter instead of a resolution so that it would arrive in time for this week's congressional debate. When the country went to war four years ago, he was one of 11 Democrats to sign a letter opposing the invasion, prompting an emotional debate on the Senate floor. "It got pretty ugly," Pinsky recalled.

Clean Cars Bill Moves Forward

Legislation to require the automobile industry to sell cars that create less pollution cleared a House of Delegates committee yesterday.

The Clean Cars bill, sponsored by Del. Elizabeth Bobo (D-Howard), would slash the carbon dioxide emissions that contribute to greenhouse gases, requiring new cars to be more fuel-efficient. The measure, backed by top General Assembly leaders and Gov. Martin O'Malley (D), could be the signature environmental policy the legislature passes this year.

The mostly party-line vote in the House Environmental Matters Committee was 17 to 4, with Democrats in favor.

Automakers lobbied hard to strip key provisions but were unsuccessful. The industry says the changes would force higher prices on car buyers and make it difficult to buy large vehicles, which are less fuel-efficient than smaller cars. The bill could reach the House floor this week.

Health-Care Measure Squelched

Sen. Thomas M. Middleton (D-Charles) says he's making health care a priority this year. The Finance Committee chairman said late Monday that he planned to file a bill to expand coverage to some of the 780,000 uninsured in Maryland using revenue from a $1-a-pack cigarette tax increase.

"I'm 100 percent engaged in expanding medical coverage," he said. The bill would mirror a measure sponsored by Del. Peter A. Hammen (D-Baltimore) and backed by House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel). Middleton said he was submitting the bill on behalf of the Greater Baltimore Committee, a regional business association.

But by yesterday, the bill was nowhere to be found, even after Middleton's office released a lengthy fax with the details. It seems Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) put the kibosh on it. Miller is cool to a tobacco tax unless it is used to help close the state's looming budget deficit. And Middleton is one of a handful of senators vying for Miller's job when he retires in three years.

"He knows what we can afford to do and what we can't," Miller said. "I did indicate that it was kind of inconsistent with where we need to be next year."

Concerns Over Early Voting

Republicans stalled two bills yesterday that would establish early voting in Maryland, raising questions about how the measures would work.

DOJ_NMG_0131842

The bills, which are on the legislative fast track and are being sponsored by Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) and House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), would allow voters to decide whether to amend the state Constitution to allow ballots to be cast in the week before the election. If the bills are approved, voters would decide whether to change the Constitution in 2008.

The General Assembly approved legislation to allow early voting, but the law was deemed unconstitutional by the state's highest court.

On the Senate floor, Minority Whip Allan H. Kittleman (Howard) asked whether the early voting law that was approved by the General Assembly earlier would automatically go into effect, and Minority Leader David R. Brinkley (Frederick) asked where voters would be able to cast their ballots.

Sen. Roy P. Dyson (D-St. Mary's) said new legislation would have to be enacted.

House Minority Leader Anthony J. O'Donnell (Calvert) said Republicans want to ensure that some "partisan" provisions of last year's bill are stripped out, particularly locations of specific polling places for early voting.

"They gave partisan advantage to Democrats," O'Donnell said. In his district, for example, Waldorf, a Democratic-leaning area, was on the list instead of La Plata, the county seat. The House is expected to take up the bill again today.

Sen. Dolores G. Kelley (D-Baltimore County) said those details could be worked out "down the road."

Calif. Senate OKs Resolution Against Iraq (LAT)

By Robert Salladay

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Amid accusations that it would give comfort to America's enemies, the California Senate approved a resolution Tuesday calling for a halt to boosting the number of troops in Iraq or spending any more taxpayer dollars on the war without explicit approval from Congress.

The resolution was introduced by state Sen. Carole Midgen (D-San Francisco). She said she would amend the resolution, approved 22 to 14, before it reached the state Assembly to include a stronger message of support for the troops. Democrats nevertheless said the Iraq war had been a failure and no longer appeared to be a "just cause."

Republicans stood to oppose the resolution, which expresses the opinion of the Legislature but is legally meaningless.

One said the Democratic Party should be ashamed of supporting terrorists, who could soon be attacking California cities.

"This resolution emboldens our enemies," said Sen. Dennis Hollingsworth (R-Murrieta). "This resolution simply tells Al Qaeda and other state sponsors of terrorism, 'We've got the Americans on the run. First, we had the election in November and now ... all we have to do is hold out a while longer. They are crumbling in Washington and they are crumbling in state legislatures all over the country.' "

"I am 56 years old and in all my years I have yet to experience a situation like this, where a legislative body has taken it upon itself to pass resolutions to support and enhance the morale of our enemies," said Sen. Dave Cogdill (R-Modesto).

Sen. Sheila Kuehl, a Santa Monica Democrat, responded: "Balderdash. If anything is supporting and emboldening our enemies, it is this war…. This war was a mistake, and the rest of the world knows it."

Iraq Unveils Baghdad Security Moves (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi,

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

Some border crossings will be closed for 72 hours, and residents will lose more freedoms. The killings continue.

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government on Tuesday launched a plan to secure a capital descending deeper into chaos, even as violence claimed the lives of more Iraqis, including people waiting in line for food handouts.

Lt. Gen. Abud Qanbar, the former naval officer appointed by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to oversee the much-vaunted Baghdad security plan, announced a 72-hour closure of some border crossings along the Iranian and Syrian frontiers, restrictions on civil liberties, and the suspension of all weapons licenses except for those issued to authorized security officials and contractors.

"Legal procedures will be taken and strict penalties will be imposed against all those who violate the rules," Qanbar said, reading from a lengthy statement broadcast over state television.

It was unclear how some of the security provisions differed from measures already in place. Observers questioned why Maliki left the announcement to a surrogate. The prime minister spent much of the day visiting a university in the city of Hillah, about 60 miles south of the capital.

The plan includes a tightening of the few remaining liberties left for Iraqis in the jittery capital, including an earlier nighttime curfew and closer scrutiny of packages, mail and electronic communications. It imposes unspecified restrictions on gatherings in public places, clubs, companies and organizations "in order to protect citizens and those working in these places."

The plan's supporters defended the restrictive elements as necessary.

"The government has a right to take any procedure to provide security for the people," said Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a Shiite Muslim lawmaker loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr. "People are demanding security first and last."

Under the plan, Qanbar said, his commanders will be authorized to interrogate and arrest all individuals, inspect private property and seize any weapons, presumably without seeking the approval of courts or political leaders. It wasn't clear whether the new provisions changed the existing rules, which allow each Iraqi family to keep one weapon at home.

The plan calls for restrictions on the movements of vehicles and individuals as well as for surprise sweeps of roadways, Qanbar said. It includes tougher laws for those who commit violence or harbor alleged terrorists and special court sessions to speed up trials.

The plan also addresses the explosive issue of displaced Iraqis, demanding that squatters in the homes of families who fled their neighborhoods out of fear of sectarian violence vacate the properties within 15 days.

The announcement did not detail how the edict would be enforced, but it called for the establishment of "specialized committees" to audit property deeds. Officials also acknowledged that many of the people who fled after horrific acts by their neighbors might not want to come back. "This matter will be dealt with later," said Hamid Moalla, a Shiite lawmaker.

The plan also bars vehicles with tinted windows or without license plates from traveling the city's streets. Such vehicles have long been illegal but ubiquitous, often escorting the very political leaders now advocating the security plan.

Some details of the plan raised more questions than they provided answers. For example, few people believe that insurgents and militiamen use the legitimate border crossings closed as of today, because they can ferry weapons and personnel into Iraq at many places along the porous and poorly guarded borders. Maliki supporters acknowledged the logistical challenges but said the effort would be stepped up.

The very act of making such an announcement might have an effect. "One of the methods of this plan is using the psychological war against the terrorist," lawmaker Abdul-Wahab said.

Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi, have apparently decided to lie low during the coming crackdown, which began at 6 p.m. Tuesday. Sunni Muslim insurgents, on the other hand, have stepped up attacks on Shiite civilian targets.

This month, an insurgent group led by a successor to Abu Musab Zarqawi, the slain leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, vowed to sabotage any effort to secure the capital, which Sunni Arab extremists have declared part of a future Islamic state.

"We will extend our battlefields," the group said in a Feb. 2 message posted on a website frequently used by insurgent groups. "Burn the ground under the Jews and their allies. Eliminate their forces and destroy their vehicles. Down their airplanes. Burn their flesh with car bombs. Cut their bodies with [roadside bombs] and take out their hearts with snipers. The best way to defend is to attack."

U.S. and Iraqi officials hope their Baghdad security plan will stem the country's slide deeper into civil war and lawlessness. The U.S. has begun a move to buttress forces in the city, where it will eventually add 16,000 troops. Iraqis have also moved additional forces into the capital.

Still, more than three dozen Iraqis were killed or found dead in the capital Tuesday. At least 18 were killed and 38 were injured in a suicide bombing in a mostly Shiite neighborhood where people were waiting in line for monthly rations of flour, sugar and cooking oil. A car bomb in east Baghdad killed four boys near a high school. Four civilians were injured in the attack.

Iraqi police found the bodies of at least 20 people shot dead and dumped in west Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0131844

The offices of a weekly newspaper in the northern city of Kirkuk burned down under mysterious circumstances. At least one employee was killed.

Gunmen in the southern city of Samawa killed an alleged former member of Saddam Hussein's security forces. Authorities in Hillah found the body of a man tied to a palm tree trunk.

The U.S. military announced that a soldier was killed Sunday in Al Anbar province.

New Baghdad Crackdown Is Announced (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 13 — The Iraqi government on Tuesday ordered tens of thousands of Baghdad residents to leave homes they are occupying illegally, in a surprising and highly challenging effort to reverse the tide of sectarian cleansing that has left the capital bloodied and Balkanized.

In a televised speech, Lt. Gen. Aboud Qanbar, who is leading the new crackdown, also announced the closing of Iraq's borders with Iran and Syria, an extension of the curfew in Baghdad by an hour, and the setup of new checkpoints run by the Defense and Interior Ministries, both of which General Qanbar said he now controlled.

He said the government would break into homes and cars it deemed dangerous, open mail and eavesdrop on phone calls.

General Qanbar did not mention the role American forces would play in the crackdown, but his remarks were clearly timed to coincide with more aggressive efforts by American troops on the streets of Baghdad. The Americans have been establishing outposts — called joint security stations — to work alongside the Iraqi Army and police to end the sectarian bloodletting.

On Tuesday, senior American officers expressed surprise about the plan to resettle people who had moved from their homes amid sectarian cleansing. But they declined to be identified, saying they did not want to contradict the Iraqi general.

General Qanbar indicated that the plan would be carried out evenly across Baghdad. But critics said Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who has come under intense criticism for pursuing a sectarian Shiite agenda, might be trying to appease his detractors and may not actually carry out the plan. Some feared that his government might not apply the same pressure to residents of Shiite areas.

Since the bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra a year ago, the sectarian map of Baghdad has been almost completely redrawn, as Shiites pushed Sunnis from neighborhood after neighborhood.

The general faces a monumental task. Even without the daily violence, continuing sectarian killings and a lack of security forces to perform basic policing tasks, there is no system in place to investigate the veracity of people's claims. In addition, thousands of people took over homes immediately after the invasion, claiming basic squatters' rights.

Under the general's plan, people who have illegally occupied homes will have 15 days to leave. While they are there, he said, they must protect the home, not steal from it or damage it.

"Anyone who does not follow this law will be treated according to the antiterrorism laws," he said, adding that the government would set up committees to determine ownership.

General Qanbar, wearing a camouflage uniform and a red staff commander's beret, made it clear that he reported only to the prime minister. Mr. Maliki appointed him as the overall Iraqi commander for forces in Baghdad in January. With the extraordinary powers he claimed, an increasing amount of authority is now consolidated in the prime minister's office.

At least 10 formerly mixed neighborhoods in Baghdad are now almost entirely Shiite. East Baghdad, vulnerable to attack from Shiites in the Sadr City stronghold, is almost entirely under Shiite control. West Baghdad, where there are still fierce sectarian clashes, is a war zone of divided neighborhoods, where crossing from a Shiite enclave to a Sunni enclave without the right identification, or the other way around, can mean death.

DOJ_NMG_0131845

The Iraqi cabinet proposed a plan last year to create space in West Baghdad for some 3,000 Sunni families who had been displaced, but nothing came of it.

It is impossible to know exactly how many people have been forced from their homes, but estimates by Iraqi and American officials range from tens of thousands to as high as 200,000.

Samantha Power, a public policy professor at the John F. Kennedy School of Government who has written widely on genocide, described the plan as either a public relations ploy that would never be enforced, or worse, a prelude to more sectarian cleansing and catastrophe.

"To do this in the middle of a war when tempers have been inflamed and militarization is ubiquitous seems to be putting the cart before the horse," she said. "You haven't stopped the willingness to ethnically cleanse, but you're imposing the moral hazard of ethnic cleansing on the cleansee? Unless you create security first, you are paving the way for a potential massacre of returnees."

General Qanbar did not explain how the houses would be checked except to say that people in homes that did not belong to them must have currently dated letters from the owners.

Apart from the resettlement issue, he promised swift justice for law breakers.

"All the people who have done terrorist operations or major crimes like killing, stealing, rape, kidnapping, bombing public or private buildings and who have bought, sold or made weapons or bullets, we will hand them over to the Major Crimes Court, which will hold emergency trials," he said.

The general also said all convoys — even those from the government — would be subject to search at the checkpoints. Government security forces have been infiltrated by criminals, militants and Shiite militias.

If they refuse to stop, he said, "They will be treated as illegals."

Only hours before he spoke, there was more carnage on the streets of Baghdad.

In one attack, a suicide bomber killed 17 people and wounded 40 more at a Trade Ministry food warehouse in a poor Shiite neighborhood. At the site of the blast, there was little faith in the promises of politicians.

"I think the situation will get worse, and we can tell in advance that the security plan is a failure," said Muhammad Saadi, 28, a worker at the warehouse. "The government can do nothing to stop the suicide bombers."

Around him, the white foam of a fire extinguisher mingled with pools of blood, as moaning voices filled the air.

In recent days, new checkpoints have appeared around the city with tanks and heavy weapons meant to demonstrate a powerful show of force.

But residents expressed skepticism that checkpoints could provide any real security.

"These checkpoints are useless," said Ahmed Aboud, 45. "You can bribe them with 5,000 Iraqi dinars and bring in all the explosives you want."

New Tape from Qaeda Figure

CAIRO, Feb. 13 (AP) — Al Qaeda's second in command, Ayman al-Zawahri, said President Bush was an alcoholic and a lying gambler who wagered on Iraq and lost, according to a new audiotape released Tuesday.

Mr. Zawahri said in the tape that Mr. Bush has been forced to admit his failure in Iraq after he repeated the "lie, which he became addicted to, that he is winning" in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Bush suffers from an addictive personality and was an alcoholic," he said.

"I don't know his present condition," Mr. Zawahri added, "but the one who examines his personality finds that he is addicted to two other faults — lying and gambling."

Mr. Bush, who is 60, has acknowledged that he had a problem with drinking but has said he gave up alcohol when he was 40.

The 41-minute audiotape could not immediately be authenticated; The Associated Press found it on a Web site commonly used by insurgent groups, and it carried the logo of the multimedia arm of Al Qaeda.

Iraq To Seal Borders With Syria And Iran (WT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

DOJ_NMG_0131846

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The Iraqi commander of the Baghdad security crackdown announced yesterday that Iraq will close its borders with Syria and Iran for 72 hours as part of the drive to end the violence that has threatened to divide the capital along sectarian lines.

Ahead of the crackdown, anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr fled Iraq for Iran some weeks ago and is thought to be in Tehran, where he has family, a senior U.S. official said yesterday.

Addressing the nation on behalf of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar also said that Baghdad's nighttime curfew would be expanded by an hour and that permits allowing civilians to carry weapons in public would be suspended during the operation, which he suggested could last weeks.

Gen. Gambar made the announcement hours after a suicide truck bomber struck a government warehouse in a mainly Shi'ite Muslim neighborhood of the capital, killing at least 15 persons and wounding 27, police and hospital officials said. A parked car bomb exploded near a bakery in another Shi'ite area, killing four persons and wounding four, police said.

The U.S. military announced that an American soldier died in combat Sunday in the volatile Anbar province, west of Baghdad, raising to 42 the number of U.S. personnel killed this month.

The general did not say when the borders would close, but another official said it was expected within two days. The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to journalists, added that the borders would reopen only partly after the 72-hour closing.

The United States has long charged that Iran and Syria let extremists use their territory to slip into Iraq to attack U.S. and Iraqi forces as well as civilians.

Iraqi authorities have routinely echoed the U.S. charges against Syria, but they rarely make that accusation against Iran, with which Iraq's Shi'ite-led government has close relations.

Gen. Gambar said Baghdad's nighttime curfew would be extended by one hour when the security drive kicks off fully, running from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.

The U.S. military announced last week that the clampdown had begun, although Iraqis have seen little evidence of that. President Bush has committed 21,500 more Americans to the operation, which is expected to involve 90,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops.

Gen. Gambar said he would report to Mr. al-Maliki weekly to discuss progress in the operation.

His address suggested that Iraqi authorities plan to exercise wide powers while waging the crackdown. A criminal court, for example, will hold emergency hearings on cases involving killing, theft, rape, kidnapping, damage to public property, and possession and transfer of arms and ammunition, he said.

Gen. Gambar, a Shi'ite and a veteran of the 1991 Persian Gulf War under Saddam Hussein, said security forces also plan to monitor mail, parcels, telegrams and wireless communication devices during the operation.

He said security forces would try to avoid intruding in places of worship but added that they would do so in "cases of extreme emergencies when it is feared that these places pose a threat to the lives of citizens or if they are used for unlawful purposes." U.S. and Iraqi authorities have said that Sunni Arab insurgents use mosques to store arms or fire at troops.

Iraq Plans To Suspend Checkpoints At Syria, Iran Borders (WP)

By Ernesto Londo?o

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 13 -- Iraqi officials on Tuesday announced the temporary closure of checkpoints at the Syrian and Iranian borders, as well as an expanded nighttime curfew in the capital, as part of the new Baghdad security plan.

In a televised address, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, who is in charge of the security plan, said the border will be closed for 72 hours, but he did not specify when. There are two main crossing points connecting Iraq and Syria, and four checkpoints along the border with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0131847

Iraqi officials have said many weapons and insurgents waging attacks in Iraq enter the country through Iran and Syria. U.S. officials said Sunday that they have linked to Iran deadly armor-piercing explosives used against American forces. Iraq's borders with Saudi Arabia and Turkey will remain unaffected.

The curfew, which currently bars transit in Baghdad from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m., will begin an hour earlier, the general said.

Many Iraqis have criticized the government for not taking drastic steps sooner to tighten security in the capital, which has been battered in recent weeks by large-scale bombings and other violence.

Some have questioned whether the armed forces charged with carrying out the plan are properly trained, equipped and committed to make a dent in the violence.

As part of the plan, Iraqi and U.S. soldiers will patrol 10 areas of the city from posts that are designed to function much like police stations, giving officials time to get to know the area and gain the trust of citizens.

Gambar also announced a crackdown on weapons in Baghdad, where many people drive around with rifle barrels sticking out of vehicle windows. U.S. military personnel, the Iraqi armed forces and police, and licensed members of certain private security companies will still be allowed to carry weapons.

The general announced wide powers for authorities to detain and interrogate suspects as well as search property -- powers that Iraqi and U.S. forces have long exercised.

The general also said official convoys, which have largely avoided searches at checkpoints, will now be stopped and searched routinely.

More lawbreakers will be charged, the general announced, as Iraq's criminal court expands its caseload capability. Currently, Iraqi and U.S. officials are holding tens of thousands of people who have not been charged.

"The Iraqi Central Criminal Court will hold exceptional sessions to deal with this situation," the general said.

The general also said the government intends to crack down on squatters, many of whom have occupied homes abandoned by people who left neighborhoods for fear of being killed by groups who target members of a rival sect.

Also Tuesday, a senior U.S. official in Washington who spoke on condition of anonymity said that anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr had fled the country some weeks ago for neighboring Iran, according to the Associated Press.

The official said that the Shiite cleric's departure, which was reported by several television networks, is not believed to be permanent. Sadr left his Baghdad stronghold possibly because of fractures in his political and militia operations, AP cited the official as saying. Sadr heads the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia.

Aides to Sadr in Iraq would not confirm the report, which was not possible to independently verify.

Meanwhile, a car bomb exploded near warehouses that belong to Iraq's Interior Ministry in western Baghdad, killing at least 18 people, according to a ministry spokesman.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military disclosed the death of an American soldier Sunday in Anbar province in western Iraq.

Special correspondent Waleed Saffar contributed to this report.

Iraqi Troop Levels Pass Key Test (WT)

By Pamela Hess

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi troops have passed a key test by showing up at 70 percent strength or better for President Bush's "surge" in Baghdad, a senior U.S. general said.

"This movement of these three brigades and two separate battalions into Baghdad to our way of looking at it has gone very well," Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, said in an interview.

"We've also learned more lessons from this one, and in future deployments, we'll make it even better," added Gen. Dempsey, the top American in charge of building up Iraq's security forces.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates told a Senate committee in January that the arrival of those Iraqi brigades by mid-February would be a litmus test of whether the Iraqi government was serious about securing its capital city.

DOJ_NMG_0131848

Gen. Dempsey said three brigades had shown up with between 70 percent and 75 percent of their soldiers. While a Kurdish unit from Sulaimaniyah and Kirkuk arrived with only 56 percent of its expected troops, he said, other inbound units from the Kurdish north were expected to arrive with 70 percent of their troops or more.

A battalion has 759 soldiers at full strength. A brigade is three battalions plus 200 soldiers, about 2,500.

Though those percentages would be dismal by American standards for a deploying unit, a different calculus applies in Iraq. At any given time, one-quarter of an Iraqi unit is on leave, taking their pay home to their families because there is no functioning banking system. An additional 10 percent of the units remain behind to guard their garrison buildings.

"So when you do all the math, we are a little concerned and remain so about one of those brigades," Gen. Dempsey said, referring to the Sulaimaniyah unit.

"We know that about 17 percent of that unit chose not to deploy, and those soldiers will be dismissed from the service, and we'll replenish the ranks," he said.

The Baghdad security plan envisions Iraqi units rotating into the city for three months at a time and then being replaced by another unit. The total deployment is six months, including two months of initial training and then one month to redeploy back to their home stations.

The deployment to Baghdad demonstrates real progress, he said. Last September the Iraqi government promised but failed to provide three battalions. "None of them showed up," he said.

The deployment then was presented as open-ended; a return date was not outlined. There was no monetary incentive like combat pay, and the units did not receive any additional training for the operation.

"You couldn't find a less well-coordinated activity," Gen. Dempsey said. "We learned from it."

Now the soldiers draw an additional $120 on top of their $300 base salary and $100 hazardous-duty pay as soon as they are notified of their deployment. They get two weeks of training in their home station, followed by another two weeks of collective training on a range near Baghdad.

Iraqi Insurgency Hits Home (LAT)

By Said Rifai

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

I'm dialing my family home in west Baghdad.

The phone rings, but no one picks up.

I know that someone is living in our house.

But it's not my family.

Last summer, my mother went to Jordan to escape the violence in Iraq. In September, my father followed. I stayed behind. Although I am educated as an architect, I work as a interpreter for The Times.

I don't live in my childhood home, but with my parents gone, I keep an eye on the modest stucco house that was designed by a pioneer of Iraqi postmodernism, Mehdi Hassani.

In early January, I went on an assignment outside Baghdad. When I got back two weeks later, my mother sent me a text message from Jordan, telling me to check on our house. When I called our neighbor, Abu Adil, he told me armed men had come through the neighborhood telling everyone to leave or be "slaughtered."

"Can you ask the Americans to intervene?" he begged.

I could not. The gunmen took over our house, Abu Adil's and others in the neighborhood. A few days later, Abu Adil's 22-year-old son went to his family's house. He argued with the insurgents. They killed him, dumping his body in the street.

When I told my mother what happened, it took awhile for it to sink in. So much blood has been spilled, and we are becoming numb. I asked her not to tell my father, who is bedridden, ill from diabetes. I feared the news might weaken him. I talked to my sister, trying to calm her.

I care less for the house than its contents: my mother's crystal, china and silver cutlery, her $5,000 mink coat — worn only twice. And there are objects with more sentimental value: boxes stuffed with family pictures and 8-millimeter footage of my parents' wedding, 50 years of family history. There are my school yearbooks, academic certificates and awards, swimming and basketball trophies — all would-be kindling for a fire to warm the squatters during these cold winter months.

Where I live now, the landlady was visibly shocked when she heard that our home had been "house-jacked."

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

I contemplated my choices. Should I contact U.S. forces through friends who work for them? The neighborhood is controlled by a notorious Sunni Arab politician who may have sanctioned the takeover. I decided contacting the Americans would be too risky. I didn't want to draw unwanted attention to myself: My father is Sunni but my mother is Shiite. Besides, I fear U.S. troops wouldn't do anything.

I quickly dismissed the idea of alerting Iraqi police. A year and a half ago, attackers invaded our home. They used electricity to torture my parents and youngest brother and stole many valuables. The police didn't do anything then, and it's unlikely they would do anything now.

I decided to contact local Sunni politicians and ask for help. I found a number for someone affiliated with their office. A man told me to call back later but was suddenly unreachable, his phone switched off. After a few days, a friend reached our Sunni contact. He said I should check on the house, but provided no more information.

The thought of visiting the house is disconcerting.

For years, I've had a premonition that one day I would go to my house, searching for the AK-47 I kept hidden near the entrance. In the hallway, I would see someone pointing my weapon at me.

I shook off the thought. But premonitions aside, getting to the house is easier said than done.

In the old days, a driver could traverse Baghdad east to west in 20 minutes. Now the roads are perilous, filled with Iraqi security forces and gunmen of unknown loyalties — all potential killers. No taxi driver wants to travel to my old neighborhood, which is now known as a hot spot for trouble.

My cars are in the shop. Friends offer to let me use their cars, but I fear being pulled over by police in a vehicle that doesn't belong to me.

So I'm stuck with the phone, imagining the gunmen lounging on our couches, using our bathrooms and going through our stuff. I see them sitting in the kitchen, where we used to gather with friends and family.

A few days ago, my landlady's father was kidnapped by Shiite militias. While I was working on arrangements for his ransom and eventual release, Abu Adil called to say that U.S. forces had raided my house. They arrested the gunmen and discovered a car bomb in the garage.

The raid was good news, but the problem was now more complex. I worry that U.S. troops will think my family harbored insurgents. After all, we owned the house.

I fear that the Americans will share their information with Iraqi Interior Ministry officials, who have connections to death squads.

I think the house is empty now.

But who knows?

I dialed the house again yesterday.

The phone rang, but no one picked up.

U.S. Says Powerful Iraqi Cleric Is Living In Iran (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — The powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr has left Iraq and has been living in Iran for the past several weeks, senior Bush administration officials said Tuesday.

With fresh American forces arriving in Baghdad as part of the White House plan to stabilize the capital, officials in Washington suggested that Mr. Sadr might have fled Iraq to avoid being captured or killed during the crackdown.

But officials also said that Mr. Sadr, who has family in Iran, had gone to Tehran in the past and that it was unclear why he had chosen to leave Iraq at this time. Mr. Sadr's departure from Iraq was first reported Tuesday night by ABC News.

Neutralizing the power of Mr. Sadr, whose Mahdi Army has sporadically battled American forces for the past four years, has been a particular concern for American officials as they try to rein in powerful Shiite militias in Baghdad.

With the new American offensive in Baghdad still in its early days, American commanders have focused operations in the eastern part of the city, a predominantly Shiite area that has long been the Mahdi Army's power base.

If Mr. Sadr had indeed fled, his absence would create a vacuum that could allow even more radical elements of the Shiite group to take power.

Last year's election of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki as prime minister enhanced Mr. Sadr's political stature inside Iraq. Mr. Maliki was elected with the backing of a political bloc led by Mr. Sadr.

American and Iraqi officials have said that recent intelligence points to signs of fracturing within the Mahdi Army, and that radical splinter groups who are not under Mr. Sadr's control could be carrying out commando-style raids and assassinations.

Officials have suggested that these splinter groups could be receiving orders from officials in Iran, but have not offered direct evidence to back up their claims.

An aide to Mr. Sadr, reached by telephone on Tuesday night, denied that Mr. Sadr had left Iraq and said that the cleric was planning a televised address in the next several says.

Last week, during a raid in Diyala Province, Iraqi forces killed an aide of Mr. Sadr's who American military officials said had been leading "rogue" elements of the Mahdi Army and fomenting violence against Iraqi civilians and police.

Three days later, Iraqi and American troops arrested the second-highest-ranking official in the Health Ministry, who they said was running a Mahdi Army splinter group and funneling millions of dollars to rogue Shiite militants.

The raids were carried out after Mr. Maliki dropped his protection of Mr. Sadr.

American officials said Tuesday that Mr. Sadr may have seen these operations coming and fled the country to avoid his own arrest.

But military officials in Iraq have also been wary of moving directly against Mr. Sadr, fearing that capturing or killing the militant cleric would further stoke the sectarian violence inside Iraq and turn more Shiites against the Maliki government.

In 2004, American forces arrested several of Mr. Sadr's top aides and shut down a newspaper allied with the Mahdi Army, setting off bloody clashes in eastern Baghdad and the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

The news of Mr. Sadr's departure from Iraq came amid an escalating war of words between the Bush administration and top Iranian officials. In recent days, White House and military officials have accused the Iranian government of supplying Shiite militias with the materials to make deadly roadside bombs.

Iranian officials have denied the charges.

Officials: Cleric Al-Sadr Leaves Iraq, Heads To Iran (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr has left his base in Iraq for Iran, two Bush administration officials said Tuesday.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were discussing intelligence activities, cited the new Iraqi security crackdown as a reason for the departure of al-Sadr, who leads one of the largest ethnic militias in Iraq.

Al-Sadr has strong family ties in Iran. It was unknown whether he was on a personal visit or on business there rather than seeking a safe haven, as suggested by the Bush officials.

The leader of the Mahdi Army, al-Sadr has been an outspoken critic of what he calls the American occupation in Iraq and has repeatedly called for withdrawal of U.S. forces.

While and he and his followers have been linked to much of the sectarian violence in Iraq, al-Sadr has in recent months engaged in political negotiations.

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Abboud Gambar, an Iraqi commander, announced Tuesday that Iraq will close its borders with Syria and Iran for 72 hours as part of an effort to reduce sectarian violence.

During a televised address, Gambar also ordered people living illegally in the homes of displaced Baghdad residents to evacuate them within 15 days.

Officials Linked To Al-Sadr Deny He Fled (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra,

AP, February 14, 2007

Officials linked to Muqtada al-Sadr denied Wednesday that the radical Shiite cleric had fled to Iran ahead of a security crackdown in Baghdad.

An Iraqi government official said al-Sadr was in the Shiite holy city of Najaf Tuesday night, when he received delegates from several government departments. The official, who is familiar with one of those meetings, spoke on condition of anonymity because he has no authority to disclose information on his department's activities.

The denials came after a senior U.S. official said Tuesday that al-Sadr left his Baghdad stronghold some weeks ago and is believed to be in Tehran, where he has family.

The official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss U.S. monitoring activities, said fractures in al-Sadr's political and militia operations may be part of the reason for his departure. The move is not believed to be permanent, the official said.

A close aide who meets regularly with al-Sadr said the cleric was not in Tehran, claiming that the reports were part of a deliberate policy by his office to spread disinformation about his whereabouts.

An official in al-Sadr's main office in Najaf also said the cleric had decided not to appear publicly during the current month of Muharam, one of four holy months in the Islamic calendar.

"The leader Muqtada al-Sadr is inside Iraq now," he said.

Both officials also declined to be identified because they weren't authorized to disclose the information.

The black turbaned cleric rarely appears in public or announces his movements and his Mahdi Army militia has mostly been keeping a low profile ahead of the security sweep.

Al-Sadr was reportedly going to make a speech on Monday in Najaf to mark the anniversary of the bombing of an important Shiite shrine north of Baghdad, but he did not do so. The anniversary fell on Monday, according to the Islamic lunar calendar.

While the Mahdi Army has its stronghold in the Shiite district of Sadr City in Baghdad, al-Sadr has his headquarters in Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad.

Questions Arise About Iran Bomb Claims (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, February 14, 2007

The Bush administration struggled Tuesday to explain what it knows about alleged Iranian interference in Iraq after the Pentagon's top general appeared to contradict a recently released military dossier on the subject.

At issue was a weekend briefing in Baghdad at which three senior U.S. military officials said that the "highest levels" of the Iranian government had ordered the smuggling into Iraq of high-tech roadside bombs that have been killing American soldiers.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters in the Indonesian capital, Jakarta, that U.S. forces have arrested Iranians in Iraq and some of the materials used in roadside bombs had been made in Iran.

"That does not translate that the Iranian government per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this," Pace said.

The assertion of Tehran's involvement, made by U.S. officers who spoke on condition of anonymity Sunday in Baghdad, had already drawn skeptical responses from some lawmakers and other critics still wary of an administration that based the invasion of Iraq on faulty intelligence.

Those doubts increased Tuesday after Pace said the link between the bomb materials and the government had not been definitively proven.

Defense experts said Pace's comments — and the way the dossier had been presented to reporters anonymously — cast doubt on how solid the administration case is against Iran. Some suggested the apparent mixed messages were meant to keep Tehran off guard.

DOJ_NMG_0131852

Michael O'Hanlon, an analyst with the Brookings Institution, a liberal-leaning think tank, called Pace's comments "close to a contradiction" of what briefers said Sunday in Baghdad.

"Obviously, they can talk their way around it ... but these guys are not naive about how words are interpreted, and the guys in Baghdad knew what impression they wanted to leave listeners with," O'Hanlon said.

John Hutson, a retired former Navy judge advocate general and dean of the Franklin Pierce Law School, said, "I think we have to take away from it a huge dose of caution."

"If we have disagreement within the military about the role of the Iranians, we have to proceed very cautiously," he added.

Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman said Tuesday he could not explain the apparent contradiction and referred questions to Pace's office and to American forces in Baghdad.

A military official on Pace's staff said the general stands by his comments. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the record.

Asked if Pace had vetted the information that went into Sunday's briefing, the official said that Pace was aware of what was going to be presented in Baghdad but that the comment about involvement at the highest levels of Iranian government was not included in the material Pace was given.

Asked in a CNN interview whether he believed Iranians were shipping weapons to Iraq, the top commander in the Middle East said Tuesday he didn't know. "I have no idea who may be actually with hands-on in this stuff, but I do know that this is not helpful to the situation in Iraq," said Navy Adm. William Fallon.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said that he had phoned Pace on Tuesday and that there was no disagreement.

He said Pace agreed with the basic scenario spelled out by U.S. military officials on Sunday and then backed up by the White House — that weapons are moving into Iraq through the Iran's Revolutionary Guards elite Quds Force.

"The Quds Force is, in fact, an official arm of the Iranian government and, as such, the government bears responsibility and accountability for its actions, as you would expect of any sovereign government," Snow told White House reporters.

"I think a lot of people are trying to whomp up a fight here that doesn't exist," Snow said.

U.S. officials have claimed for years that weapons were entering the country from Iran but had stopped short of alleging involvement by top Iranian leaders.

Sunday's briefing had been some time in the making. The administration moved to put together its information after Tehran demanded the United States present evidence of its allegations. Defense officials in Baghdad had first put together a larger dossier, but it was rejected by Defense Secretary Robert Gates and other administration officials who questioned some of the information in it.

"Questions remain, questions have not been answered," said Christopher Preble, an analyst at the CATO Institute, a libertarian research group, also noting the unidentified sources at Sunday's briefing. "At some level, that just seems not very credible to me."

Disputes Emerge On Iran And Roadside Bombs (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — Bush administration officials, intelligence analysts and some leading Democrats in Congress all agree that a particularly lethal class of roadside bomb is killing American troops at an increasing rate. But fissures have emerged as to whether senior leaders of Iran's government are directly involved in the attacks.

The disagreements have laid bare a fundamental tension in intelligence analysis: how and when to draw firm conclusions from battlefield intelligence about the motivations of foreign leaders.

Based on evidence gathered inside Iraq, American intelligence analysts have concluded that a branch of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps known as the Quds Force is supplying Shiite groups with Iranian-designed weapons, called explosively formed penetrators.

DOJ_NMG_0131853

Because the Quds Force, which operates outside Iran, has historically fallen under the command of Iran's senior religious leaders, intelligence agencies have concluded that top leaders in Tehran are directing the attacks. Adding to that view is the assertion by intelligence officials that Iran has been arming and training Shiite militants for several years.

"Based on our understanding of the Iranian system and the history of I.R.G.C. operations, the intelligence community assesses that activity this extensive on the part of the Quds Force would not be conducted without approval from top leaders in Iran," a senior intelligence official said, referring to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps. Intelligence officials have cast this view as an "assessment," a logical inference based on years of studying the Revolutionary Guard.

But some senior American officials are hesitant to make this deductive leap. Twice during his recent trip through Asia, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, broke with military officials in Baghdad and said he was not ready to conclude that Iran's top leaders were behind the attacks.

During a stopover in Jakarta, Indonesia, General Pace told reporters that American forces had confirmed that some bomb materials found inside Iraq were made in Iran, but "that does not translate that the Iranian government, per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this," he said, The Associated Press reported.

There is a larger lesson about the way intelligence analysis is carried out. Intelligence officials say that while forensic analysis can determine how a weapon is engineered and where its components are manufactured, the hardest task they face is discerning the strategy and intent of a hostile government.

Last month, Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said during an interview that the United States still had far too few intelligence resources inside Iran to draw any conclusions about the intent of senior Iranian leaders.

Still, American intelligence agencies have concluded that over the past year the Iranian government had adopted a new policy of directly confronting the United States inside Iraq. The policy, officials assess, is aimed partly at raising the cost of American involvement in the Middle East, teaching the Bush administration a lesson about the cost of regime change and putting pressure on American forces to leave.

But another reason, they say, is to dissuade the Bush administration from taking a more confrontational policy toward Tehran by sending a message that Iran can ratchet up the attacks on American forces in Iraq.

The assertion that senior Iranian leaders are linked to roadside bombings in Iraq carries echoes of American assessments of Iran's role in the 1996 bombing of a housing complex in Saudi Arabia, an attack that killed 19 American servicemen.

Government investigators said then that they had collected damning evidence linking Iran to the attack, and in 2001 Attorney General John Ashcroft said that Iranian officials "inspired, supported and supervised members of Saudi Hezbollah" in the attack. But in the end, the American prosecutors stopped short of charging any Iranian officials in the attack.

Regarding the current situation in Iraq, a Pentagon official who supports the allegations of Iranian activity in Iraq sought to dispel the notion that the analysis of American intelligence agencies and the views of the nation's top military officer were fundamentally at odds.

The official said intelligence on the extent of Quds Force activity in Iraq suggested that the Iranian operatives had not been freelancing or conducting rogue operations. But while he said that it was reasonable to assume that the Iranian authorities had been aware of the Quds Force operations, he said it was not clear what level of the Iranian government was involved.

A variety of senior intelligence and military officials have discussed the findings in the past few days, but always on condition of anonymity.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, tried to paper over the apparent disagreement on Tuesday. Mr. Snow disclosed that he had called General Pace on the matter and that he and the general were "on the same page" with regard to Iran's role in the roadside bomb attacks in Iraq.

"Do we have a signed piece of paper from Mr. Khamenei or from President Ahmadinejad signing off on this?" Mr. Snow asked, referring to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's president. "No. But are the Quds Forces part of the army — part of the government? The answer is yes."

General Takes Softer Line On Tehran Role In Attacks (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0131854

By Demetri Sevastopulo And John Aglionby

Financial Times, February 14, 2007

The top general in the US military yesterday cast doubt on claims that the Iranian government was sponsoring insurgent attacks on US soldiers in Iraq.

In recent months, the Bush administration has criticised Iran for allegedly supplying militias in Iraq with bomb-making technology used in attacks on US soldiers.

Over the weekend in Baghdad, US military officers presented the US evidence against Iran, which included serial numbers and fragments of so-called "explosively formed projectiles", which are capable of piercing heavily armoured vehicles. The officers asserted that people at the top levels of the Iranian regime were involved in providing the technology, which was responsible for killing more than 170 US soldiers.

But General Peter Pace, the chairman of the joint chiefs, yesterday played down suggestions that Iran had sponsored the attacks. During a visit to Indonesia, Gen Pace said the US had captured some Iranians in operations to find those planting roadside bombs, and that some components of the devices had been made in Iran. But, he said: "That does not translate into that the Iranian government, per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this.

"What it does mean is that things made in Iran are being used in Iraq to kill coalition soldiers and that some Iranians have been captured in the process of our troops going after the networks that built them."

Gen Pace's comments appear at odds with the White House, which on Monday repeated the line that the Iranian government was involved. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said: "There is not a whole lot of freelancing in the Iranian government, especially when it comes to something like that."

While some parts of the Bush administration have been raising the rhetorical pressure on Iran, others appear to be toning down the war of words.

Robert Gates, the defence secretary, said last week in Seville there was "pretty good" evidence that Iran was providing groups in Iraq with bomb-making technology. He also attempted to lower the aggressive tone, stressing that the US had no intention of attacking Iran.

When asked about statements from Iranian supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei that Tehran would hit back against the US if military action were taken, he brushed the remarks aside as "just another day in the Persian Gulf"

Pentagon Denies Politics Behind Claims Iran Supplying Weapons (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 14, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Tuesday that its decision to go public with allegations that Iran is providing militants in Iraq with weapons was not politically motivated or orchestrated by the White House.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the U.S. command's top spokesman, said the decision to air the allegations against Iran on Sunday was made by the U.S. military and stemmed from concerns that Iran has been supplying militias with a deadly type of roadside bomb that could pierce thick armor.

"Our decision to publicly release this information was conceived, coordinated, and ultimately decided here at the (U.S. military headquarters in Baghdad)" Caldwell said in an e-mail message.

On Tuesday, Caldwell repeated charges first aired at a Sunday background briefing at which unnamed military officials said Iran was supplying the armor-piercing roadside bombs and other munitions to radical Shiite militias.

Caldwell said the weapons were provided by the al-Quds Brigade, a branch of Iran's Revolutionary Guards. Iran has denied the allegation. "We chose to release the information in response to a clear and growing threat to our forces here in Iraq," Caldwell said.

The timing of the briefing has drawn criticism from some Democrats, who say the Bush administration is attempting to hype the Iranian threat. The Bush administration was widely criticized after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq for flawed intelligence that alleged Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0131855

"I am deeply troubled by this administration's escalating rhetoric against Iran, especially intelligence from unnamed officials that is not fully documented," Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., said in a statement Tuesday. "It is frighteningly reminiscent of the pattern we saw in the drumbeat that led to the war with Iraq."

White House spokesman Tony Snow denied the administration was using the briefing to bolster arguments for attacking Iran. "I don't know how much clearer we can be: We're not getting ready for war in Iran," he said. "But what we are doing is, we're protecting our own people."

Judith Yaphe, a Middle East expert at the National Defense University, said the Bush administration is raising these charges now to shore up political support for its decision to send an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq. "They need to shift the public debate from the issue of the surge and spread the blame" for the spreading chaos, she said.

Caldwell defended the timing of the briefing. The armor-piercing roadside bombs, called explosively formed penetrators, or EFPs, first surfaced in Iraq in 2004, but he said the problem became acute recently. "In spite of our best efforts militarily and diplomatically, in the last few months we have actually seen a dramatic increase in employment of these devices against our forces," he said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denied Monday that Tehran is providing militias with high-powered weapons. "The U.S. administration and Bush are used to accusing others," he said in an interview with ABC's Good Morning America.

At the briefing Sunday, the U.S. military said the EFPs have killed 170 American and coalition troops in Iraq.

The military produced mortar rounds and other munitions that it said had been produced in Iran as recently as last year.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the evidence is not conclusive about direct Iranian government involvement. "That does not translate that the Iranian government per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this," Pace said. "What it does say is that things made in Iran are being used in Iraq to kill coalition soldiers."

US Aim In Prodding Iran: Negotiation? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON

The US may be trying to achieve a difficult balance regarding Iran: pushing the Iranians hard enough so they will negotiate over their nuclear program, yet not so hard as to increase tensions in a part of the world that's already aflame.

That's the conclusion some experts draw from the recent US attempt to lay out evidence that officials say links Iran to attacks against US troops in Iraq.

For weeks the White House had promised that it would present proof that Tehran is meddling in Iraq by providing arms and training to Shiite militias. Yet when the presentation came, it was somewhat low-key. It took place in Baghdad, not Washington. It focused almost entirely on a type of dangerous roadside bomb that Iran is allegedly supplying to its Iraqi allies.

Washington "is not claiming this is decisive, and they're not blaming the [Iraqi] insurgency on Iran," says George Perkovich, a nuclear nonproliferation scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "This is part of a bigger diplomatic strategy, which is genuinely designed to try to put more pressure on Iran so it will want to negotiate, and will be more forthcoming when it does."

The presentation last weekend involved three US officials who briefed reporters on the condition they not be identified. They said that since June 2004, more than 170 US troops have been killed by a special type of bomb called an "explosively formed projectile."

These weapons are capable of blowing a hole in a heavily armored M-1 Abrams tank, according to the officials. US intelligence believes the bombs are made in Iran and that they are smuggled into Iraq by rogue elements of the Shiite Mahdi Army.

The smuggling routes pass through the Iranian border city of Meran, Amareh, Iraq, and the southern Iraqi region around Basra, according to the officials.

DOJ_NMG_0131856

Officials at the Baghdad briefing claimed these deliveries are sanctioned by the highest levels of the Iranian government. However, on Tuesday the top US uniformed military officer said that he was not sure that Iranian leaders were behind the shipments.

"That does not translate that the Iranian government per se, for sure, is directly involved in doing this," said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in comments to reporters while traveling in Indonesia. "What it does say is that things made in Iran are being used in Iraq to kill coalition soldiers."

Critics of the administration's policies in the region generally were unconvinced by the evidence that Iran is playing a substantial role in the Iraq conflict.

That Iranian weapons are found in Iraq is unsurprising, some said. After all, Iran is next door to a hot war, has longstanding ties with some of the combatants, and fears a collapse of the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as much as does the US.

But establishing the complicity of Iranian leaders such as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad or Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, is another matter.

"Some of it is true," says Vali Nasr, a professor at the Naval Postgraduate School and author of a new book on the Shiite revival, of the US allegations.

Considering the scale of the violence in Iraq, however, Iranian involvement might be considered something of a sideshow, in military terms, says Mr. Nasr.

"Where do the weapons that bring down the US helicopters come from?" he asks. "Not Iran."

Iranian aid surely is not a decisive issue in Iraq, agrees Mr. Perkovich. Even if Iran did not exist, the violence in Iraq would be much the same as it is today.

Nor are the US allegations part of a plan to justify the administration's refusal to enter into talks with Iran over Iraq's future, according to Perkovich. The recent report of the Iraq Study Group suggested that the White House open talks with Iran and Syria as a way to quell the violence.

Not that the Iranians necessarily want to talk to the US about Iraq.

"The Iranians may not want to work with us on Iraq," says Perkovich. "If they negotiate, they will get pushed to make things better, and they know they don't have too much control there."

Instead, the US presentation of evidence perhaps should be seen as part of the larger effort by Washington to manage its relations with Tehran, especially in light of Iran's apparent intention to press ahead with a uranium-enrichment program.

"This is all about pushing back on the Iranians, shining light on them in ways that can engender debate in Tehran," says Perkovich.

Reportedly, the evidence presented over the weekend represented a pared-down version of a military briefing that details allegations of wider Iranian activities inside Iraq's borders.

Mindful of charges that intelligence about Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction was inflated for political reasons prior to the Iraq war, the administration may have decided that a low-key approach was the best way to go.

"We're not getting ready for war in Iran, but what we are doing is we're protecting our own people," said White House spokesman Tony Snow on Monday.

2003 Memo Says Iranian Leaders Backed Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The Swiss ambassador to Iran informed U.S. officials in 2003 that an Iranian proposal for comprehensive talks with the United States had been reviewed and approved by Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei; then-President Mohammad Khatami; and then-Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi, according to a copy of the cover letter to the Iranian document.

"I got the clear impression that there is a strong will of the regime to tackle the problem with the U.S. now and to try it with this initiative," Tim Guldimann, the ambassador, wrote in a cover letter that was faxed to the State Department on May 4, 2003. Guldimann attached a one-page Iranian document labeled "Roadmap" that listed U.S. and Iranian aims for potential negotiations, putting on the table such issues as an end to Iran's support for anti-Israeli militants, action against terrorist groups on Iranian soil and acceptance of Israel's right to exist.

The cover letter, which had not been previously disclosed, was provided by a source who felt its contents were mischaracterized by State Department officials. Switzerland serves as a diplomatic channel for communications between Tehran and Washington because the two countries broke off relations after the 1979 seizure of U.S. Embassy personnel.

Guldimann's two-page fax prompted a debate among foreign policy professionals on whether the Bush administration missed an opportunity four years ago to strike a "grand bargain" with Iran at a time when Washington appeared at the height of its power after the invasion of Iraq and Iran had not mastered uranium enrichment. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was questioned about the document on Capitol Hill last week. She said she did not recall seeing it when she was national security adviser. "I just don't remember ever seeing any such thing," she said.

Former deputy secretary of state Richard L. Armitage is quoted in this week's issue of Newsweek saying that the administration "couldn't determine what was the Iranians' and what was the Swiss ambassador's" in the proposal, adding that his impression at the time was that the Iranians "were trying to put too much on the table" for effective negotiations. Guldimann wrote that he had several long discussions with Sadegh Kharrazi, Iran's ambassador to France -- and also nephew to the foreign minister and brother-in-law to Khamenei's son. According to Guldimann, Sadegh Kharrazi reported going "through every word of this paper" with Khamenei, Khatami and the foreign minister. "The question is dealt with in high secrecy. Therefore no one else has been informed," Kharrazi added.

The supreme leader had reservations on some points but agreed with 85 to 90 percent of the road map, and "everything can be negotiated," Kharrazi said, noting any reservations could be discussed at the first bilateral meeting. Kharrazi added: "There is a clear interest to tackle the problem of our relations with the U.S. I told them, this is a golden opportunity." Guldimann noted that the "lack of trust in the U.S. imposes them to proceed very carefully and very confidentially." Kharrazi proposed that Armitage represent the United States at the first meeting because he had made positive comments on Iranian democracy. Guldimann reported that he thought that was impossible, and he told Kharrazi that the Iranians should aim for a lower-level official.

"This document did not come through official channels but rather was a creative exercise on the part of the Swiss ambassador," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said yesterday. "The last 30 years are filled with examples of individuals claiming to represent Iranian views. We have offered to Iran a chance to sit across the table from us and discuss their nuclear issue and anything else they would like, should they simply, verifiably suspend their uranium-enrichment activities."

Iran President Tones Down Israel Attack (AP)

AP, February 14, 2007

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, toning down verbal attacks on Israel, said in an interview that aired Tuesday that Palestinians should be allowed to determine a resolution to the conflict with the Jewish state.

Ahmadinejad's comments were the latest in which the hard-line leader has sought to show a relatively more moderate face toward the West, including over Iran's controversial nuclear program.

In the interview with ABC's "Good Morning America," Ahmadinejad was asked if he stuck by his past calls for Israel to be "wiped off the face of the map."

Ahmadinejad stopped short of addressing whether Iran would recognize Israel but said any decision the Palestinians make should be respected.

"We say that based on the charter of the U.N., we say that based on the current international regulations, let Palestinians decide," Ahmadinejad said, according to ABC's translation of his Farsi comments.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said he though Ahmadinejad was being "disengenous."

"Iran gives support to the most extremist and anti-peace of Palestinian groups; Islamic Jihad, Hamas and others, and has made every attempt to destabilize the situation and encourage violence," Regev said.

DOJ_NMG_0131858

Ahmadinejad has taken a less confrontational tone in recent days at a time when the United States has sharply stepped up its pressure on Iran, increasing its military presence in the Gulf and accusing Iran of providing sophisticated explosives to militants in Iraq.

The hard-line Iranian leader also has come under pressure at home where reformists and fellow conservatives have criticized his diplomacy tactics, saying he spends too much time slamming the West and not enough on domestic problems including Iran's slumping economy.

In December, Ahmadinejad's rivals nearly swept local municipal elections, which were widely seen as a referendum on his support.

Ahmadinejad raised outrage in the West when he said in an October 2005 speech that Israel's "Zionist regime should be wiped off the map." Supporters of the president and some independent analysts have argued recently that his words were mistranslated from the Farsi — they argue it is better translated "vanish from the pages of time," implying it would vanish on its own rather be destroyed.

In the ABC interview, Ahmadinejad compared Israel to the Soviet Union, saying, "What happened to the former Soviet Union? It disappeared, disappeared from the face of the Earth. Was it because of war? No. It was through the decision of the people."

Tough Questions We Were Right To Ask (WP)

By Douglas J. Feith

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Promoters of the "Bush Lied, People Died" line claim that the recent Pentagon inspector general's report concerning my former office's work on Iraq intelligence supports their cause. What the IG actually said is a different story.

The IG, Thomas Gimble, focused on a single Pentagon briefing from 2002 -- a critique of the CIA's work on the Iraq-al-Qaeda relationship. His report concluded that the work my office generated was entirely lawful and authorized, and that Sen. Carl Levin was wrong to allege that we misled Congress.

Gimble made Levin happy, however, by calling the Pentagon briefing "inappropriate," a word the senator has whipped into a political lather. At issue is a simple but critical question: whether policy officials should be free to raise questions about CIA work. In Gimble's opinion, apparently, the answer is no. I disagree.

The CIA has a hard job. Some of its work has been good; some has been famously and disastrously bad, as everyone familiar with the Iraqi weapons of mass destruction fiasco knows. Intelligence is inherently sketchy and speculative -- and historically often wrong. It is improved when policy officials freely probe and challenge it.

In evaluating our policy toward Iraq after Sept. 11, 2001, my office realized that CIA analysts were suppressing some of their information. They excluded reports conflicting with their favored theory: that the secular Iraqi Baathist regime would not cooperate with al-Qaeda jihadists. (We now face a strategic alliance of jihadists and former Baathists in Iraq.) Pentagon officials did not buy that theory, and in 2002 they gave a briefing that reflected their skepticism. Their aim was not to enthrone a different theory, but to urge the CIA not to exclude any relevant information from what it provided to policymakers. Only four top-level government officials received the briefing: Donald Rumsfeld, George Tenet, and (together) Stephen Hadley and I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

A 2004 Senate intelligence committee report praised the quality of the Pentagon's Iraq-al-Qaeda work -- the critical briefing and the related Pentagon-CIA dialogue. The policy officials "played by [intelligence community] rules" and asked questions that "actually improved the Central Intelligence Agency's products," it said. Levin and Sen. Jay Rockefeller both endorsed that judgment.

The recent inspector general's report argues that policy officials "undercut" the CIA by pointing out " 'fundamental problems' with the way the Intelligence Community was assessing information" on the issue of Iraq-al-Qaeda relations -- even though Gimble last week said at a Senate hearing: "Again, I need to just remind everyone, we didn't make an assessment on the validity of either side of this issue." He labeled the Pentagon briefing "inappropriate" not because of any errors in it but because he viewed it as an "intelligence activity" that "varied" from "the intelligence community consensus." The Pentagon officials told the IG, however, that the briefing was a policy activity -- a critique of an intelligence product.

If this report hadn't become part of a political battle, Gimble's position would be scoffed at across the political spectrum. Sensible people recognize the importance of vigorous questioning of intelligence by the CIA's "customers." In bipartisan, unanimous reports on Iraq intelligence, both the Senate intelligence committee and the Silberman-Robb WMD commission called for more such questioning.

Specifically on the Pentagon's criticism of Iraq-al-Qaeda intelligence, the 2004 Senate report noted that our challenges were helpful: Intelligence analysts "stated that the questions had forced them to go back and review the intelligence reporting, and that during this exercise they came across information they had overlooked in initial readings."

In his Senate testimony, Gimble said his report -- and therefore all related claims that my office "manipulated intelligence" -- concerned only this single briefing. His whole argument rests on the claim that the briefing was "disseminated" as "an intelligence product" rather than a policy product. But he acknowledged that neither Rumsfeld nor Tenet could have mistaken the briefers for intelligence community spokesmen. His objections applied solely to the briefing that Hadley and Libby received in September 2002.

Astonishingly, the IG acknowledged that his office had not interviewed either of these officials to ask whether they thought the briefing was an intelligence product. Knowing well that the briefers worked for me, neither could have believed that Pentagon policy officials were speaking for the intelligence community. One of the briefing slides was "Fundamental Problems With How the Intelligence Community Is Assessing Information." Gimble had no basis to say the briefing was seen as an intelligence activity.

In his report, Gimble wrote that the Pentagon briefing was not the "most accurate analysis of intelligence." This has been taken to suggest it was false or deceptive. But the IG said he meant only that the briefing was at "variance with the consensus of the Intelligence Community." Of course it was at variance! It was a critique. That's why it was prepared in the first place.

Gimble's characterization is absurdly circular. Cheered on by the chairmen of the Senate intelligence and armed services committees, he is giving bad advice based on incomplete fact-finding and poor logic. He is discouraging tough questioning of intelligence. Our government needs more such questioning, not less.

The author was undersecretary of defense for policy from July 2001 until August 2005.

Al-Qaeda's Deputy Says Bush Bet On Iraq And Lost (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 13 -- Al-Qaeda's deputy leader said President Bush was an alcoholic and a lying gambler who wagered on Iraq and lost, according to a new audiotape released Tuesday by a U.S. group that tracks extremist messages.

"Bush suffers from an addictive personality and was an alcoholic," Ayman al-Zawahiri said in the audiotape, a transcript of which was released by the Washington-based SITE Institute. "I don't know his present condition . . . but the one who examines his personality finds that he is addicted to two other faults -- lying and gambling."

Bush, 60, has acknowledged he had a problem with drinking but said he gave up alcohol when he was 40.

On the tape, Zawahiri said Bush has gone down in history as one of the world's "most notorious liars."

It was the fourth message by Osama bin Laden's deputy since the beginning of the year. The last was on Jan. 22, when he mocked Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

More Iraqi Refugees Are Headed To U.S. (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns And Katherine Zoepf

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — Moving to address the flood of refugees fleeing war-torn Iraq, the Bush administration and the United Nations have developed a plan that would bring several thousand of them to the United States over the next 10 months, officials familiar with discussions of the plan say.

Under the plan, which is expected to be formally unveiled this week, the United Nations began its first large-scale screening this month of Iraqis who have fled to Syria and Jordan since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003. It hopes to register 135,000 to 200,000 of them to determine which Iraqis have fled persecution at home and would be eligible for refugee status.

The United Nations expects 13,000 to 20,000 Iraqis to be deemed eligible for resettlement abroad. The United States hopes to resettle at least 5,000 of that group this year, with the first arriving in late spring or summer. United Nations and Bush administration officials emphasize that those figures may change if conditions change in Iraq and neighboring countries.

Advocates for the refugees welcomed the plan but said too few people would be helped.

The Bush administration has recently moved to blunt sharp criticism from American lawmakers and advocates for refugee who have said it has failed to provide a haven for Iraqis fleeing the war.

Last week, the State Department announced the creation of a task force to coordinate efforts to resettle Iraqi refugees in the United States and to help those living elsewhere.

On Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to meet with António Guterres, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, to discuss the Iraqi refugee crisis.

Mr. Guterres and Paula J. Dobriansky, the under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs, are expected to outline the refugee plan this week at a news conference here. The officials who described the plan on Tuesday spoke on the condition of anonymity because they did not want to pre-empt the conference.

Mr. Guterres, when he was in Syria last week to assess the refugee crisis, told reporters that it was time "to clearly change the way the international community is handling this problem."

He called it "a humanitarian cause that must mobilize us all."

The United Nations estimates that two million Iraqis have fled the country and that 1.7 million are displaced in Iraq. Of those, roughly 500,000 have been displaced since February 2006, with 40,000 to 50,000 additional Iraqis fleeing their homes each month.

The United States, however, has admitted only 466 Iraqi refugees since the invasion.

The first Iraqi refugees to arrive in the United States under the new plan are likely to come from Turkey; most of them fled Iraq under Saddam Hussein. The second group is expected to come from Syria, followed by others from Jordan. They are expected to include Iraqis who have been identified for retribution for working with American authorities.

"It's a step we welcome," Kristele Younes, an advocate for Refugees International, said of the new plan. "But the numbers remain low compared to what the needs are."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, echoed those concerns, warning that the United States "can no longer ignore the plight of Iraqi refugees."

Mr. Kennedy, who convened a Senate hearing on the issue last month, said, "We can't solve the problem alone, but we obviously bear a heavy responsibility for the crisis."

In Damascus, Syria, where the United Nations began registering displaced Iraqis this month, more than 5,000 people lined up this week to apply for refugee status, officials said.

Until recently, Iraqis have been allowed to enter Syria freely. But in January, Iraqi refugees living in Syria said, the country began requiring entering Iraqis to obtain 15-day visitor visas, which may then be exchanged for three-month visas that may be renewed only once.

Though the Syrian government has made no public statement confirming the new measures, Iraqis have flocked to register for official refugee status, fearful that they may soon be sent home.

The United Nations, which has appealed for $60 million to help displaced Iraqis, has set up three telephone numbers for a hot line for Iraqis who face deportation from Syria. It plans to send more workers to the region and to open additional registration sites in Syria and Jordan to meet the demand.

But those efforts have yet to ease the anxieties of many frantic families.

Dozens of Iraqis gathered at the Sheraton Hotel in Damascus, where Mr. Guterres addressed reporters on Friday. As reporters began leaving, several Iraqis burst into the briefing room, shouting that they had a message for the United Nations.

Sami al-Hashim, an engineer from Baghdad, held his 2-year-old son, Abdul Rahman, as he shouted at the United Nations employees and journalists to "look at this example of an Iraqi refugee in Syria."

DOJ_NMG_0131861

As Mr. Guterres left the stage, Mr. Hashim, 49, seemed to fight back tears.

"I heard that the head of the U.N. would be here today, and I wanted to give him a message," he said. "I have 10 children, and I don't know what to do. If they send us back to Iraq, we will all be killed."

To Root Out Taliban, Pakistan To Expel 2.4 Million Afghans (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, February 14, 2007

JALOZAI, PAKISTAN

Like more than 100,000 Afghans, Maulana Mohammed Afzal has lived in the mud-baked lanes of this refugee camp ever since he fled war-ravaged Afghanistan 26 years ago. The camp is home for his family, but Pakistan's government says it's a threat to national security.

In its most recent effort to clamp down on Taliban activity within its borders, Pakistan has announced that all 2.4 million Afghan refugees, most living in camps, must return home by 2009. This and three other camps near the Afghan border, which together hold 230,000 refugees, are scheduled to be closed by the end of August.

"The problem of cross-border militancy is closely related to the presence of ... Afghan refugees in Pakistan," Munir Akram, Pakistan's Permanent Representative to the United Nations, wrote recently to the UN Security Council. "These camps have often given rise to complaints that they provide shelter to undesirable elements and Taliban."

Many disagree, however, saying Pakistan's Afghan refugees, most of whom are Pashtun and share the same tribal ethnicity as the Taliban movement, are only being made a scapegoat.

The debate comes as Robert Gates, in his first visit to Pakistan as US secretary of Defense, met with President Musharraf in Islamabad this week to discuss the Taliban's expected spring offensive in Afghanistan.

As pressure mounts on Pakistan, analysts say the fate of the Afghan refugee community – the world's largest – is an important piece in the puzzle of regional militancy. Simply shifting them across the border could flame tensions.

"[T]he Afghan government is not capable ... of providing for their rehabilitation. It will be a source of more conflict inside Afghanistan," says Aimal Khan, a political analyst at the Sustainable Development Policy Institute in Islamabad, which recently completed a study of Afghan refugees.

Violence draws new attention

Set against such a backdrop, a recent burst of violence radiating from Pakistan's tribal zone, including two attacks in the capital, Islamabad, has placed renewed attention on refugee camps as potential hotbeds, though no Afghan suspects have been identified.

The Jalozai camp, 18 miles from Peshawar in northwestern Pakistan, looks like a small, bustling city, with a mile-long bazaar offering a wealth of goods. But a cloud of controversy hangs over its dirt lanes. According to Western media reports, the camp has incubated several high-profile terrorists, including Ramzi Yousef, the mastermind of the first attacks on the World Trade Center in 1993, and Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. FBI agents raided the camp in October 2002, arresting four Afghans they said were connected to Al-Qaeda.

Today Jalozai and other refugee camps, which are spread throughout the Northwest Frontier Province and Balochistan, help fuel the Taliban resurgence, the government says.

Repatriation could create new issues

Closing down the camps may ease the building pressure on Pakistan to combat militancy within its borders, but observers say the move could cause more problems than it solves.

An exodus of poor Afghans is likely to exacerbate existing social and economic problems inside Afghanistan. Moreover, refugees without a home or means to support themselves could fall in with the Taliban, either out of resentment or a practical need to survive.

"They're made a scapegoat," says Behroz Khan, a prominent journalist in Peshawar. "If these families are sent back by force ... these people will turn toward those forces that are against Pakistan."

DOJ_NMG_0131862

Some 2.8 million Afghans have already voluntarily repatriated since 2002. Those who remain in camps feel they would be vulnerable if they return to Afghanistan, mostly because they are without land or shelter.

"I want to stay here. The government [in Afghanistan] is not in a favorable position. We have no residence in Afghanistan," says Mr. Afzal, originally from Kunduz Province in Afghanistan.

Better life in camps than back home

While conditions are poor in the Jalozai camp, many Afghans live better here than they would in Afghanistan, with well-built mud houses and well-kept schools. UNHCR, the UN refugee agency, provides mobile health-care centers and water, amenities they may lack in a land many of them barely know.

Whether the largely Pashtun refugee population stays or goes, many in Washington say that assisting them is crucial in stemming the tide of Taliban militancy.

"[W]e need programs that address the grievances, the aspirations of the Pashtun population on both sides of that border," James Dobbins, an analyst at the RAND Corporation, told a recent Congressional hearing about Afghanistan's security.

Last week, a tripartite meeting of officials from Pakistan, Afghanistan, and UNHCR decided that refugees in the four camps scheduled to be closed this year will be given a choice: either to repatriate with assistance from UNHCR or to move to other camps that will remain open until 2009. In addition, more than 2 million Afghans recently registered with the government under a UNHCR program, granting them temporary resident status in Pakistan for three years.

Finding a solution to the problem is likely to be difficult, observers agree. Pakistan is not a signatory to the UN's 1951 Refugee Convention or its subsequent protocols, meaning there is no clear-cut policy on how to handle refugees here.

Many hope alternative solutions can be agreed upon. "We believe there should be a number of options. We have to look at ... how to address those who can't go home," says Vivian Tan, UNHCR's senior regional public information officer in Islamabad.

Afghanistan, The Forgotten War (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, February 14, 2007

At Tuesday's Armed Services Committee hearing, even the Code Pink protesters seemed less than transfixed by America's other war. And with almost no press to watch them protest, who can blame them?

As the House spent most of its energy debating the resolution condemning President Bush's troop surge plan for Iraq, the House Armed Service Committee's hearing on the war in Afghanistan drew only the weakest of spotlights.

Yet the speakers were no collection of mid-level bureaucrats or professors. The star witness was Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the outgoing commander of all NATO troops in Afghanistan.

At 10 a.m., as the hearing was set to begin, the only member of the media on hand to hear Eikenberry was a camera guy from CNN doing a pool report. A reporter from Talk Radio News Service had signed the press sheet as well but was nowhere to be seen.

And even that small klatch of reporters seemed to be more than the committee could handle. Lara Battles, an Armed Services Committee spokeswoman, asked the pool reporter to move to make room for the public. "I thought I was the public," he said, sounding miffed. "I'll have to call the pool office and tell them we won't have audio." Battles shrugged.

Asked how much press she was expecting for the hearing, Battles she said she wasn't sure. "I haven't spoken to anyone," she said.

Instead, the media area was mostly populated by Frazer and Brenda Dealy, the proud parents of committee staffer Lauren Dealy. "We haven't been to one of these since she's been in the majority," confided Brenda Frazer.

Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., began by blaming the light turnout of committee members on the snow that had begun to fall. He then gave the microphone to the ranking member, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif. "This is an excellent hearing, very timely," he said, though the timing couldn't be worse.

Hunter followed with his own plan for success in Afghanistan: replacing poppy crops with orchards. "It would make sense if you have an almond crop or a pecan crop," said Hunter. "Farmers are going to be much less likely to chain saw their trees to plant poppies."

DOJ_NMG_0131863

After wrapping up with the suggestion that State Department and U.S. Agency for International Development employees be swapped for agricultural experts, he asked Skelton for a few more minutes to address the two protesters near the door.

"At the last hearing," when Defense Secretary Robert Gates testified, Hunter said, "some of the folks who don't like the Iraq program were standing and whispering derogatory comments while (Gates) testified … I would ask our guests -- all of our guests -- to be seated. It's proper decorum."

A tall young person with a pink headband and long blond hair and a shorter, middle-aged woman in a T-shirt stared back at him, refusing to sit. Security spoke to them but allowed them to stay on their feet.

Early in the hearing, the pair turned their backs on the committee, causing Skelton to scold them. "The chair is tolerant," he said, tolerating their presence as long as they'd face forward. Unless they did so, he said, they'd get the boot. "Do you understand?"

The woman nodded. By 10:40, though, the two seemed to lose interest and took turns sitting in the chair. By shortly after 11, they were both gone.

With the prospect of excitement over, the buzzer signaling four upcoming votes sounded. Skelton passed the gavel to Rep. Jim Marshall, D-Ga., who adjourned the meeting a few minutes later.

"I think Mr. Skelton intends that we get back together," said Marshall, unsure. "I don't know how many people will be coming back," he added.

Gen. Eikenberry, lingering in the empty room, said he wasn't sure why the hearing had gotten so little attention. "You'll have to ask your media colleagues why they're not here," he said.

General Warns Of Perils In Afghanistan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

A senior U.S. military commander urged Pakistan yesterday to crack down on an entrenched network of senior Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders, training camps and recruiting grounds -- a sanctuary from which fighters have tripled cross-border attacks since September and are preparing an anticipated major spring offensive in southern and eastern Afghanistan.

Army Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the outgoing top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, also warned that an even greater threat than the resurgent Taliban is the possibility that the government of President Hamid Karzai will suffer an irreversible loss of legitimacy among the Afghan population.

In response to the rising security threats, the Pentagon is expected to announce soon that it will keep U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan at a minimum of 27,000 into 2008, extending a temporary increase of 3,200 combat troops ordered last month.

"Al-Qaeda and Taliban leadership presence inside of Pakistan remains a very significant problem," Eikenberry testified before the House Armed Services Committee, warning of the "growing threat of Talibanization" inside Pakistan.

"A steady, direct attack against the command and control in Pakistan in sanctuary areas is essential for us to achieve success," Eikenberry said, joining other U.S. officials in publicly pressuring the Islamabad government to crack down on the safe havens in its frontier regions.

Taliban forces in Pakistan's North Waziristan have staged mass attacks on U.S. border camps, including a strike in recent days that saw the U.S. military respond with artillery fire into Pakistan.

Eikenberry, who has spent two of the past four years in Afghanistan, offered a forthright assessment not only of the progress in the Central Asian nation but also of the stark challenges ahead.

"The long-term threat to campaign success . . . is the potential irretrievable loss of legitimacy of the government of Afghanistan," he said.

"The accumulated effects of violent terrorist insurgent attacks, corruption, insufficient social resources and growing income disparities, all overlaid by a major international presence, are taking their toll on Afghan government legitimacy," he said. "A point could be reached at which the government of Afghanistan becomes irrelevant to its people, and the goal of establishing a democratic, moderate, self-sustaining state could be lost forever."

DOJ_NMG_0131864

A critical question, Eikenberry said, is whether the Afghan government is "winning." "In several critical areas -- corruption, justice, law enforcement and counter-narcotics -- it is not," he said. He called Afghan government institutions "extraordinarily weak."

Greater U.S. and international efforts are urgently needed to build a court and corrections system in Afghanistan, and to strengthen efforts to train an Afghanistan police force, which he said is "several years behind" compared with the development of the Afghan army. The Pentagon is seeking $5.9 billion this year and $2.7 billion in 2008 to build up Afghan security forces, including the police.

Eikenberry stressed that Taliban forces -- though making gains in relatively lawless regions of southern Afghanistan, which had few coalition troops until last summer -- have not been able to retake areas where the Afghan government and security forces have established a presence.

The decision to dispatch more U.S. forces is intended to bolster NATO's total contingent of 36,000 troops and to allow NATO to go on the offensive against a resurgent Taliban, Eikenberry said. NATO, which now has military oversight over all of Afghanistan, has provided only about 85 to 90 percent of the promised troops and other resources, and it faces shortages of infantry, military intelligence, helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft, Eikenberry said. "NATO must do more," Mary Beth Long, principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for international security, testified in the same House hearing.

The Taliban resurgence has been supported by a strengthened command-and-control structure that moved across the border into Pakistan after U.S. forces toppled the Taliban government in 2001. Today, Eikenberry said, senior Taliban leaders from the ousted regime are collaborating with al-Qaeda leaders, as well as with other groups led by the warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar and the Haqqani clan of an ethnically Pashtun tribe.

The United States is "terribly concerned" about the Taliban and al-Qaeda leadership in Quetta, Pakistan, and other regions that direct attacks, conduct training in camps with the help of foreign fighters, and recruit from Islamic schools known as madrassas. "Action against those will be needed," Long said.

Pakistan's government in September struck a peace agreement that halted military raids in North Waziristan's Federally Administered Tribal Areas, but since then the number of cross-border attacks has as much as tripled, Eikenberry said. "There've been problems with" the agreement, he said.

Taliban Commander Vows Biggest Ever Offensive In Afghanistan (AFP)

AFP, February 14, 2007

A purported Taliban commander has said the militia is ready for its "biggest ever" offensive in Afghanistan this year, while a boosted NATO-led force says it also plans significant operations.

The first weeks of 2007 have already seen intense fighting, mainly in the southern province of Helmand where the Taliban have held a small town for a fortnight, and the year is shaping up to be as violent as 2006 -- the worst in the insurgency.

A man claiming to be a Taliban commander in Helmand told AFP Tuesday he had up to 10,000 men ready for action once spring arrives in March.

"We will launch a very big offensive -- the biggest ever seen -- this spring," Mullah Abdul Rahim told AFP in a telephone interview.

"Our troops are ready to go after the enemy. They are waiting for the spring (and) the leaves to appear on the trees," he said in a telephone interview arranged by Taliban spokesman Yousuf Ahmadi.

"We have between 8,000 to 10,000 armed men. They're awaiting orders to launch the attack."

His role in the Islamist militia and his claims could not be independently verified.

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) has scoffed at such talk, labelling it rhetoric and propaganda, but the US military has warned this year's Taliban "spring offensive" could be particularly intense.

US Defense Secretary Robert Gates visited Pakistan on Monday to seek support for military activity on the Afghan border in coming months, saying that Pakistani and international forces have a "real opportunity this spring."

The 37-nation ISAF, which came under the command of a US general two weeks ago, is making its own plans, spokesman Colonel Tom Collins told AFP Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0131865

"In the coming months, ISAF will conduct significant operations as part of a continued offensive to extend the writ of government and facilitate reconstruction and development," he said.

The previous ISAF chief, British General David Richards, said before his departure the "conditions have been set" for a decisive push this year against Taliban rebels, said to be backed by extremists in Pakistan.

This included promoting reconstruction in the insurgency-hit areas of the south to win over local support in what ISAF has called a "winter offensive."

Winter has also seen the establishment of an Afghan, ISAF and Pakistan intelligence-sharing centre in Kabul and the training of nearly 3,400 "auxiliary police" to support their regular colleagues.

ISAF has meanwhile swollen to more than 35,000 troops, with the United States extending the tour of duty of about 3,500 soldiers for more than four months, and it is putting in place the first "rapid reaction unit."

"I think we will have what we need this year not just to contain it but to deal with it very aggressively," US ambassador Ronald Neumann told AFP Tuesday, adding though that he expected "very hard fighting this year."

The effort could be maintained even if NATO countries ignored pleas to send more troops to the force, he said. NATO's military command has said ISAF is about 10 percent short of what it needs.

This year's worst fighting has been in Helmand, Afghanistan's number one opium producer and where most of a British deployment of about 5,200 troops is based.

Helmand governor Assadullah Wafa said Sunday about 700 foreign militants, whom he linked to Al-Qaeda, had infiltrated the province from Pakistan.

There have been regular clashes around the Kajaki hydropower dam and ISAF is poised for action to take back the town of Musa Qala, captured by Taliban two weeks ago, if talks fail.

Rahim, the purported Taliban commander in Helmand, said the rebel force built itself up during the winter months. He claimed his men had forced out government troops from seven districts.

"We have shown that we're able to defeat the enemy in the areas under our control," he told AFP from an undisclosed location in southern Afghanistan.

Ahmed Rashid, an expert on the Taliban, said the militia controls about two-thirds of Helmand.

"The perception in the south of the country is certainly that the Taliban are coming back. And perceptions play a big part in this country," he told AFP.

Taliban Spring (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

American and NATO military planners in Afghanistan are bracing for what they anticipate will be a major Taliban offensive this spring. Expect more terrorism in Kabul, attacks on positions in and around the key Pashtun city of Kandahar, ambushes on vehicles and attacks on European and Canadian forces, which the Taliban consider, with good reason, to be the weak link in the NATO chain. Expect, too, for the Taliban to be decisively defeated.

The year 2006 was a bad one for Afghanistan. The rate of suicide bombings throughout the country soared. The Taliban found sanctuary in Pakistan's Waziristan province and, thanks to their "truce" with Islamabad, more than doubled the number of raids into Afghanistan. Entire provinces in the country had almost no military or police presence to speak of. And NATO was unable to secure further troop commitments from its non-U.S. members.

Now the picture is brightening. A year ago there were no Afghan troops and no more than 150 U.S. special forces in the southern province of Helmand. Today, there is an Afghan infantry battalion and a British air-assault brigade. The U.S. is deploying thousands of soldiers from the 82nd Airborne Division while extending the deployment of the Tenth Mountain Infantry brigade in anticipation of the spring offensive. That brings total U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan to 24,000, roughly 6,000 more than this time last year. So much for the idea that the surge in Iraq is starving our efforts in Afghanistan.

The situation with the Afghan military is also improving, though a senior U.S. military official describes the process as a "steep uphill climb." In 2005, the desertion rate was 25%. Today it is 10%. It helps that the Afghan soldier has now had a raise, to about $100 a month. It helps, too, that the U.S. is now investing $8.6 billion over two years to better equip and train the army, and to double its size to 70,000.

Where the U.S. still has significant problems is with its partners in the region. The fighting capabilities of European, Canadian and even British forces continue to lag far behind America's, as does their willingness to fight. Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi has been under intense political pressure to withdraw Italy's 1,800-man contingent in Afghanistan. This week, a Canadian senate committee recommended withdrawing their forces if other NATO countries don't increase theirs.

More problematic is Pakistan. President Pervez Musharraf's recent proposal to mine the border with Afghanistan along the so-called "Durand line" is probably not serious, but if it were it would not be helpful. And while it's true that the Pakistan army lost some 400 soldiers in fighting against the Taliban, it's also true that their September truce represents an abdication of their sovereign responsibility to control their borders.

Still, the combination of more troops and a keen appreciation of last year's mistakes puts the U.S. and Afghanistan in a better position than a year ago to repulse the Taliban's expected spring offensive. We hope our wavering NATO allies feel the same way. After all, isn't Afghanistan supposed to be the "good war" in the broader war on terror?

In Philippines, U.S. Making Progress In War On Terror (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, February 14, 2007

CAMP BAUTISTA, Philippines — Thousands of miles from the bazaars of Iraq and the mountains of Afghanistan, U.S. military forces are quietly helping defeat terrorists in the jungles of the southern Philippines, a forgotten front in the global war on terrorism.

Working behind the scenes with a rejuvenated Philippine military, U.S. special forces have helped kill, capture or rout hundreds of Abu Sayyaf guerrillas who have links to the Islamic terror groups Jemaah Islamiyah and al-Qaeda, Philippine and U.S. military commanders say.

The Abu Sayyaf, responsible for 16 years of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings in the southern Philippines, has been forced to flee into the mountainous terrain here on Jolo island in the remote Sulu Archipelago.

But its numbers are dwindling and its leadership almost wiped out, says Brig. Gen. Ruperto Pabustan, commander of Philippine special forces on Jolo.

"They are on the run," Pabustan says. "They are evading our troops now, and they are short of ammunition. … We are slowly neutralizing Abu Sayyaf."

American officials agree.

"I've felt a turn in the tide," says Kristie Kenney, U.S. ambassador to the Philippines. "There are a lot of good things going on."

Backed by U.S. intelligence, equipment and training, Philippine forces have killed or captured 200 of the 400 Abu Sayyaf fighters on Jolo since they began Operation Ultimatum last August, Pabustan says. Among the dead are Abu Sayyaf leader Khadafi Janjalani, whose corpse was identified in January, four months after he suffered fatal wounds in a firefight with Philippine forces. Abu Sayyaf military planner Abu Solaiman was killed by Philippine special forces Jan. 16.

"They've been kicking some butt," says U.S. Army Maj. Kevin Brown, a member of the Utah National Guard based at this Philippine military camp on Jolo. "I think they're close to breaking this thing open."

Abu Sayyaf is the most notorious of several militant groups fighting to create a fundamentalist Muslim state in the Philippines. It mutated over time into a criminal gang, engaged mostly in lucrative kidnappings. Hiding on Jolo with the Abu Sayyaf survivors are a handful — fewer than 10 — members of Jemaah Islamiyah, including two suspects in the 2002 Bali bombing in Indonesia, the Philippine government says.

U.S. forces have maintained a low profile in the southern Philippines since early 2002. Numbers fluctuate, but there are now about 450 — more than half of them members of the special forces.

The U.S. force is split between Jolo and Zamboanga city on the large island of Mindanao, says U.S. Air Force Maj. John Redfield, U.S. military spokesman in Zamboanga. In 2002 they helped drive Abu Sayyaf off the island of Basilan.

DOJ_NMG_0131867

"The U.S. has done much better than the critics expected," says Philippines specialist Kit Collier, visiting fellow at Australian National University. "Five years ago, when U.S. troops were first sent to Basilan, many predicted 'a new Afghanistan.' Instead, the security environment there has been transformed."

The U.S. role is controversial. The Philippine Constitution forbids foreign troops from establishing bases in the Philippines and, by many interpretations, bars them from combat. So U.S. forces have played a limited role in areas such as:

•Fostering goodwill among the predominantly Muslim communities by conducting medical missions, paving roads and refurbishing schools.

•Using satellite imagery and other technology to help the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) track Abu Sayyaf.

•Equipping Philippine soldiers with night-vision goggles and other gear to give them an edge on the battlefield.

•Training Philippine troops, whose efforts to subdue Abu Sayyaf had failed.

"We have provided some assistance, but the AFP is doing the heavy lifting," says U.S. Army Col. David Maxwell, commander of the U.S. military task force in the southern Philippines.

Critics say military operations and aid projects aren't enough. The Muslims of the southern Philippines — a minority in a majority Christian country — have long-standing grievances. They are among the poorest people in the Philippines. They have long been ignored by the Christian political elite in Manila. Promised development money rarely arrives.

"I don't care how many medical missions the Americans do," says Astrid Tuminez, researcher with the U.S. Institute of Peace, a government-funded organization trying to help arrange a peace deal between the Muslim separatists and the government. "Those grievances are still there."

Qaeda Affiliate In Algeria Kills 6 As Bombs Strike Police Stations (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

Seven bombs exploded almost simultaneously in Algeria yesterday, killing six people and wounding more than a dozen in the worst attack in months by North Africa's most active terrorist group, which says it has allied itself with Al Qaeda.

The bombs, including at least five powerful car or truck bombs, went off before dawn, pulverizing police stations in six towns in mountainous areas east of the capital, Algiers.

A group calling itself the Qaeda Organization in the Islamic Maghreb claimed responsibility for the attacks in a telephone call to the Morocco offices of the Arabic-language satellite broadcaster Al Jazeera. The name was recently adopted by the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has operated in Algeria since 1996.

Agence France-Presse reported that the group also claimed responsibility on a Web site.

It was formed as an offshoot of the Armed Islamic Group, which along with other Islamist guerrilla armies fought a brutal decadelong civil war after the Algerian military canceled the second round of parliamentary elections in early 1992 after an Islamist party overwhelmingly won the first round and was poised to win the second.

The Salafist group advocates a religious theocracy in Algeria and the rest of North Africa.

After suffering years of dwindling membership because of a government amnesty program, its core membership, estimated at hundreds, has recently vowed to expand operations across North Africa and into Europe.

In October the group detonated nearly simultaneous truck bombs at two police stations near Algiers, killing three people. On Dec. 10 it attacked a convoy carrying employees of a Halliburton joint venture in a suburb of the capital, killing two people and wounding eight.

The Interior Ministry said in a statement carried by the official Algeria Press Service that two members of the security forces had been among those killed in yesterday's attacks and that another 13 people had been wounded, including 10 police officers. It said five of the seven bombs had been in vehicles.

At least four of the bombs went off near police stations in the district of Boumerdes in the mountains roughly 30 miles east of Algiers, according to the ministry. Others took place in the Tizi Ouzou district farther east.

Both districts are part of the Kabylia region, a mountainous, traditionally Berber area that has long been resistant to government control. The region was the scene of some of the worst fighting during Algeria's struggle against French colonial rule in the 1950s and was a center of Islamist resistance during the civil war in the 1990s. It has been a base for the Salafist group for years.

Counterterrorism officials fear that the group is attracting militants from across the region and could inspire attacks elsewhere. Last month its current leader, Abdelmalek Droukdel, called on followers to "fight the nationals of France and the agents of the crusaders occupying our land."

Mr. Droukdel, also known as Abu Mussab Abdelwadoud, said he was waiting for guidance from Al Qaeda for the next step.

Lam's 4 Top Aides Interviewed For Interim U.S. Attorney Post (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 14, 2007

With U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's departure imminent, the Justice Department has interviewed four of her top advisers for the position of interim chief while a committee searches for a long-term replacement.

Among the short-term candidates interviewed within the last two weeks are Lam's second-in-command, Stephen Clark, her third-in-command, Karen Hewitt, plus Narcotics Chief Tim Coughlin and Appeals Chief Bruce Castetter.

All are career prosecutors hand-picked by Lam who have supported her priorities of prosecuting corruption and white-collar crimes rather than routine immigration cases, which, according to Justice Department officials, led to Lam's ouster.

Lam was targeted for dismissal because of "performance-related" issues after the Justice Department received complaints from members of Congress about her handling of immigration enforcement cases, said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty.

Before statements, sources told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Lam, a political independent, was asked to step down because of declining prosecutions of gun, smuggling and drug cases.

Though initially staying mum, the Justice Department confirmed under pressure from lawmakers that it recently asked at least seven U.S. attorneys, including Lam, to resign. Officials said the dismissals weren't politically motivated and were generally based on job performance.

The interviews of potential temporary replacements for Lam were conducted via video conference calls by Justice Department officials in Washington, D.C. The candidates did not seek the position but were invited to be interviewed.

An announcement is not expected until Lam's final day in office Thursday. An office party is scheduled for that day so colleagues can wish her well. Lam has declined to discuss reasons for her departure or her future plans.

Members of the legal community said whoever is appointed as interim U.S. attorney could end up staying until a new president takes office in January 2009.

They said it was unlikely many qualified lawyers would be interested in the post for a term that would last less than two years. And many qualified candidates may not be interested in forfeiting lucrative salaries in the private sector or positions at big firms for such a short stint.

Each interim candidate declined comment.

Clark won convictions in the 1996 corruption case against three Superior Court judges and an attorney and in a billing fraud case against former La Jolla eye surgeon Jeffrey Rutgard in 1995. He also handled the 1989 fraud and tax-evasion trial of Nancy Hoover Hunter.

Hewitt joined the San Diego office in 2000 and prosecuted civil fraud cases before she was appointed Executive Assistant U.S. attorney a year ago. Before coming to San Diego, she was a lawyer in the Justice Department's civil division in Washington, where she specialized in constitutional law and civil rights cases for about eight years.

Coughlin is known for his prosecutions of drug lords from the Arellano Felix cartel, the Mexican Mafia and others. Castetter, a 32-year veteran of the office, has held several leadership positions during his long tenure, including chief of the appellate, criminal and general crimes divisions.

Lam's forced departure after 4½ years has drawn fire from Democrats and other critics who accused Attorney General Alberto Gonzales of politicizing the process of choosing top prosecutors.

The critics have speculated that Lam is being removed to cripple an investigation into corruption in Congress. Lam's office prosecuted former Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, and that case has led to investigations of other lawmakers.

Critics say Gonzales is planning to use a little-known provision included in last year's reauthorization of the Patriot Act to appoint U.S. attorneys without Senate approval.

The Senate will consider legislation, perhaps as early as this week, to limit the attorney general's appointment of interim U.S. attorneys to 120 days. Justice Department officials have said they plan to replace Lam with a presidential nominee who will not bypass the Senate confirmation process.

Historically, such candidates are recommended by senators from the state where the vacancy exists. Because both of California's senators are Democrats, a committee of three Republican lawyers in each of the four judicial districts in the state interviews candidates and makes recommendations to Gerald Parsky, a prominent Republican and Bush friend who then evaluates the picks before suggesting them to the White House.

The San Diego committee, which includes Meryl Young, John Davies and former federal Judge Lawrence Irving, is accepting applications and so far has received a few. It could be four to five months before a permanent replacement is confirmed by the Senate.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

J&J Acts To Push Its Reputation Back Into Joint (FT)

By Christopher Bowe, Salamander Davoudi And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, February 14, 2007

Carved in stone in the lobby of its US headquarters is Johnson & Johnson's credo, displaying its guiding principles and symbol for what the healthcare conglomerate regards as its most preciously preserved commodity - its reputation.

But J&J also prizes is decentralised structure - with managers nimbly running separate businesses ranging from pharmaceuticals to medical devices to consumer brands such as its iconic Band-Aid and baby shampoo. These two ideals at J&J have clashed, and now the group is trying to minimise the damage to its reputation following revelations of improper payments overseas that could violate US anti-bribery laws.

Late on Monday, J&J said it had notified the US legal authorities and securities regulators that it had found "improper payments in the connection of medical devices in two small-market countries."

J&J was not under investigation for these payments and voluntarily notified the US Department of Justice and Securities and Exchange Commission. It said the payments could violate the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), and that a senior executive had stepped down as a result. J&J declined to name the countries or the type of payments involved.

Nevertheless, J&J said Michael Dormer, 55, would retire as worldwide chairman of three of its medical device businesses - Ethicon Endosurgery, Depuy orthopaedic implants and Ortho diagnostics unit.

J&J said Mr Dormer would retire, after he cited the internal review of the payments and that he had "ultimate responsibility" for those subsidiaries.

As a result of his exit, J&J has consolidated all its main medical device and diagnostics businesses under 50-year-old Nicholas Valeriani, who previously oversaw only three, including Cordis stents.

J&J is moving quickly to try to the minimise the dent to its highly regarded corporate reputation. The company's challenge is to manage a highly decentralised corporate structure, which prides itself on managers making local decisions quickly.

Last year, medical devices and diagnostics had $20.3bn in sales, or 38 per cent of J&J's total sales of $53.3bn.

Mr Valeriani must also oversee an industry that has attracted ongoing government scrutiny of its US marketing practices, and now problems overseas.

The J&J case underscores that the medical device industry is particularly vulnerable to charges under the US FCPA, an anti-bribery statute that makes it illegal to make payments or offer anything of value to a foreign government official in order to obtain business.

DOJ_NMG_0131870

One analyst said: "In countries with centralised health schemes you could also end up dealing with government officials. I am not surprised that in some places you have to lubricate the wheels. I would be surprised if such practices only went on at Johnson & Johnson."

Indictments of companies can carry a heavy price in the US, including a potential ban on doing business with the government, a huge buyer of health products and services. Around the world, companies like J&J sell products to hospitals and other healthcare facilities that are often government-owned, increasing the risk that payments to healthcare officials can be considered bribes to government officials. Bribes between parties in the private sector are not covered under the FCPA.

Experts say the Justice Department has markedly stepped up its enforcement of FCPA violations, forcing companies to be more vigilant about any types of payments it makes to individuals or entities that may be deemed to be government controlled.

Last year marked one of the busiest years in enforcement by the Justice Department of the FCPA. According to research by Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, a Washington law firm, 17 of 20 known probes by the DoJ and SEC into alleged FCPA violations emerged after the companies self-reported the questionable payments following internal investigations.

Assistant attorney-general Alice Fisher last year said that while the result of a voluntary disclosure is uncertain, it will result in "real tangible benefit".

Cyberonics Regains Nasdaq Compliance (AP)

AP, February 14, 2007

Cyberonics in Compliance With Nasdaq Rules; Has Filed All Past Reports With SEC

HOUSTON (AP) -- Cyberonics Inc. said Tuesday it received a letter from the Nasdaq Stock Market confirming that the medical device maker is in compliance with all the exchange's rules, and its stock will continue to be listed.

The company also said that with last week's filing of its quarterly report for the period ended Oct. 27, it has now filed all previously delinquent reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Cyberonics had received letters from the Nasdaq warning that the company was subject to delisting for failing to meet its filing requirements.

"This is an important milestone in our efforts to refocus attention on our business following an exhaustive, five-month investigation by the audit committee of our board of directors into the company's stock option grants, practices and procedures," Reese S. Terry, Jr., the firm's interim chief executive, said in a release.

Cyberonics in November said it would restate financial results from 2000 through January 2006 to correct improper stock options accounting, resulting in $10 million in non-cash expenses. The company's CEO and chief financial officer resigned later that month.

Cyberonics is one of 106 companies currently under SEC or Justice Department scrutiny over its stock-option grants, and at least 94 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews into their stock options practices, according to an AP review.

Shares of Cyberonics added 34 cents to $21.04 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq.

Aflac Plans To Allow Shareholders To Vote On Pay For Top Executives (USAT)

By Del Jones

USA Today, February 14, 2007

Responding to the uproar against soaring executive compensation, Aflac today will announce a move to become the first major U.S. company to let shareholders vote on executive pay packages.

On Tuesday, Aflac's board approved allowing shareholders to vote on the pay of the insurer's top five executives. Although the vote will be non-binding, it would be hard for Aflac to ignore the wishes of a majority of shareholders, says analyst Dawn Wolfe at Boston Common Asset Management.

Other companies are under similar pressure. Shareholder proposals to approve executive pay are on ballots this year at about 50 companies, many introduced by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) union, which is a powerful institutional investor.

Aflac, probably best known for the ubiquitous duck in its TV ads, had received a shareholder proposal from Boston Common, but the money management firm withdrew it when Aflac promised to make the move voluntarily. Aflac plans to announce today that shareholders will begin voting in 2009, the first time there will be three years of complete pay data in proxy tables under new Securities and Exchange Commission disclosure rules.

Aflac CEO Dan Amos said in an interview that a key concern is the chance of an "emotional vote" if Aflac's stock is depressed going into the annual shareholders meeting.

Similar shareholder proposals at other major companies have never passed, says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy at AFSCME. However, he says proposals at companies such as Sun Microsystems were supported by 40% or more of shareholders.

Others will follow Aflac's lead, Ferlauto says. "The only question is not when or if, but how many."

This will force companies to better align CEO pay with performance, Wolfe says. She says that in the United Kingdom, which requires such non-binding votes, CEO pay tends to be in more in line with performance, so shareholders rarely vote pay packages down.

Amos, who owns 9% of Aflac stock, says a vote would make a difference even if it's non-binding. If shareholders voted against his pay, "We would go back to our big shareholders and ask: 'Why did you vote against? What was it you didn't like?' From there, we'd make adjustments," he says.

Amos made $3.7 million in salary and bonus plus $2.5 million in restricted stock in 2005, the most recent year his pay was reported. The package was second highest among a group of 16 insurance CEOs, Wolfe says. While Aflac stock has been flat for more than a year, since Amos became CEO in 1990, its total return is roughly 2,770%, vs. 515% for the Standard & Poor's 500.

Congress Probes Timely Sale Of Sallie Stock (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Congressional investigators are looking into Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord's sale of $18.3 million worth of company stock this month, just days before President Bush proposed a huge cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to nosedive.

The chairmen of the House Financial Services and Education committees sent letters yesterday to the White House counsel, the education secretary and Sallie Mae, asking for detailed information on all contact between the Reston-based student lending giant and the Bush administration over the past three months.

"Given the timing of the Sallie Mae stock sale and the release of the President's budget, the committee is seeking more information as a matter of routine oversight," Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education Committee, said in a statement.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) sent a letter yesterday to the Securities and Exchange Commission calling on it to investigate the transaction. The Senate Education Committee, which is chaired by Kennedy, is also looking into the sale, said Melissa Wagoner, a spokeswoman for Kennedy.

Lord sold 400,000 shares of Sallie Mae stock on Feb. 1 and Feb. 2. Three days later, Bush announced a budget that would cut subsidies to the student-lending industry by about $19 billion over five years, which caused Sallie Mae's stock to plummet about 9 percent that day, to its lowest closing price in more than two years.

Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, said last week that Lord had no prior knowledge that the Bush administration would propose such cuts and called the timing of the sale "completely coincidental." He said Lord had told the company about his plans to sell the stock nine days before the sale.

"We look forward to responding to any questions that members of Congress may have on this transaction," Joyce said yesterday.

The House began looking into the sale after The Washington Post reported Saturday that Lord would have received about $1.4 million less from the transaction if he had sold his shares at the closing price on the day Bush unveiled his budget.

DOJ_NMG_0131872

The letters from Miller and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, asked Sallie Mae and the Bush administration for a response within 10 days.

Board Silly (NYT)

By Guhan Subramanian

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

Cambridge, Mass.

SLOWLY but surely, corporate America is giving up the staggered board.

Some businesses are responding to corporate governance rating agencies, which penalize companies that do not elect all of the directors each year. Some are responding to shareholder resolutions or to behind-the-scenes pressure from large shareholders. Georgeson Shareholder Services reports there were more than 90 resolutions among S.&P. 1500 companies in 2006 to abolish staggered boards, half proposed by the companies and half by shareholders. More are expected in the 2007 proxy season, and some corporate governance experts are urging companies not to fight the issue.

This would be a mistake. What shareholders object to is not staggered boards themselves, but how staggered boards block takeovers.

Let me explain. Most corporations have adopted or can easily adopt a "poison pill," a takeover defense that forbids a hostile bidder from directly purchasing a controlling interest in a target company. If the target has a staggered board, a bidder must win two proxy contests, conducted more than a year apart, to gain control of the board and jettison the poison pill. No bidder in the modern era of takeovers has had the patience and persistence to do this, so the staggered board combined with the pill presents a potent roadblock to shareholders who want to accept a hostile offer.

But there is a way to give shareholders exactly what they want without eliminating the staggered board: shift the staggered board from the charter to the bylaws. That would allow a hostile bidder to dismantle the staggered board through a bylaw amendment and put its offer to shareholders in a single proxy contest. For the 99.5 percent of United States public companies that are not subject to a hostile takeover bid in a given year, directors would continue to be elected to staggered, three-year terms.

Staggered boards offer many benefits over unitary boards: greater stability, improved independence of outside directors and a longer-term perspective — things shareholders should want, too. A bylaws-based staggered board would provide directors with three-year terms but allow shareholders to "recall" them in the event of a hostile takeover bid that a majority of shareholders want to accept. This is the norm in many European countries, where directors can be elected to six-year terms but shareholders retain the right to remove them from office at any time.

Skeptics might contend that unitary boards are pretty stable too, because the vast majority of board elections are uncontested. But because companies are increasingly requiring that board candidates win a majority of votes cast, directors would value the right to face election only every three years rather than every year.

The stakes are high. If directors surrender on the question of staggered boards, we risk further short-termism in boardrooms and no internal counterweight to managers focused on quarterly earnings. But if they hold firm, approximately half of the nation's public companies will remain heavily insulated from the socially desirable "disciplinary" effect provided by the threat of a hostile takeover. Rather than forcing an all-or-nothing showdown, boards should respond to shareholder demands to end staggering with the counter-offer of a bylaws-based staggered board.

Shareholders rightly decided that they did not like the anti-takeover effect of staggered boards, but their campaign unnecessarily casts the baby out with the bathwater. A bylaws-based staggered board meets the interests of all sides.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former CIA Official, Contractor Indicted (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131873

SAN DIEGO (AP) — The CIA's former No. 3 official was charged Tuesday with accepting lavish vacations, private jet flights and a job offer from his best friend, a defense contractor who in return is suspected of getting inside information that helped him win agency contracts.

A federal grand jury returned 11 counts of fraud, conspiracy and money laundering against Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, executive director of the CIA until he resigned in May, and San Diego defense contractor Brent Wilkes.

Foggo is the highest-ranking CIA officer to be charged with crimes allegedly committed while working for the agency. The charges grew from the bribery scandal that landed former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham in prison.

According to the indictment, Wilkes offered Foggo a high-paying position and reserved him an office in the executive suite when he built the new headquarters of the Wilkes Corp. in late 2002.

Wilkes is also accused of paying for Foggo and his family to join Wilkes and his family on a vacation in Scotland in August 2003, doling out $12,000 for private jet flights, $4,000 for a helicopter ride to play golf and $44,000 for a stay at an estate.

In addition, Wilkes spent more than $1,600 on prostitutes for himself and Cunningham at a Hawaiian resort in August 2003, the indictment alleges.

Foggo is accused of arranging that fall for one of Wilkes' companies to be a middleman in selling bottled water to the CIA. In December 2003, Wilkes introduced Foggo at a party at Wilkes' headquarters in Poway, Calif., as a future executive.

Foggo and Wilkes, both 52, are accused of making illegal money transfers of $815,000 in government contract funds from a Virginia shell company to Wilkes' companies.

Foggo and Wilkes could each be punished by up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

"High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment," said U.S. Attorney Carol Lam.

The charges are a blow to the CIA, whose director, Michael Hayden, wrote to employees Tuesday that the agency continues to cooperate with the investigation.

In a separate indictment, Wilkes was charged with 25 counts of conspiracy, bribery, money laundering and unlawful monetary transactions to Cunningham in return for government contracts.

A man who was described as a co-conspirator in Cunningham's 2005 plea agreement, mortgage banker John T. Michael, faces one count of obstructing justice.

Wilkes could be sentenced to up to 20 years in prison if convicted on the second indictment. Michael faces up to five years if convicted.

Mark MacDougall, an attorney for Foggo, and Mark Geragos, an attorney for Wilkes, did not return calls seeking comment. A message seeking comment from Michael was also not returned.

The charges came 20 months after the FBI opened an investigation into Cunningham, who served on key House committees with oversight of government contracts. He pleaded guilty in November 2005 to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Investigators quickly turned to Foggo and Wilkes, who played high school football together. After graduating in 1972, they roomed together at San Diego State University, were best men at each others' weddings, and named their sons after each other.

Foggo was named executive director of the CIA in 2004. He resigned in May under investigation by the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service, the Pentagon's Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the CIA's inspector general and the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego.

In the past two months, Wilkes' wife has filed for legal separation, and he defaulted on a $7.5 million personal loan.

Associated Press writer Katherine Shrader in Washington contributed to this report.

Former No. 3 CIA Official Indicted (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 14, 2007

Federal prosecutors have indicted the former No. 3 official at the CIA, accusing him of conspiring to steer lucrative contracts to companies run by a longtime friend who is accused of bribing a congressman.

DOJ_NMG_0131874

Kyle "Dusty" Foggo is indicted in a corruption probe that sent former Republican congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham to federal prison. Foggo's indictment Tuesday by a federal grand jury in San Diego says Foggo took luxury vacations, expensive meals and other perks from his friend, Brent Wilkes.

Wilkes, the head of a web of San Diego-based government contracting firms, is accused of bribing Foggo to get contracts, including one to supply bottled water to CIA operatives. Wilkes is charged in a separate indictment of bribing Cunningham with more than $700,000 in cash, travel, meals and prostitute services.

Cunningham is serving an eight-year prison term after pleading guilty in 2005 to taking more than $2.4 million from Wilkes and businessman Mitchell Wade in exchange for steering Pentagon and intelligence contracts to their companies. Wade has pleaded guilty and remains free while cooperating in the ongoing investigation.

Wilkes' lawyer, Mark Geragos, said all the charges were "demonstrably false" but refused to give specifics. Geragos said Wilkes plans to plead not guilty in a court appearance today.

Foggo's lawyer, Mark MacDougall, did not return messages left Tuesday evening.

Foggo and Wilkes, both 52, met in high school in the San Diego suburbs. From 2001 to 2004, Foggo was based in Germany and oversaw CIA support operations in areas that included Iraq. He was promoted to executive director of the CIA in November 2004 under then-director Porter Goss. He resigned last May amid news reports about the federal investigation.

The indictment says Foggo steered contracts worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to Wilkes' companies. Wilkes took Foggo to Scotland and Hawaii, paid for dinners costing as much as $1,100 and gave him a $2,300 cigar humidor, the indictment says.

The other indictment details the perks Cunningham allegedly received for help in steering contracts to another Wilkes company, ADCS Inc. Those perks included a Hawaii vacation during which Wilkes used company money to pay for prostitutes for himself and Cunningham.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Foggo, Wilkes (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton And Debbi Farr Baker, Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 14, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Poway defense contractor Brent Wilkes and former high-ranking CIA official Kyle “Dusty” Foggo, childhood friends from San Diego who got entangled in the Randy “Duke” Cunningham corruption scandal, were indicted Tuesday by a federal grand jury.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam announced the indictments at an afternoon press conference, calling the charges against the two men “breathtaking in scope.”

The jury returned 11 counts against Foggo and Wilkes that include conspiracy, wire fraud, conflict of interest and money laundering. It charges Foggo with using his seniority and influence within the CIA to direct the awarding of contracts to Wilkes, his lifelong friend.

A second indictment, which included 26 counts, names Wilkes and New York-based mortgage banker John T. Michael, who co-owned a mortgage company that provided loans to Cunningham. It charges Wilkes with conspiracy, wire fraud, bribery of a public official and money laundering.

The investigation began after a June 12, 2005, report by Copley News Service reporter Marcus Stern that detailed Cunningham's sale of his Del Mar Heights home to a defense contractor for hundred of thousand of dollars more than it was worth.

Within nine months of that first report of corruption, Cunningham was convicted and jailed.

Court documents allege that Wilkes provided more than $700,000 to Cunningham in exchange for the former congressman corruptly influencing the appropriation of funds and the execution of government contracts to benefit Wilkes' company, Poway-based ADCS Inc.

Associated Press

Michael, 35, is charged with a single charge of obstructing justice. He is accused of trying to influence and impede a federal grand jury investigation by providing misleading and false testimony regarding Wilkes' role in paying off the $500,000 second mortgage on Cunningham's Rancho Santa Fe home.

Michael is the nephew of the wife of Thomas Kontogiannis, a Long Island developer who sought Cunningham's help in seeking a presidential pardon for a conviction in a New York schools bribery scandal. Ultimately, Kontogiannis decided not to pursue the pardon.

Kontogiannis was named a co-conspirator in the Cunningham case and, according to court records, he gave the former congressman $328,000, most of it through an overpayment for a boat. He has not been charged.

The indictment alleges that Wilkes paid bribes to Cunningham in the form of cash, checks, lavish meals, trips, lodging, corporate jet travel, boats and prostitution.

The indictment says that on two occasions Wilkes provided prostitutes for himself and the congressman on two consecutive evenings on a lavish Hawaiian trip.

Court documents also allege that Foggo and Wilkes, both 52, schemed to conceal Foggo's conflict of interest and corrupt intent by using shell companies and straw men, and laundered the proceeds of their fraud.

Foggo accepted tens of thousands of dollars in meals, gifts and vacations, and a standing offer of a senior executive position with ADCS. Foggo disclosed none of this to the CIA, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors are asking for forfeiture of $12 million from Wilkes and Michael.

“These two indictments describe patterns of self-dealing and corruption that spanned years and reached deep into our country's systems of procurement in the defense industry,” Lam said.

“The allegations in the indictments describe undisclosed personal and financial relationships between government officials and individuals seeking lucrative defense contracts. These personal and financial relationships led to benefits totalling thousands, even millions of dollars, being bestowed on government officials and millions of dollars in defense contracts flowing back in the other direction.”

Kenneth J. Hines, special agent in charge of IRS' Criminal Investigation unit, said Wilkes and Foggo went to great lengths to circumvent the law to personally enrich themselves and that this kind of behavior will not be tolerated.

“There's no doubt that the victims in the case truly are the American taxpayer and the money that is lost with this deceptive practice,” he said.

Stewart Roberts, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's San Diego office, said that “although the perpetrators of these types of crimes involved in corruption may believe that their self dealing is a victimless event, we know that these types of crimes do have victims.”

“The American public has a right to expect that their public officials and the contractors they enlist to do the government's work, will be acting with the best interest of the public in mind and not just their best interest in mind,” Roberts said.

Wilkes and Foggo are expected to surrender at an arraignment in federal court Wednesday.

Foggo quit his post as No. 3 at the CIA after his office was raided by San Diego-based federal agents.

Wilkes was a big contributor to Republican lawmakers who developed a series of businesses that specialized in landing federal contracts, with ADCS as his flagship.

ADCS received more than $100 million in government contracts between 1995 and 2005, partly with the help of Cunningham, who sat on the influential House Appropriations Committee.

Wilkes and Foggo have been friends for years, back to when they both attended Hilltop High School in Chula Vista and San Diego State University.

Cunningham, a Republican who represented much of San Diego's North County in Congress for 15 years, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and tax evasion charges in November 2005 and was sentenced last March to eight years and four months in federal prison.

He is now in a minimum-security work camp in Tucson.

As part of his criminal case, Cunningham admitted accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes and, in exchange, routing contracts worth millions of contracts to businesses that were controlled by Wilkes and another businessman, Mitchell Wade.

Wade once worked for Wilkes, then became his business rival with a company that obtained more than $100 million in contracts while Wade was plying Cunningham with cash, trips and fine furniture, according to court records.

Wade has pleaded guilty to conspiracy and is awaiting his sentencing.

2 Charged In Cunningham Bribe Case (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

SAN DIEGO — A defense contractor and a former top-ranking CIA official were indicted Tuesday on corruption charges in a case that also involved bribes to disgraced ex-congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Brent R. Wilkes was charged with bribing Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) and Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo to get contracts for his San Diego companies. Until he resigned in May amid a federal investigation, Foggo was the CIA's third highest-ranking official, directing the spy agency's daily operations.

Wilkes, according to the indictment, provided Cunningham with prostitutes, vacations, corporate jet travel, limousine service, cash, meals, furniture and equipment for his boat. The value of the alleged bribes was put at $700,000.

The contractor reportedly provided Foggo, a childhood friend, with meals, gifts, private jet flights, a helicopter ride and a weeklong stay at a Scottish castle valued at $44,000. Wilkes also paid for Foggo to join him on Hawaiian vacations, the indictment said.

Officials said that Wilkes and Foggo, both 52, were expected to surrender today for arraignment.

Cunningham, who resigned from office after pleading guilty to corruption charges, is serving an eight-year prison term. He admitted to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and others and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

"High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment," U.S. Atty. Carol Lam said in announcing the indictment. "The public trust is not for sale."

She declined to say whether Cunningham provided information to the grand jury.

Except for a contract to provide water for U.S. personnel in the Middle East, the indictment does not detail exactly what kind of contracts Foggo and Cunningham allegedly pressured the Defense Department and CIA into awarding to Wilkes' companies.

In Washington, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden sent an e-mail asking agency employees not to publicly comment on the case to protect classified information and CIA contacts.

Hayden said that the allegations against Foggo first surfaced within the CIA and that the agency's inspector general launched an investigation that later became linked to the San Diego probe.

If convicted of all counts, Wilkes and Foggo could face prison sentences in the "hundreds of months," prosecutors said.

The indictment also seeks to force Wilkes to return $12 million to the federal government.

Foggo allegedly used his CIA position to pressure subordinates into awarding the contracts and to hide Wilkes' financial interest in certain ventures. In turn, Wilkes promised to hire Foggo when he retired from the CIA, the indictment says.

Prosecutors allege that Foggo and Cunningham helped Wilkes obtain more than $100 million in contracts. Cunningham, a retired Navy fighter pilot, was a member of House committees that dealt with the defense budget.

The indictment included e-mails from Foggo to Wilkes — including one from May 14, 2003, in which the CIA official seemed to be assuring his friend that he was close to landing him some lucrative contracts.

"I have been throwing millions at his company [a CIA contractor] for about 18 months — and I'm thinking we should be able to leverage some Wilkes Group contacts."

Former Top CIA Official Indicted (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131877

The CIA's former executive director and a defense contractor were indicted yesterday by a San Diego grand jury for allegedly corrupting the intelligence agency's contracts, marking one of the first criminal cases to reach into the CIA's clandestine operations in Europe and the Middle East.

Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, a longtime logistics officer who was the CIA's top administrator from November 2004 until last May, was accused of using his seniority and influence at a prior CIA job in Europe to steer business deals to his longtime friend Brent R. Wilkes, a California businessman and top Republican fundraiser.

The 11-count indictment states that Wilkes subsidized meals and lavish vacations for Foggo and his family in Washington, Hawaii and Scotland and promised to employ Foggo after his retirement from the CIA. It also accuses Foggo -- a former ethics official in two divisions at the CIA -- of improperly providing classified information to Wilkes about the CIA, his contracting competitors and "other matters."

The indictment is the latest development in a lengthy federal criminal probe into the dark side of a budget process known as "earmarking," in which lawmakers have directed federal contracts to favored designees who were either friends or campaign contributors. Last year the probe led to a prison sentence for one lawmaker, Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- who, the government said yesterday, used two prostitutes financed by Wilkes.

While the probe has threatened to sweep in other members of Congress, some uncertainty surrounds it. A key U.S. attorney involved in it -- Carol C. Lam in San Diego -- has been fired by the administration for unspecified "performance-related" deficiencies along with a handful of other federal prosecutors. Lam oversaw the Foggo investigation and is to leave Thursday. The head of the local FBI field office praised Lam's performance and said her firing appeared to be "political," an accusation that the Justice Department has denied.

The case involving Foggo is unusual because all of the contracts at issue are classified. But the indictment makes it clear that the agency was allegedly bilked when it wound up paying 60 percent more than it should have for water supplied by a company affiliated with Wilkes to CIA outposts in Afghanistan and northern Iraq.

The evidence against Foggo included e-mails in which he promised to introduce a Wilkes subordinate to his CIA colleagues and helped arrange advance payments on a $1.69 million contract. Even after arriving at CIA headquarters as a top appointee of then-Director Porter J. Goss, he continued to press for more rapid payments to a Wilkes-affiliated firm identified in the indictment as "Shell Company No. 1," earning Wilkes's thanks, the document states.

It formally charges the two men -- who witnesses have said periodically played poker with lawmakers and others in a rented suite at the Watergate Hotel -- with conspiracy to commit honest services fraud and money laundering.

Foggo's attorney, Mark MacDougall, said through an aide yesterday that he had no comment on the indictment. A lawyer previously retained by Foggo, William G. Hundley, had argued that Foggo had no idea the contracts were benefiting Wilkes, but the indictment says that Foggo deliberately "concealed material facts" from his colleagues at the CIA and used "shell companies and straw men" to hide their role in the contracts.

Wilkes's attorney, Mark J. Geragos, called the indictment "unfortunate" and said "we welcome the chance to refute these accusations." He declined to elaborate.

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden, who replaced Goss last May, told employees in a memo yesterday that they should not talk about the matter "out of respect for the legal proceedings that are underway, and to ensure the protection of classified information and agency equities." Hayden noted that the allegations against Foggo first surfaced inside the CIA, which he said cooperated closely with the Justice Department on the probe.

Additional legal troubles yesterday enveloped Wilkes, a Republican Party "Pioneer" who raised more than $100,000 for President Bush's reelection in 2004 and donated -- in concert with his business colleagues -- $656,396 to 64 other Republican lawmakers and the national Republican Party committees in Washington from 1995 through the third quarter of 2005.

A second 25-count indictment disclosed yesterday in San Diego alleges that Wilkes separately obtained a stream of Defense Department contracts from 1996 to 2004 by providing then-Rep. Cunningham with cash and other bribes valued at more than $700,000.

Cunningham pleaded guilty in 2005 to taking bribes worth more than $1 million from Mitchell Wade, a business associate of Wilkes, and drew an eight-year prison sentence. But the second Wilkes indictment contains new details of how Wade and

Wilkes allegedly worked together to profit from contracts and how Cunningham -- sitting on the Appropriations defense subcommittee -- browbeat defense officials on their behalf.

It said that Wilkes paid a company called Shirlington Limousine to chauffeur Cunningham around Washington. He also allegedly financed lavish meals and vacations for Cunningham, flew him around on the company jet, bought him tickets to the Super Bowl, and paid for two prostitutes for the lawmaker on Aug. 15 and 16, 2003, at the Hapuna Beach Prince Hotel in Hawaii.

"Pursuant to Cunningham's request," the indictment states, "Wilkes arranged for the Congressman to get a different prostitute for the second evening."

CIA Ex-Officer, Contractor Indicted In Corruption Probe (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

A federal grand jury indicted a former senior official of the Central Intelligence Agency and a defense contractor, raising the stakes in the investigation of corrupt federal contracting for the Bush administration and several lawmakers.

Two indictments were returned by a federal grand jury in San Diego. One accused Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's former third-ranking official, and defense contractor Brent Wilkes, a close friend of his, of committing conspiracy and other charges stemming from CIA contracts that Mr. Foggo allegedly arranged for Mr. Wilkes. The other indictment charged Mr. Wilkes and another businessman with paying bribes to former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. Mr. Cunningham pleaded guilty in November 2005 to soliciting bribes from Mr. Wilkes and others and is serving a federal prison sentence.

The indictments indicate the prosecution of corruption in federal contracting is in full swing, despite the recent dismissal of at least one federal prosecutor involved in the inquiries.

The indictments also represent something of an embarrassment to the Bush White House, which helped put Mr. Foggo in his senior CIA position. President Bush chose former Rep. Porter Goss to be CIA director in 2004, and Mr. Goss, in turn, plucked Mr. Foggo from his position as a midlevel CIA manager to be the agency's executive director, in charge of day-to-day operations.

The indictment alleges that Mr. Foggo had secretly steered contracts to Mr. Wilkes, who used "shell companies" and "straw men" to profit from the contracts. Mr. Foggo allegedly failed to disclose the relationship and involvement with the contracts to the CIA, according to the indictments. Mr. Foggo is accused of accepting from Mr. Wilkes -- and not disclosing -- expensive gifts, including vacations in Hawaii and Scotland, meals and cigars. Mr. Wilkes also allegedly promised Mr. Foggo a high-paying job with one of his companies once Mr. Foggo left the CIA.

One of the main contracts involved providing water to CIA personnel in the Middle East. Mr. Foggo allegedly pressured a businessman, not named in the indictment, who already had CIA contracts, to take Mr. Wilkes's companies on as subcontractors.

Mark Geragos, Mr. Wilkes's lawyer, said the indictment pins down publicly the charges he faces and means "we will finally be able to confront them head on in the courtroom."

Mr. Foggo's lawyer, Mark MacDougall, didn't return several phone calls seeking comment. In the past, Mr. MacDougall has said that Mr. Foggo committed no crime.

The indictments come two days before U.S. attorney Carol Lam is to leave office in San Diego. Ms. Lam recently pressed for the indictments to be returned before she steps down. In an unusual move during the middle of a president's term, the Bush administration recently demanded her resignation and those of at least six other U.S. attorneys around the country. Congressional Democrats have charged that the changes were motivated by politics and may interfere with pending investigations. The Justice Department has denied any intent to interfere with investigations.

Mr. Goss left the CIA in May, under pressure from the White House, and Mr. Foggo quickly followed. Federal agents last year searched Mr. Foggo's CIA office and home.

In a written statement, CIA Inspector General John Helgerson said his office had participated in the investigation.

The indictment of Mr. Wilkes for allegedly bribing Mr. Cunningham says he funneled $700,000 in bribes to the lawmaker in exchange for Mr. Cunningham's help in obtaining $100 million in government contracts. It also alleges that Mr. Wilkes in 2003 rented a $6,600-per-night suite in a Hawaiian hotel, with Mr. Cunningham and an unnamed individual as guests. It charges that on two successive nights Mr. Wilkes paid for the use of three prostitutes in the suite by Mr. Cunningham and himself. The Wall Street Journal had reported in 2006 that Mr. Wilkes was under investigation for providing Mr. Cunningham with prostitutes.

The indictment and its details would seem to heighten the risk to other members of Congress still under investigation; Mr. Wilkes also had dealings with several of them.

A separate federal criminal investigation of Rep. Jerry Lewis, the California Republican who until January 2006 was chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, is continuing in Los Angeles. Prosecutors in that case are looking at Mr. Lewis's relationship with Mr. Wilkes, which included campaign contributions from Mr. Wilkes and associates and the hiring by Mr. Wilkes of a lobbying firm founded by one of Mr. Lewis's closest friends, former Rep. Bill Lowery.

Messrs. Lewis and Lowery have denied wrongdoing. The indictment has only passing references to other lawmakers, none of whom it names, and doesn't make any allegations against them.

Wilkes Indicted For Illegal Gifts (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

With just two days remaining in her tenure, San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam on Tuesday announced the indictment of a key figure in the probe of ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), signaling that the wide-ranging investigation continues and could yet ensnare other high-profile targets.

Lam charged California defense contractor Brent Wilkes with providing Cunningham with more than $700,000 in varied gifts from 1996 through 2005 in exchange for help in securing federal contracts. The bribes included personal checks, corporate jet travel, meals, the purchase of a yacht, and an August 2003 Hawaiian vacation in which the Congressman allegedly enjoyed two nights of prostitution services at the Hapuna Beach Prince Hotel.

Wilkes firm, ADCS, which converted electronic military documents to paper form, allegedly received more than $100 million in federal contracts with Cunningham's help. Cunningham sat on the Appropriations and Intelligence committees during that time, and his prodding of Defense Department officials is detailed in the indictment.

Named as a co-conspirator in the Wilkes indictment, Cunningham pleaded guilty in November 2005 to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors in exchange for official acts. He currently is serving a sentence of more than eight years in prison.

Mitchell Wade, the former president of MZM Inc., also is named as a co-conspirator. Wade pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and is awaiting sentencing.

Simultaneously on Tuesday, Lam announced the indictment by a federal grand jury of Wilkes and Dusty Foggo, a former CIA executive director and childhood friend of Wilkes. In this second indictment, Foggo was charged with using his influence and position in the CIA to award contracts to Wilkes' companies.

Lam secured the indictments two days before she is slated to leave office after being fired by the Bush administration in December along with six other U.S. attorneys, causing Democrats to charge their firings were improper and political. Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty is slated to brief Judiciary Committee Senators today in a closed-door session on the prosecutors' personnel records.

"High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment," Lam said in a statement. "The public trust is not for sale."

The indictment of Wilkes, in particular, could cause a headache for one other California Congressman: Rep. Jerry Lewis (R), the ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee.

The Wall Street Journal recently reported that the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles was investigating whether Lewis improperly steered federal contracts or earmarks to some of Wilkes' companies.

The prosecutors are probing Lewis' relationship with the lobbying firm of ex-Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), which was once called Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White. One of Wilkes' defense firms, ADCS, was a former client of the lobbying firm.

Lewis is not mentioned in the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0131880

The 42-page indictment of Wilkes is wide-ranging and charges a variety of criminal activities. It also names John Michael Thomas, the president and part owner of New York-based mortgage company Coastal Capital Corp., with helping Cunningham obtain a fraudulent mortgage.

Lam lays out 150 examples of Wilkes, Wade and other co-conspirators providing gifts to Cunningham, or instances of Cunningham soliciting official actions on their behalf.

They include: the purchase by Wilkes' company on July 30, 1997, of a "yellow Sea-Doo Speedster" boat at a cost of $11,255; an $821 flight to Las Vegas paid for by Wilkes for Cunningham and his chief of staff on Dec. 18, 1999, and their hotel stay there; an "inflatable jet dock" for Cunningham's boat provided by Wilkes on Sept. 13, 1999, at a cost of $7,101.16; and April 20, 2000, tickets to a Jimmy Buffet concert in Chula Vista, Calif.

Also given to the former House Member by Wilkes, according to the indictment, were two personal checks in the amounts of $70,000 and $30,000 on May 1, 2000, and an in-flight meal consisting of a "cold seafood platter, grilled chicken or filet mignon, a side salad and six bottles of Silver Oak chardonnay" on Feb, 26, 2001. On March 13, 2001, Wilkes allegedly directed an ADCS employee to install a GPS system on Cunningham's boat.

Also noteworthy were charges that Wilkes provided Cunningham with two nights with prostitutes and a $6,600 Hawaiian hotel suite in August 2003.

2 Indicted In Cunningham Corruption Inquiry (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

A former top CIA official and his longtime friend, a leading defense contractor, were indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury in San Diego on fraud and conspiracy charges in a corruption investigation that sent former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison for eight years.

Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's executive director, or No. 3 official, until his resignation in May, and San Diego contractor Brent R. Wilkes, both 52, were named in a multimillion-dollar scheme to supply bottled water and first-aid supplies to CIA operatives in Iraq.

Mr. Foggo, according to an 11-count indictment, was accused of accepting lavish vacations, helicopter rides and private jet flights from Mr. Wilkes as part of the conspiracy. He was charged with fraud, conspiracy and money laundering.

Mr. Wilkes was named in a separate 25-count indictment, charged with conspiracy, bribery, money laundering and unlawful monetary transactions to Cunningham in return for government contracts. The indictment included three counts of laundering more than $12 million.

According to the indictment, Mr. Foggo arranged for one of Mr. Wilkes' companies to be a middleman in selling bottled water to the CIA. In December 2003, it says, Mr. Wilkes introduced Mr. Foggo at a party at Mr. Wilkes' headquarters in Poway, Calif., as a future executive.

It also said Mr. Wilkes paid $32,000 for Mr. Foggo to join him on a vacation to Hawaii in December 2003 and January 2004.

Mr. Foggo, who announced his resignation within days of his CIA office and his Vienna, Va., home being searched by federal agents, had been the focus of an investigation by the FBI, the CIA's Office of Inspector General, the Internal Revenue Service and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service. His ties were questioned to Mr. Wilkes, who was named as a co-conspirator but not charged in the Cunningham case.

Cunningham pleaded guilty in November to taking $2.4 million in bribes in return for federal contracts and was sentenced to eight years in prison.

Mr. Foggo was named to his post in November 2004 by CIA Director Porter J. Goss. He oversaw the agency's day-to-day operations. He had been an undercover operative for more than 20 years in postings in Honduras, Austria and Germany.

In the Cunningham case, court documents said an unindicted co-conspirator gave the former congressman $525,000 in bribes in return for $6 million in government contracts. The co-conspirator has been identified as Mr. Wilkes.

DOJ_NMG_0131881

Investigators focused on Mr. Foggo's role in the award of a $2.4 million contract to Mr. Wilkes to provide water, first-aid supplies and household items to CIA agents operating in war zones, including Afghanistan and Iraq.

Cunningham, an eight-term congressman and former Navy "top gun" pilot, pleaded guilty to accepting bribes to help a Washington-based defense contractor get business. He admitted to charges of mail fraud, wire fraud and income tax evasion, also acknowledging he underreported his income in 2004.

Former CIA No. 3 Indicted For Steering Contracts To Friend (CNN)

By From Kelli Arena And Terry Frieden, Cnn Washington Bureau

CNN.com, February 14, 2007

SAN DIEGO, California (CNN) -- The CIA's former third-ranking official and a California defense contractor have been indicted on corruption charges in the same bribery probe that sent former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday.

Kyle "Dusty" Foggo quit his post as the CIA's executive director in May 2006 after prosecutors began looking into his ties with longtime friend Brent Wilkes.

On Tuesday, prosecutors alleged that Foggo, in exchange for lavish gifts, pressured subordinates to award water and procurement services contracts to Wilkes and his company, ADCS Inc.

"Among the gifts that are provided are these lavish overseas gifts, including a $44,000, one-week stay at a Scottish castle," Assistant U.S. Attorney Sanjay Bhandari said. "Beyond that, there's a pattern of promises of future gifts -- a job at Wilkes' company."

The indictment alleges Wilkes paid for private jets, limousines, antiques and prostitutes for Cunningham.

Wilkes has been charged with bribery, conspiracy, money laundering, wire fraud and depriving taxpayers of honest services in a 35-count indictment. In addition to counts relating to Foggo, he is accused of bribing Cunningham -- now serving an eight-year prison term -- to the tune of $700,000 to get the congressman to steer government contracts his way.

Foggo faces an 11-count indictment charging him with conspiracy, wire fraud, depriving taxpayers of honest services, conflict of interest and money laundering. He "affirmatively hid" the gifts from his superiors at the CIA before his resignation, U.S. Attorney Carol Lam told reporters.

"These two indictments describe patterns of self-dealing and corruption that spanned years and reached deep into our country's system of procurement for the defense industry," Lam said.

Efforts to contact lawyers for Wilkes and Foggo were unsuccessful Tuesday evening. Lam said the two men are expected to surrender Wednesday morning.

Prosecutors will also try to reclaim $12 million in profits they say Wilkes received as a result of the schemes, Lam said.

A third man, New York mortgage banker John Michael, was charged with obstruction of justice. Prosecutors said he lied to a grand jury about Wilkes' role in paying off a half-million-dollar second mortgage on Cunningham's home.

The indictments stem from an ongoing corruption probe of Cunningham, a decorated Navy veteran who held seats on the House Intelligence Committee and the appropriations subcommittee that oversaw Pentagon spending. The Republican pled guilty in November 2005 to accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractor Mitchell Wade.

Wade has been cooperating with prosecutors. Lam would not say whether Cunningham would testify during trials for Foggo or Wilkes.

Foggo was named to the executive director's post, which runs the spy agency's day-to-day operations, by then-Director Porter Goss. He resigned a week after Goss was forced out by widespread criticism of his management, and federal agents raided Foggo's home days later.

Goss has not been accused of wrongdoing in the case. His replacement, Michael Hayden, said Tuesday that the CIA has cooperated with the investigation, and "that cooperation continues today."

Wilkes' indictment states that the contractor paid for Cunningham's limousine travel around Washington; bought a $14,000 speedboat and a $1,500 laptop computer for the congressman; and flew him to and from his San Diego, California, district to Washington on a private jet.

DOJ_NMG_0131882

The indictment also accuses Wilkes of picking up the tab for all or part of Cunningham's outings to Idaho; the Florida Keys; Palm Springs, California; and Hawaii, where the document states Wilkes had an employee line up prostitutes for him and the congressman on two consecutive nights.

In October, a House Intelligence Committee report concluded that Cunningham used his committee seats to steer more than $70 million in federal contracts to Wilkes and Wade before his indictment. Lam, who is being replaced as San Diego's U.S. attorney, subpoenaed records from three House committees in December.

Lam's removal is one of several that raised eyebrows on Capitol Hill, where Senate Democrats questioned the Justice Department's motives for replacing several federal prosecutors with interim appointees who don't have to face Senate confirmation.

But in a January hearing before a Senate committee, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said there was nothing sinister about the shakeup, which he called "a sign of good management."

Lam did not address the controversy during her news conference Tuesday, but said she did not speed up the investigation in order to bring charges against Wilkes and Foggo before leaving office.

CNN's Paul Vercammen contributed to this report.

Ex CIA Number-three Indicted For Fraud In Corruption Probe (AFP)

AFP, February 14, 2007

The former number-three official in the CIA and a defense contractor were indicted in a corruption probe that led to the jailing of a prominent US lawmaker.

Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the CIA's Executive Director until his resignation last year, and San Diego contractor Brent Wilkes were both charged with fraud in connection with the investigation into former representative Randall "Duke" Cunningham.

A statement from the Department of Justice said Wilkes had been indicted for providing more than 700,000 dollars to Cunningham in exchange for the politician's help in winning lucrative government defense contracts.

Cunningham, a decorated Vietnam war fighter pilot and a member of the House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, was jailed for eight years in March last year after admitting taking bribes.

According to a justice department statement, Wilkes showered Cunningham with "cash, checks, meals, limousine service, corporate jet travel, lodging, furnishings, boats, prostitution services, vacations and entertainment."

In return for the bribes, the indictment alleged that Cunningham used his public office to influence the awarding of more than 100 million dollars' worth of defense contracts to Wilkes.

Foggo and Wilkes were both charged in a second indictment of conspiring to defraud the United States.

The indictment alleges that Foggo used his seniority within the CIA to influence the awarding of contracts to Wilkes, a life-long friend.

The charges allege that Foggo and Wilkes created shell companies to launder the proceeds of their scheme.

The indictments allege Foggo concealed his knowledge and the involvement of Wilkes in several deals as well as his receipt of "tens of thousands of dollars'" worth of meals, gifts, and vacations.

Foggo also failed to disclose the offer of a "senior executive position with Wilkes's company, ADCS, Inc."

"High government positions and powerful connections should not be tickets to corrupt self-enrichment," US Attorney Carol Lam said in a statement. "The public trust is not for sale."

The investigation is continuing.

Libby Needs New Headliner In Leak Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

Long Island Newsday, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby needs a new star witness.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, had been portrayed in court documents for months as his own best defense against perjury and obstruction charges in the CIA leak trial.

DOJ_NMG_0131883

He was going to testify that he never lied to investigators. He would explain that he was so focused on national security issues, he simply forgot details about his conversations regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Defense attorney Theodore Wells reversed course Tuesday and said Libby won't take the stand after all. Cheney, the other big-name Bush administration official on Libby's potential witness list, also won't testify, Wells said.

That spares the defense team two dangerous bouts with cross-examination. But it also forces Libby to look elsewhere for someone to make the memory defense for him.

John Hannah, who served as Libby's deputy and replaced him as Cheney's national security adviser, helped in that effort Tuesday. He described Libby as someone responsible for the nation's most sensitive intelligence but whose memory was notoriously spotty.

Libby also wants three CIA briefers to testify Wednesday about the classified national security briefings he received each morning in mid-2003.

"Mr. Hannah gave the overview and that was significant. We needed that," attorney John Cline said in court. "But the briefers will give the specifics, the real day-to-day intelligence."

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said the briefings could be used as evidence, but that was when Libby was going to testify about how that intelligence weighed on his mind. Now, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says that testimony shouldn't be allowed.

Without Libby's testimony, jurors won't know how important Libby viewed the classified briefings, Fitzgerald said. Fitzgerald argues that Libby was consumed with debunking war criticism by former Ambassador Joseph Wilson and told reporters that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA.

Libby was not the source for Robert Novak's column that outed Plame and triggered an FBI investigation. But prosecutors said Libby feared repercussions because he did discuss Plame with reporters. Fearing his job and reputation were at stake, Libby lied to investigators about those conversations, Fitzgerald contends.

Most of the defense witnesses were reporters who said they talked to Libby around the same time Plame's name was being leaked. All said Libby did not talk about Plame to them. If Libby wanted to out her, defense attorneys argue, why wouldn't he take the opportunity with some of the nation's most well-known journalists?

Walton said he will decide Wednesday whether to let the CIA briefers testify. Defense attorneys said they plan to rest their case Wednesday. Closing arguments are expected early next week.

Libby Defense To Rest Without Testimony By Him Or Cheney (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said yesterday that he and Vice President Cheney, his former boss, will not testify in Libby's perjury trial, leaving the defense preparing to rest its case today after barely more than two days of testimony.

The defense's announcement in court, partway through the fifth week of the celebrated trial of the vice president's former chief of staff, represented an abrupt shift from the witness strategy that Libby's lawyers laid out in hearings and court papers during the months leading up to the trial.

The defense's central theory is that Libby suffered from a notoriously bad memory and misspoke to investigators about his role in the Bush administration's disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame. The decision to foreshorten the case means that jurors will hear little testimony and see scant evidence to back that contention. Yesterday, John Hannah, a former deputy to Libby for national security matters, provided the sole support for the idea, testifying that "on certain things, Scooter just had an awful memory."

The decision also means that the defense will not call any witnesses to explicitly buttress a dramatic assertion by lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. in his opening statement to the jury: that Libby was scapegoated by his White House colleagues when the leak investigation began.

Outside legal specialists said that Libby's attorneys appear to have concluded that the risks of exposing the defendant and the vice president to cross-examination on the witness stand outweighed the benefits they could provide in establishing Libby's innocence. Cheney would have been the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal trial in at least a century.

"You can't control how things are going to go," said Randall Eliason, a former chief prosecutor of white-collar crimes for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington. Eliason said that Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald could have grilled Libby about any conflicting statements he had made.

Eliason and Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor, said that Libby's defense team is experienced and must be confident that it has established reasonable doubt in cross-examination of prosecution witnesses. In closing arguments, they predicted, defense lawyers may remind jurors about holes they poked in other witnesses' accounts -- and what they may portray as a lack of clear evidence that Libby deliberately lied.

"It's a pretty tepid defense that's been mounted, and I wouldn't even say mounted," Tobias said. "There was all this information to suggest the defense was going to put on more of a defense than we saw."

Libby's attorneys did not publicly explain why they decided that the two men should not testify. For the past several days, however, they had been laying groundwork for a possible change in course, filing court papers and repeatedly asking U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to permit them to preserve the faulty-memory defense even if they chose not to call Libby as a witness.

Yesterday afternoon, just before the jury was excused for the day early because of an approaching winter storm, Wells told Walton that the defense team had just decided that it would "release" Cheney as a possible witness.

Wells also said that he and Libby's defense team had just recommended to Libby that he not testify on his own behalf. After conferring with his wife, also a lawyer, Libby accepted his counsel's advice, Wells said.

Walton then asked Libby whether he was certain that he wanted to forgo his right to testify. "Yes, sir," he replied in a quiet, steady voice, speaking in court for the first time since his trial began.

Libby is charged with five felonies: two counts of making false statements to FBI agents, two counts of perjury before a grand jury and one count of obstructing the CIA leak investigation. He is not charged with the leak itself.

Prosecutors contend that Libby lied to obscure the fact that he had improperly shared classified information with reporters as he played a key role in an effort by the Bush administration to discredit Plame's husband. The CIA officer is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was sent to Niger by the CIA in 2002 to explore reports that Iraq had sought to buy nuclear material there. He concluded that the reports were not true.

Early in the summer of 2003, Wilson wrote a stinging critique of President Bush and the Iraq war, accusing the White House of twisting his conclusions to justify the invasion. Prosecutors contend that Libby told several reporters that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA to suggest that he had been sent on the mission as a result of nepotism, not because of his expertise.

The defense counters that when Libby met with FBI agents and grand jurors, he innocently misremembered his conversations with journalists, because they were insignificant amid his pressing work on national security matters.

Since shortly after Libby's October 2005 indictment, friends and political allies have raised at least $3.5 million to defend him, said a source close to Libby who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the fund is private.

The other defense witnesses to appear so far were a former State Department official and seven journalists. Six of the reporters testified Monday that Libby had not told them about Plame.

Yesterday, Hannah, now the vice president's national security adviser, highlighted points that Cheney and Libby might have offered if they had testified. Hannah said that Libby essentially had two full-time jobs and, under questioning by defense attorney John Cline, gave the jury a tour of complex and sensitive foreign-policy issues in which Libby was immersed from May 2003 to March 2004. That period is significant, because it began when Cheney first told Libby about Plame and ended with his appearances before the grand jury investigating the leak of her identity.

Like Libby, Cheney faced the possibility of awkward questions from prosecutors had he appeared as a witness. Several prosecutors -- and Libby himself in his grand jury testimony -- have portrayed Cheney as deeply involved in the White House effort to discredit Wilson. Jurors have heard audiotape of Libby telling the grand jury that he and Cheney may have discussed whether to mention Plame to reporters but that he was not certain.

From the start, the defense repeatedly said that Libby and Cheney probably would take the stand. Potential jurors were asked their opinion of Cheney, and those with strongly negative views of him were not chosen. Before the trial, defense lawyers had told Walton that Libby would testify, and that persuaded the judge to let the defense note during the trial the crush of national security issues Libby was handling.

At various points in the trial, defense attorneys indicated that they might call as witnesses several other people they later decided to abandon. They include Karl Rove, the White House senior adviser; Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president; Jack Eckenrode, the former FBI agent in charge of the case; Colin L. Powell, former secretary of state; and Eric Edelman, Libby's former deputy.

After announcing that Libby and Cheney would not testify, defense attorneys said their last witnesses today would be CIA employees who regularly briefed Libby about national security matters and could amplify Hannah's testimony about the world crises Libby was juggling around the time of the CIA leak. Prosecutors are seeking to block the briefers' testimony.

Libby, Cheney Will Stay Off The Stand (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Abruptly reversing course, lawyers for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby announced Tuesday that neither the defendant nor Vice President Dick Cheney would testify at Libby's trial on charges of lying to federal investigators — a high-wire maneuver that drastically reduces the opportunity for presenting defense evidence and means the case will go to the jury early next week.

In a surprise disclosure in federal court, Libby's lawyer Theodore Wells Jr. said that he would finish his defense today, after three days of testimony.

The decision not to call Libby or his former boss, Cheney, deprives the trial of its most widely anticipated witnesses. It also rules out any major effort to buttress a key element of Libby's defense: that any misstatements he made to federal agents probing a leak of classified information sprang from his preoccupation with major policy matters, not from a desire to mislead.

The move apparently reflects a decision by Libby's legal team that exposing Cheney and his former chief of staff to crossexamination could do more harm than good.

Both men were facing difficult questions about their leading role — disclosed in new and graphic detail during the trial — in a White House campaign in summer 2003 to strike back at a critic of the Bush administration's rationale for invading Iraq.

The war critic was Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former U.S. diplomat who publicly challenged White House claims that then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had tried to obtain nuclear material from the West African nation of Niger. Wilson based his attack on a government-ordered fact-finding trip he had made to Africa, during which he concluded no such attempt had been made.

In hoping to discredit Wilson, government officials leaked to several reporters the fact that Wilson's wife was CIA operative Valerie Plame. The officials sought to suggest Plame had arranged Wilson's trip as a boondoggle.

Wells told the court Tuesday that he informed a lawyer for Cheney over the lunch hour that he would not be calling the vice president, who had been scheduled to testify Thursday.

At the same time, Wells disclosed that he had advised Libby that he did not believe his client should testify and that, after consulting his wife, Libby "has indicated to us that it is his intention to follow our advice."

"We will rest his case tomorrow," Wells said Tuesday.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton briefly quizzed the defendant about the decision, and Libby acknowledged that he understood he had a right to testify.

Walton set closing arguments for Tuesday. After that, the 12-person jury will deliberate on the fate of the former vice presidential aide, the highest administration official prosecuted in more than a decade.

Wells and other members of the defense team had indicated for months that both Libby and Cheney would take the stand and play an important part in the courtroom drama.

The decision for Libby not to testify could be risky. His defense against perjury charges has been that he had memory lapses stemming from a proliferation of official duties.

DOJ_NMG_0131886

Although jurors are customarily told not to hold it against defendants who choose not to testify, Libby's decision not to take the stand may leave a question in some jurors' minds about why he did not present his version of events.

But his lawyers apparently concluded that a potentially embarrassing cross-examination would be more damaging than what support either Libby or Cheney could add to the defense.

"I think they made a strategic decision that the downside of an extensive defense case far outweighed the upside," said Dan Richman, a professor at Fordham law school and a former federal prosecutor.

Other parts of Libby's case also appeared to be problematic, Richman said, including a claim by Wells during his opening statement last month that Libby thought the White House was attempting to make him a scapegoat.

"The idea that he is someone who really can easily be victimized by powerful people is a little bit belied by the centrality of his role in the administration that the testimony revealed," Richman said.

Libby was the only person charged in connection with a three-year federal probe into how the identity of Plame, a CIA arms-proliferation analyst, became public in July 2003. Plame was first identified by syndicated newspaper columnist Robert Novak eight days after her husband published an opinion piece in the New York Times that criticized the administration for twisting prewar intelligence in Iraq.

Several administration figures — including former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, White House political strategist Karl Rove, and former presidential spokesman Ari Fleischer — have acknowledged speaking with reporters about Wilson's wife, although they were not charged with crimes.

Libby was charged with perjury and obstruction of justice for essentially attempting to cover his tracks after he allegedly leaked information about Wilson's wife to reporters.

The government called 10 witnesses, including former officials with the State Department and CIA who testified that they had given information to Libby about Wilson's wife sooner than Libby told investigators he had learned about her.

The government also called two journalists to testify that, contrary to his statements, Libby leaked them information about Wilson's wife. A third journalist, NBC's "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert, rebutted a separate claim that Libby was making that it was Russert who had first disclosed information to him about Plame.

The defense has tried to poke holes in the prosecution's case by raising questions about the credibility of government witnesses, including some who were revealed to have had trouble recalling key events.

On Monday, Libby's lawyers called a half-dozen well-known journalists, including Washington Post editor Bob Woodward of Watergate fame. They all declared that — though they talked with Libby around the time Plame was exposed — he did not disclose her identity to them.

On Tuesday, Libby's former right-hand man, John Hannah, testified that Libby had "an awful memory," evidence that could buttress his busy-man defense.

"He was good at remembering ideas and concepts and arguments, and very bad in figuring out where those arguments may have come from," Hannah testified. On occasions "too many to count," the aide said, Libby would claim credit for an idea that Hannah had submitted to him just hours before.

Hannah, who succeeded Libby as Cheney's national security advisor, also testified that Libby was constantly immersed in high-level and high-stakes issues — including the war in Iraq, nuclear proliferation in Iran, and potential terrorist attacks in the U.S.

But Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald got Hannah to admit that Libby was not too busy in the summer of 2003 to take time out to track the doings of Wilson.

The defense decision not to call Libby appeared to harden feelings a bit with the prosecution team.

Before the trial, the government had given Libby and his lawyers extensive access to summaries of classified information that Libby had seen while working for Cheney and had said were crucial to defending himself.

Fitzgerald said the information was given with the understanding that it would be used exclusively by Libby while he testified to show the size and sensitive nature of his workload.

Tuesday, after defense lawyers said that Libby would not testify but that they planned to introduce some of that information during the testimony of three CIA employees today, Fitzgerald objected.

DOJ_NMG_0131887

He accused the defense of engineering "a bait-and-switch." Walton deferred a ruling.

Libby And Cheney Will Not Testify, Says The Defense (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And Scott Shane

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — Lawyers defending I. Lewis Libby Jr. against perjury charges surprised the courtroom on Tuesday by saying that they would rest their case this week and do so without putting on the stand either Mr. Libby or Vice President Dick Cheney.

Mr. Libby was Mr. Cheney's chief of staff.

The decision means that Mr. Libby's defense, which will formally end on Wednesday, will have spanned barely three days. Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., told Judge Reggie B. Walton that Mr. Libby had accepted the defense team's recommendation to end their presentation swiftly and send the case to the jury by next week.

The decision could be viewed as a sign that Mr. Libby's lawyers are confident that the prosecution failed to make its case.

Mr. Wells had earlier signaled strongly that he intended to call Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney to testify, which suggests that the defense team recently analyzed the costs and benefits of putting them on the stand and concluded that their testimony would not, on balance, help Mr. Libby.

One likely factor in that calculation is that putting Mr. Libby on the stand would expose him to a cross-examination by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, that could be withering. Mr. Fitzgerald complained that the defense had engaged in a "bait and switch" tactic by keeping Mr. Libby off the stand after repeatedly suggesting that he would testify.

Mr. Cheney's testimony, which was much anticipated, would have set a precedent as the first appearance of a sitting vice president as a witness at a criminal trial. It was also expected to bolster a major part of Mr. Libby's defense: that he was so consumed by the crush of high-stakes issues like global terrorism and Iraq that he might not have remembered all the details of his conversations.

But the trial threw up numerous instances in which Mr. Cheney took a personal role in managing the White House response to accusations from Joseph C. Wilson IV, a prominent critic of the Iraq war, that the evidence for going to war had been knowingly overstated. Mr. Cheney could have been exposed during cross-examination to uncomfortable questions about his close involvement in trying to undermine Mr. Wilson's criticisms.

Mr. Wilson also said the identity of his wife as a Central Intelligence Agency operative was purposely leaked to the press in retaliation for his criticism. Mr. Libby is charged with lying to a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents investigating that leak.

The jury is expected to hear final arguments from both sides beginning next Tuesday.

Although the jury will not hear Mr. Libby in person, during the trial, prosecutors played eight hours of audiotapes in which Mr. Fitzgerald questioned him before the grand jury. The jury heard Mr. Libby giving his version calmly in the first two-thirds of the tapes and then seeming to become uneasy and less confident as Mr. Fitzgerald bore in.

Prosecutors have said Mr. Libby learned of the identity of Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Wilson, from fellow administration officials in the summer of 2003 and discussed her with reporters. Mr. Libby swore that he had not discussed Ms. Wilson with reporters and believed that he had learned about her in a conversation on July 10 or 11 with Tim Russert of NBC News.

Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, testified for the prosecution that Mr. Libby had discussed Ms. Wilson with them. Mr. Russert testified that he never discussed Ms. Wilson with Mr. Libby.

The defense has argued that the three reporters have remembered their conversations incorrectly. And, if Mr. Libby testified incorrectly, it was because his memory was faulty because of the press of official business.

Mr. Libby's lawyers were able to glean what would have been some of the benefits of Mr. Cheney's testimony through another witness on Tuesday.

The witness, John Hannah, a former deputy to Mr. Libby who is now a national security adviser to Mr. Cheney, took the jurors on a tour of Mr. Libby's concerns in the summer of 2003, including the Iraq war, Islamic extremists' threat of a biological attack, Iranian and North Korean nuclear capabilities and diplomatic crises with Liberia and Turkey.

DOJ_NMG_0131888

In Mr. Hannah's account, Mr. Libby had barely time to draw an extra breath, starting with an early morning C. I. A. briefing "that covers the waterfront of the world."

Mr. Hannah also provided testimony for another defense argument when he said Mr. Libby had a notoriously bad memory. "On certain things, Scooter just had an awful memory," he said, using Mr. Libby's nickname.

He said that on occasion Mr. Libby would tell him some idea in the afternoon, having forgotten that he, Mr. Hannah, had given him the idea in the morning. Mr. Libby, sitting at the defense table, laughed. Mr. Hannah said in response to a question from a juror — an unusual procedure used by Judge Walton — that Mr. Libby had a good memory for ideas and concepts.

Although Mr. Hannah testified for the defense for nearly two hours, the prosecutor, Mr. Fitzgerald, seemed to cut down much of the significance of his testimony in five minutes of cross-examination. Noting that Mr. Hannah had testified that he could usually have a few minutes alone with Mr. Libby only in the evening after the crush of business, Mr. Fitzgerald suggested that Mr. Libby would have devoted time only to matters of great concern to him in the week of July 6, 2003.

"If he gave something an hour or two that week, it would be something Mr. Libby thought was important, right?" asked Mr. Fitzgerald.

"Well, with regard to me, yes," Mr. Hannah replied.

Left unsaid in the exchange was undisputed testimony that Mr. Libby spent nearly two hours on Tuesday, July 8, with Ms. Miller, then a Times reporter. Ms. Miller has testified that Mr. Libby told her in detail about Ms. Wilson at the meeting. Mr. Libby acknowledged meeting Ms. Miller to counter Mr. Wilson's accusations, but said he did not discuss Ms. Wilson.

Underlying Mr. Hannah's testimony was a fierce legal battle between the defense team and prosecutors over how much the jury should be told of Mr. Libby's busy schedule now that he is not going to testify. One of his lawyers, John Cline, said, "We want to show he was caught in a tornado of information."

Judge Walton ruled that without Mr. Libby's live testimony he would not allow Mr. Wells to argue in his closing that the issue of Ms. Wilson was far less important than the national security issues on his agenda.

"I've said that relative importance is not going to be an issue on the table if Mr. Libby doesn't testify," he said.

Jill Abramson, managing editor of The New York Times, testified earlier on Tuesday that she could not remember a conversation with Ms. Miller after the July 8 meeting with Mr. Libby. Ms. Miller had testified earlier in the trial that she had suggested to Ms. Abramson that day that The Times assign someone to look into the role of the Wilsons.

Ms. Abramson, who was on the witness stand for less than five minutes, said, "It's possible I occasionally tuned her out," but said she had no recollection of the conversation.

Ex-senator Questions Fitzgerald's Case (AP)

AP, February 14, 2007

Former Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., criticized Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's handling of the CIA leak investigation Tuesday, saying the prosecutor had to have known from the start that it was not a crime to disclose Valerie Plame's identity as an agent.

A fund-raiser for the defense of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Thompson depicted Fitzgerald as out of control, telling ABC News there was "no brake and no check and no balance" on the prosecutor.

Thompson's objections are the same ones Democratic politicians made in the 1990s about independent counsel Kenneth Starr, who spent six years investigating President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In the same fashion, Republicans complained about the six-year investigation by independent counsel Lawrence Walsh into the Iran-Contra scandal of the Reagan years and the first Bush administration.

Congress allowed the independent counsel statute to expire in 1998.

"When you put too much power in the hands of unelected, unaccountable people who have every incentive to focus massive resources onto one particular person — who gets the plaudits in the media for doing so — it's a bad thing," Thompson told ABC.

DOJ_NMG_0131889

Unlike Starr, who was appointed by a panel of federal appeals court judges, Fitzgerald's Justice Department superiors appointed him to look into the CIA leak scandal. He has continued his duties as U.S. attorney in Chicago while investigating the Valerie Plame affair.

Thompson, who plays a prosecuting attorney in NBC's "Law & Order," pointed out that no one has been charged with leaking Plame's identity, saying no law had been broken. "The Justice Department knew that early on. The CIA should have known that early on," Thompson said. "Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had to have known that at the very beginning."

With information provided by two Bush administration officials, conservative columnist Robert Novak revealed Plame as a CIA agent in July 2003. The CIA asked for a Justice Department inquiry into possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, which led to the five-count indictment charging Libby with perjury and obstruction of the FBI investigation.

Subpoena Fighters Go To Court As Corzine Repeats Call For Records (NSL)

By Josh Margolin And Ted Sherman, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, February 14, 2007

Federal prosecutors and attorneys for the state Legislature are due to square off today in an increasingly political fight over the confidentiality of legislative records being sought in a criminal corruption probe.

The closed-door hearing in U.S. District Court in Trenton comes after Gov. Jon Corzine reiterated his call yesterday for the release of documents being sought by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie in an expanding investigation into lawmakers' possible conflicts of interest.

"I think we ought to comply with the law and respond to the subpoena," Corzine said. "We ought to be taking those steps that give the public the assurance that we're getting our house in order with regard to ethics."

Republicans, the minority in the Legislature, also have been calling for release of the records and have requested an internal inquiry into who authorized hiring an outside attorney to challenge the federal subpoena.

"It is incomprehensible that the nonpartisan Office of Legislative Services would secretly hire outside counsel to fight subpoenas," said Sen. Anthony Bucco (R-Morris), a member of the Legislative Services Commission, which oversees the OLS.

Separately, attorneys for state Sen. Wayne Bryant (D-Camden), whose no-show job with the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey initially sparked the interest of the U.S. attorney, moved to intervene in the court hearing, according to sources familiar with the proceedings.

The federal investigation into Bryant led to at least three subpoenas that were served on the OLS, the state Senate and the state Treasury Department last fall, attorneys for the Senate Democrats confirmed at the time.

The subpoenas served on the Senate and the Treasury Department sought budget-related documents, which were quickly produced. However the OLS balked at providing the information, citing attorney-client privilege.

In addition to serving as the nonpartisan research and operations arm of the Legislature, the OLS acts as counsel to the Legislature and its members.

Democratic leaders of the Legislature said yesterday they believed the scope of the OLS subpoena was narrowly focused and not necessarily indicative of a broader investigation into the Legislature itself. But they admitted they had neither reviewed the subpoena nor been briefed by the U.S. attorney.

In their first public comments on the matter amid the growing political fallout, the Democrats said they have fully complied with all requests from Christie's office.

Senate President Richard Codey (D-Essex) and Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D-Camden) said they were "unaware of a broad-ranging investigation as has been reported in the media."

In a joint statement, the two said: "What apparently is in dispute is a narrow issue that the Office of Legislative Services believes to be of constitutional significance, and ultimately it will be up to the court to decide the matter."

That issue is whether communications between attorneys for the Legislature and its members are presumed to be confidential -- an argument that was shot down nearly a decade ago during the investigation of President Bill Clinton, when independent counsel Kenneth Starr successfully argued that government lawyers work for the public.

Codey said if individual members of the Legislature had been the subject of any subpoena, they would have been notified.

DOJ_NMG_0131890

"I don't know anybody that has been notified," he said.

It is clear, though, that Christie is not confining his questions to Bryant. Several legislative officers and budget officials have been interviewed by the FBI in recent weeks regarding the awarding of millions of dollars in special discretionary funds.

The confidentiality argument due to play out today in the courtroom of U.S. District Court Judge Mary Cooper would affect any subpoenas served on the Legislature.

The hearing will be closed and its proceedings sealed because the matter is part of an ongoing grand jury investigation.

Officials within the Office of Legislative Services would not discuss the matter. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney declined comment.

Reputed Mob Boss 'Joey The Clown' Could Face Fresh Charges (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, February 14, 2007

CHICAGO - Reputed mob boss Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo and another man could face new charges for going on the lam after a major indictment against them was unsealed, a federal prosecutor said Tuesday.

"We may seek to add charges to the indictment based on their fugitive status," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mitchell A. Mars told federal Judge James B. Zagel at a hearing in a racketeering case known as Operation Family Secrets.

Fourteen alleged mobsters and mob associates were charged in the indictment alleging that leaders of the Chicago Outfit were involved in 18 murders, including that of Tony "The Ant" Spilotro, the mob's onetime top man in Las Vegas who was killed and buried in an Indiana corn field.

Joe Pesci played a character based on Tony Spilotro in the 1995 Martin Scorsese film "Casino."

Lombardo, 77, was captured by FBI agents in a suburban Elmwood Park alley in January 2006 after nine months on the run.

The other runaway defendant, alleged mob enforcer Frank "The German" Schweihs, 76, was captured by FBI agents in December 2005, hiding in the hills of Kentucky south of Lexington.

Lombardo attorney Rick Halprin said that an unlawful flight to escape prosecution charge would add little to the case compared to the racketeering count his client is charged with.

"Given the breadth and scope of the case, I don't believe I'm going to lose any sleep over it," he said. Schweihs attorney Ellen R. Domph had no comment.

Zagel told attorneys Tuesday that he likely would order a hearing to determine exactly what jurors might hear from prospective government witness James Wagner, a former FBI mob investigator who now is president of the Chicago Crime Commission.

Prosecutors want Wagner to tell the jury the story of the Chicago Outfit based on his decades of experience investigating the mob.

Halprin has asked Zagel to limit what Wagner would be allowed to say. Zagel told Mars to provide the court with a written explanation of what the former agent would tell the jury.

Lawyer Surrenders In '78 Stolen Art Case (BOS)

By Stephen Kurkjian And Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 14, 2007

Will face charges in attempted sale

A retired Watertown lawyer surrendered to federal authorities yesterday after returning from France to face charges he attempted to sell millions of dollars worth of paintings, including a major work by Cezanne, that were stolen from a home in the Berkshires in 1978.

Robert M. Mardirosian , 72, who gave up a successful criminal law practice to become a sculptor and painter more than a decade ago, appeared in federal court 90 minutes after being arrested at Logan International Airport by arrangement with the US attorney's office. He was charged with taking possession of the seven paintings months after they were allegedly stolen by one of his clients. The theft was long regarded as the largest burglary from a private residence in Massachusetts history.

Mardirosian will be arraigned March 2 on the charges, which carry a maximum 10-year sentence upon conviction. He was released on $500,000 bail by US Magistrate Marianne B. Bowler. Both Mardirosian and his attorney, Michael F. Hanley, declined to comment following the hearing.

"It is extremely disheartening that an attorney charged with upholding the law . . . would disregard that duty and for decades conceal the whereabouts of priceless works of art for no other reason than greed," US Attorney Michael P. Sullivan said in a statement.

In an interview with the Globe in January 2006, Mardirosian acknowledged that he had taken possession of the paintings and held them for more than 20 years after his client, David T. Colvin of Pittsfield, had stashed them, unbeknownst to Mardirosian, in a large plastic bag in the attic of his Watertown law office. Mardirosian said he represented Colvin on an unrelated criminal case when Colvin told him he was headed to Florida to fence the stolen paintings.

"He was going to bring them to Florida to fence them, but I told him that if he ever got caught with them with the other case hanging over his head, he'd be in real trouble," Mardirosian said in the 2006 Globe interview.

Colvin was killed the following year, and it was only then, Mardirosian said, that he realized the paintings were in his office attic.

According to the federal complaint against him, Mardirosian held onto the paintings until 1988 when he moved them to Monaco and later to a Swiss bank for safekeeping. He said he intended to return the paintings to their owner, Michael P. Bakwin of Stockbridge, in exchange for a finder's fee or 10 percent of their value, according to the complaint. But he took no such action.

Finally, in 1999, using a shell company he set up in Panama called Erie Trading International, Mardirosian tried to arrange for the auction of the most valuable painting, Cezanne's "Bouilloire et Fruits," at Sotheby's in London. However, the Art Loss Register, which tracks stolen artwork, notified Sotheby's that the painting had been stolen and stopped the sale.

Within months, Bakwin and the Art Loss Register signed an agreement with Erie's lawyers to turn over ownership of the other six paintings if the Cezanne was returned to Bakwin. But shortly after he completed the deal, Julian Radcliffe, president of the Art Loss Register, contended that the deal was not legally binding since Bakwin had, in effect, been coerced to sign it to get his stolen property back.

Mardirosian's possession of the paintings and his presidency of Erie Trading was not known until last year when, according to the complaint, he tried again to auction four of the remaining six stolen paintings at Sotheby's.

This time, according to an affidavit filed by FBI Special Agent Geoffrey J. Kelly, he persuaded Paul Palandjian of Belmont, the son of a former close friend, to arrange the sale. Palandjian, who was granted immunity for his testimony, told federal authorities that he agreed to the deal in exchange for a commission.

However, Bakwin stopped the auction by bringing suit in a London court, which began the federal investigation and ended with Mardirosian's arrest.

Although he was not asked to provide any defense at the hearing, Mardirosian may argue that he did not know Bakwin was the owner of the paintings until he began negotiating with him over ownership of the paintings.

At yesterday's hearing, Assistant US Attorney Jonathan F. Mitchell said a recent search of Mardirosian's home in Falmouth in conjunction with the investigation had uncovered several firearms, 53 pounds of marijuana, and a stash of cocaine.

Mardirosian has been living in the south of France since last year, and the house has been occupied by one of his two sons, Mitchell said.

Mass. Lawyer Charged In Stolen Art Case (NSDY/AP)

By Jesse Harlan Alderman, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 14, 2007

BOSTON -- A retired lawyer who federal authorities say negotiated to sell paintings allegedly stolen by a former client, including a $30 million Cezanne still life, was arrested Tuesday at Logan Airport as he got off a plane from France.

Robert R. Mardirosian, 72, of Falmouth, Mass., and St. Paule de Vence, France, was charged in U.S. District Court with possessing, concealing, storing, and attempting to sell stolen goods, U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan announced.

"People seem to get away with all kinds of stuff when it comes to art robbery," said Michael Bakwin, the paintings' owner and a former inn keeper in Stockbridge, Mass., now living in Suffolk, Va. "I don't know if there is any closure, but it's nice to see that people who break the law don't get away with it."

In 1978, Bakwin returned to his home in the Berkshire mountains to find seven paintings missing from the dining room walls. "Pitcher and Fruits," a painting by French impressionist Paul Cezanne, was among them.

Nearly 30 years later, authorities allege in a complaint unsealed Tuesday in federal court that Mardirosian hauled the paintings on a bizarre circuit from his Watertown, Mass., law office to Swiss banks and London auction houses, all under the cover of a Panamanian shell company he created to sell the works.

"It is extremely disheartening that an attorney charged with upholding the law, as the defendant was in this case, would disregard that duty and for decades conceal the whereabouts of priceless works of art for no other reason than greed," Sullivan said in a written statement.

Last year, Mardirosian told The Boston Globe that the paintings' alleged thief, David Colvin, left the pieces at his law office in Watertown. He told the newspaper he represented Colvin in an unrelated case.

"He was going to bring them to Florida to fence them, but I told him that if he ever got caught with them with the other case hanging over his head, he'd be in real trouble," he told The Globe.

In 1979, a year after the artwork went missing, Colvin was killed in Pittsfield, Mass., over a gambling debt.

In 1988, Mardirosian moved the paintings to Monaco, thinking he might have a legal claim to ownership or a 10 percent "finder's fee," according to a May 2006 affidavit from FBI Special Agent Geoffrey Kelly, also unsealed Tuesday.

Lloyd's of London was contacted in 1999 by an unknown person about insuring the paintings before sale, the affidavit says, and discovered they were listed with the database Art Loss Register as having been stolen. It says Julian Radcliffe, chairman of Art Loss Register, determined that the paintings were being sold by a Panamanian corporation called Erie International Trading Company, later found to be registered to Mardirosian.

Radcliffe contacted Bakwin and brokered a deal with unnamed agents of Erie, who agreed to return the Cezanne in exchange for the other six paintings. Two months after retrieving the Cezanne, Bakwin auctioned it through Sotheby's in London for $29.3 million.

As part of the contract, the owner of Erie agreed to disclose his identity in a sealed envelope. A British judge later ruled the contract void because Bakwin "signed it under duress." He ordered the envelope unsealed, revealing Erie's owner as Robert Mardirosian, and ordered the lawyer to pay Bakwin $3 million.

Bakwin said four paintings, which authorities say Mardirosian tried to sell through Sotheby's in 2004, will be returned to him in Virginia. He said he did not plan to auction them.

"I have a fairly large home, so I'll display them where they fit," he said.

Investigators believe the two remaining paintings, both Jansen works, are being held by a Swiss friend of Mardirosian.

Three lawyers for Mardirosian did not return calls or e-mails from The Associated Press.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office did not return an after-hours call. The Cape Cod Times reported on its Web site that Mardirosian was released on $500,000 bail and ordered to stay at his son's home in Belmont.

Prisoner Who Killed Cell Mate With Towel Gets Death Penalty (DPHR/AP)

By The Associated Press

Daily Press, February 14, 2007

ROANOKE, Va. -- A federal inmate who killed his cell mate by strangling him with a bath towel has been sentenced to death, officials said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0131893

Carlos Caro, 39, was a prisoner at the federal penitentiary in Lee County in December 2003 when he killed Robert Sandoval, U.S. Attorney John L. Brownlee's office said in a statement.

Caro later told an FBI agent that Sandoval had cursed Caro and threatened to eat his breakfast, the statement said. He also admitted killing Sandoval with the towel, Brownlee's office said.

Caro was convicted on Feb. 1 by a federal jury in Abingdon. He will be formally sentenced March 9.

"Mr. Caro continues to commit violent crimes even while incarcerated," Brownlee said in the statement. "The jury agreed that Mr. Caro had to be punished for this crime and that more prison time was not a deterrent for Mr. Caro."

Verdict For Execution In Reservoir Case (AP)

By Greg Risling

AP, February 14, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A jury imposed the death penalty Tuesday on the ringleaders of a kidnapping-for-ransom scheme targeting rich Russian immigrants whose bodies were found in a Northern California reservoir.

Jurors deliberated less than a day before reaching their vote on sentences for Iouri Mikhel, 41, and Jurijus Kadamovas, 40. Last month, the federal jury convicted both men of three counts of hostage-taking resulting in death and three counts of conspiracy.

The death penalty verdict is binding on U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian, who is scheduled to formally sentence the two men March 12. The case will be automatically appealed, as in all federal death penalty prosecutions.

"They got what they deserved," said Ruven Umansky, whose son Alexander was among those killed. "It's a relief."

Said U.S. Attorney Susan DeWitt: "These were good people who didn't deserve the fate that befell them. We felt a tremendous responsibility to the victims' families."

Defense attorney Dale Rubin called the jury's decision "a revenge verdict."

"They lost sight of what their job was," Rubin said.

Prosecutors said the two men led a group that sought to build a fortune by kidnapping affluent Russian immigrants from Los Angeles in late 2001 and early 2002 and extorting money from their families and friends. About $1.2 million was collected in ransom.

Defense attorneys said the accomplices who cut deals with prosecutors for lesser prison sentences were the group's leaders.

Five victims were killed regardless of whether the ransoms were paid, prosecutors said. The bodies were tied with weights and dumped in the New Melones Reservoir near Yosemite National Park.

(Corrects that jury's verdict is binding on judge, and not a recommendation; corrects that sentencing is on March 12, not March 7.)

Study Predicts Rise In Inmate Populations (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — The number of inmates in U.S. prisons likely will rise nearly 13% during the next five years, costing states up to $27.5 billion in new operating and construction expenses, according to a new analysis by the Pew Charitable Trusts.

The Pew report, to be released today, projects the nation's prison population will be about 1.72 million by 2011, up from an estimated 1.53 million at the end of last year. Such an increase would roughly equal the current population of the federal prison system.

Pew analysts said the growth is being fueled by mandatory minimum sentences that have stretched prison terms for many criminals, declines in inmates granted parole and other policies that states have passed in recent years to crack down on crime.

In some states, the study said, high rates of repeat offenders also have been a factor in boosting prison populations.

Montana, Arizona, Alaska, Idaho and Vermont could see their prison systems grow by one-third or more if there are no changes to the states' sentencing and release policies, the study said.

DOJ_NMG_0131894

"The projected growth is phenomenal," says Sue Urahn, managing director of Pew's state policy programs. "But whether it comes to this is up to the states. They determine who goes to prison and for how long."

Pew, a Philadelphia-based philanthropic organization that funds research into a variety of issues, based its findings on population forecasts gathered from the federal Bureau of Prisons and 42 states.

Researchers calculated estimates for the eight states that did not provide projections, based on the states' most recent prison admission and release data.

The report estimated the projected prison costs over the next five years as a "staggering" $27.5 billion — nearly half the amount now spent on American prisons each year.

The report also predicted that the number of female inmates will rise at a faster rate (16%) than males (12%). "Don't picture this parade of prisoners as an exclusively male group," it said. Among the report's other findings:

•By 2011, Florida's prison system is expected to become the third state system to surpass 100,000 inmates, joining California and Texas. California's projected inmate population for 2011 is 188,772; Texas' is 166,327.

•In Louisiana, which has the nation's highest rate of incarceration with 835 prisoners per 100,000 residents, the incarceration rate is projected to reach 859 by 2011.

•Nearly two-thirds of the more than 600,000 people admitted to prison each year have failed to satisfy terms of probation or parole.

Richard Berk, a professor of criminology and statistics at the University of Pennsylvania who reviewed Pew's analysis, called it a "cautious" attempt to forecast and account for the dramatic growth in prison populations.

The Pew report highlights recent crime problems and state responses that have helped increase prison populations, including the prosecution of methamphetamine-related offenses and sex offenders.

In Montana, which is projected to have the nation's largest percentage in inmates — 41% — over the next five years, at least half of all new prison admissions today are for meth-related crimes, Montana Department of Corrections spokesman Bob Anez says.

One in four prisoners in Montana's 2,812-inmate system is a sex offender and 46% of inmates have a mental illness, Anez says. Montana is examining alternative sentencing and treatment programs to handle the increasing population, he says.

Later this year, two meth treatment centers — an 80-bed facility for men and a 40-bed one for women — are scheduled to open. Montana's Legislature is considering a proposal for a 120-bed treatment center for mentally ill offenders.

The state also has added 169 beds to its halfway houses in the past two years to try to better prepare released offenders for life outside prison and reduce a recidivism rate in which nearly half of all offenders have are returning to prison.

"We're at the end of the pipeline here," Anez says.

"Once they get here, we have to think about things we can do to prepare them so they don't come back."

Owner Of D.C. Dental Clinic Sentenced, Must Pay Fine (WASHBIZ)

Washington Business Journal, February 14, 2007

The owner of a D.C. dental clinic who recently pled guilty to health care fraud has been sentenced to six months community confinement, six months of home detention and was ordered to pay restitution of $164,000 and a fine of $40,000 for submitting false claims for payment to private insurers, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for D.C.

Afsaneh Tehrani, owner and president of DC Dentistry at 1712 Eye St. NW, was sentenced by Judge Henry Kennedy in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

DC Dentistry employs licensed dentists to perform dental procedures and to provide dental services to patients.

In November, Tehrani, a McLean resident who is not a dentist, pled guilty to the charge of health-care fraud. She operates and manages the clinic, makes appointments, collects payments from patients, performs billing to private insurance companies for services and pays the clinic's expenses, including the payroll, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Between 2000 and 2004, Tehrani submitted or caused to be submitted false claims for payment to private insurance companies, including Aetna and Metlife, for dental work performed or allegedly performed by dentists of DC Dentistry on patients of the clinic.

These claims were false because they asserted that dental procedures had been performed on patients when, in fact, no such procedures were performed, or because they sought payment for the same procedures that had already been billed to and paid by another insurance company.

Last August, Tehrani was charged with health-care fraud and making false statements. At that time, she denied the charges, calling them "ridiculous." The charges resulted from an investigation by the U.S. Attorney for the District, the FBI's Washington field office, the D.C. Department of Health and the D.C. Department of Insurance, Securities and Banking.

Shareholder In Tech Co. Sues Rep. Jefferson (RC)

By Rachel Van Dongen, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

A former shareholder of a technology firm is suing Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) and his wife to recoup his losses, arguing that they helped to run the company into bankruptcy.

Daniel Cadle, a stockholder in the now-defunct firm iGate, filed a lawsuit seeking unspecified damages Tuesday in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Kentucky.

The lawsuit alleges that Jefferson, his wife, Andrea, and the former president of iGate, Vernon Jackson, “acted in concert and conspired to use the funds of iGate” to solicit and deliver bribes from individuals and businesses in Africa and the United States.

The suit charges Jefferson with soliciting and accepting nearly $400,000 in bribes from Jackson to promote iGate’s services in the U.S. and abroad. It further alleges that Jackson transferred 30,775,000 shares of iGate stock to Jefferson from 2001 to 2005.

The firm is now out of business. Jackson pleaded guilty to paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes to Jefferson in exchange for help advancing his business. He was sentenced to seven years in prison.

Cadle charged that the bribes were paid “without the consent or knowledge of iGate’s shareholders” and did not lead to “valid or legal consideration” by iGate as reimbursement.

“The wrongful and tortious conduct of the Defendants not only put iGate out of business to the direct detriment of its shareholders, but also dissipated hundreds of thousands of dollars of the shareholders’ collective investment, for illegal purposes of which the shareholders of iGate were not aware,” the suit states.

A resident of Trumbull County, Ohio, Cadle purchased 327,500 shares of iGate’s Class A common stock around May 31, 2000.

The suit largely tracks a continuing federal probe into Jefferson and his allegedly illegal business transactions.

But the Louisiana Congressman, who won re-election in 2006, has not been charged with any wrongdoing. Nonetheless, questions swirl about why the FBI found $90,000 in the freezer of the Democrat’s New Orleans home.

Jefferson’s attorney, Robert Trout, is out of town and unavailable for comment.

Child Porn Defendant Gets 5 Years In Prison (AP)

Associated Press

AP, February 14, 2007

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- A man who traded images of child pornography and sexual abuse on the Internet was sentenced Tuesday to five years in prison after pleading for mercy, saying his effeminate appearance would make him vulnerable to abuse behind bars.

David Cuozzo, 42, of New Haven had amassed a collection of 1,780 files of child pornography involving at least 30 children, including images that portrayed sadistic or masochistic conduct or other depictions of violence and the rape of young children, authorities said.

"This defendant used the Internet to trade some of the most disturbing images of infant and toddler child pornography and sexual abuse that law enforcement has seen," said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. "Federal laws that target the child pornography trade, and the strict terms of imprisonment to which offenders are exposed, exist to eliminate the victimization of children all over the world, as those who possess child pornography help to create the market for this insidious practice."

Cuozzo, who pleaded guilty last year to transportation of child pornography, sought a sentence less than the more than 17 to nearly 22 years he faced under federal guidelines. He must report to prison April 3.

"I wish I could turn back the clock and start over," Cuozzo said Tuesday during his sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court. "I apologize not only to the victims but their friends and families. Their lives have been forever ruined because of my actions and for that I am truly sorry."

U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns said that though the offense was serious, the guidelines were excessive in Cuozzo's case. She cited several factors, including his poor health and lack of a criminal record, for imposing the lower sentence.

Cuozzo, who must register as a sex offender, said he has Klinefelter Syndrome, a genetic defect that leads to feminine traits such as sparse or absent facial hair and a high-pitched voice.

"David Cuozzo plainly fits the profile of a vulnerable inmate," his attorneys wrote in court papers. "He is at a high risk of physical as well as sexual violence. He is a white man with an effeminate appearance and extremely effeminate mannerisms. He is gay and most people who meet him immediately identify his sexual orientation without him disclosing it."

But the mother of a girl who was repeatedly abused to produce images traded over the Internet called for the maximum sentence.

"Without a market to receive and trade those images, without the encouragement of those who wanted to acquire the images, I truly believe this abuse would not have occurred," the mother wrote. "I've watched my daughter transformed from a buoyant, cheerful child full of energy and enthusiasm to an anxious and fretful shadow of her former self."

The woman, who is not identified in court papers, said the experience left her daughter distrustful of any touch. She washes her hands repeatedly, trying to feel "clean."

"Each person who callously passes on those sickening pictures is exposing my daughter to further shame and humiliation," the woman wrote.

Prosecutors rejected Cuozzo's claim that he would be vulnerable in prison, saying he is nearly 6 feet tall and that the argument was based on alleged abuse of effeminate men in state prisons, not federal facilities where he would be housed.

"The trading of pornographic images of known young children on the Internet acts as repeated violations of these children each time an image is viewed," prosecutors wrote. "Perhaps as important is the concern that the bartering or distribution of disturbing images of abuse may fuel the appetite of those disturbed individuals who would act on such imagery."

O'Connor said the prosecution was part of the U.S. Department of Justice Project Safe Childhood Initiative, designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse.

Acquitted Man: 'That's 10 Years They Can Never Replace' (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 14, 2007

James Thomas spent almost 10 years in jail in Louisiana, waiting to be tried for a murder he said he didn't commit.

When the case finally was tried, it took jurors 80 minutes to agree with him. After a five-day trial, they acquitted Thomas in the 1996 shooting death of a Baton Rouge man. Thomas, 36, almost fainted in the packed courtroom as the verdict was read out.

"I was shocked. I praised the Lord," Thomas said Tuesday in his first interview since his acquittal Friday. "As long as I live, I'll never forget this. That's 10 years they can never replace."

Thomas' case, profiled in a USA TODAY story in 2005, symbolized problems in the nation's public defender system that result in tens of thousands of poor people in the USA going to jail every year without talking to a lawyer. An American Bar Association study concluded two years ago that the system was "mired in crisis," crippled by funding inadequacies that led to excessive caseloads and inexperienced lawyers being assigned to cases beyond their expertise.

Since the report, public defender programs have been improved in several states, says Bill Whitehurst, an Austin lawyer who headed the ABA's panel on indigent defense. But "there's no question it's still mired in crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0131897

Thomas' wait for a trial began Aug. 27, 1996, when he was arrested with three others in the slaying of Dennis "Doc" Scruggs, 19.

There were several delays in Thomas' case. He was in jail for three years while authorities sought enough public defenders qualified to handle the death penalty case. Because he and his co-defendants were charged with first-degree capital murder, they each were entitled to two public defenders under state law.

The charges later were reduced to second-degree murder, which carries a sentence of up to life in prison without parole. The district attorney was elected to the legislature and withdrew from the case. It was reassigned to the state Attorney General's Office. Other lawyers came and went; Thomas' alibi witness died of kidney disease.

When Thomas' case was first reported by USA TODAY, he was 8½ years into his wait for a trial. He was out of jail because a state court had thrown out the charge as too old to try. Louisiana's Supreme Court later reinstated it, and Thomas returned to jail. He was out on bail while his attorney, Chris Alexander, appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, arguing that Thomas had been denied his right to a speedy trial. In January, the court declined to hear the case.

Scruggs was fatally shot in a robbery, court papers say. Another defendant, James Ross, said in 1996 that Thomas was the gunman. Ross later recanted and testified that Thomas was not involved. Ross is the only defendant to be convicted. Another died in an unrelated shooting; the other is awaiting trial.

Better Business Bureau Tangled In E-Mail Scam (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The Better Business Bureau network was the target of a "spoofing" scam yesterday in which thousands of businesses in the United States and Canada received e-mails encouraging them to download what is thought to be a computer virus.

The e-mails, using the name of the 95-year-old network of nonprofit groups that looks into consumer complaints, told businesses that they were the subject of a complaint and included a link to view related documents. Clicking on the link, however, accessed the address book of an infected computer and distributed the counterfeit e-mail to more recipients, said Steve Cox, spokesman for the Council of Better Business Bureaus.

The council is the umbrella group for the system's 129 local branches, which are funded by member businesses.

BBB members and nonmembers received the e-mail.

Confused business owners began calling the council's offices in Arlington at 6 a.m. yesterday, Cox said. By mid-morning, the organization had confirmed the attack was systemwide.

"It is the first time in recent memory where we've had an attack on this scale," Cox said.

The counterfeit e-mails were traced to an advertising firm in Kennesaw, Ga., that had had its computer system hacked into Monday night, Cox said. The agency had no prior affiliation with the BBB.

'Shoot The Burglar' Law Advances In One State (AP)

By Dale Wetzel, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 14, 2007

(AP) - BISMARCK, North Dakota-A proposed law that would let people shoot a burglar or carjacker without fear of facing arrest or a lawsuit is moving forward in one state, and the National Rifle Association is promoting it in others.

"This bill is simply a citizen's version of homeland security," said North Dakota state Representative Ron Carlisle.

The proposal would erase language that says retreat is better than deadly force, and it says a person is presumed to be justified if he or she shoots a burglar or carjacker in his or her home, workplace or vehicle.

Police and county prosecutors object to the proposal, saying that trying to disprove a shooter's self-defense argument would be more difficult. The law protects a shooter from arrest unless police have probable cause to believe the shooting was not justified.

State Representative Kenton Onstad said the proposal amounted to a declaration of "shoot first and ask questions later."

It now goes to the state Senate for a vote.

DOJ_NMG_0131898

Ashley Varner, an NRA spokeswoman, said 15 states, including South Dakota, have versions of the law. This year, it has been offered in legislatures in five other states.

Speaking Up For The Whistle-Blowers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

They have job duties taken away, so they are marginalized in the office. They get stripped of their security clearances, so they can't work. They are blacklisted, so they can't find employment. They are reassigned to new locations, so they have to choose between moving or losing their jobs.

Those are typical forms of retaliation carried out against federal employees who blow the whistle on waste, fraud and abuse at their agencies.

Yesterday, advocates for whistle-blowers urged Congress to strengthen protections for federal employees who suffer reprisal in the workplace. The advocates were greeted with bipartisan support at a hearing held by the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

"Federal employees are on the inside," Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the committee chairman, said. "They see when taxpayer dollars are wasted. They are often the first to see the signals of corrupt or incompetent management. Yet without adequate protection, they cannot step forward to blow the whistle."

Waxman said the committee's bill would for the first time extend whistle-blower rights to those who work at the FBI and in intelligence agencies, and to people employed by federal contractors. The bill would also extend protection to passenger and baggage screeners at the Transportation Security Administration and to federal scientists who report political interference with their work, he said.

Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the ranking minority member on the committee, said the bill would clarify congressional intent as to what type of whistle-blowing is protected. He said "the most significant reform" in the bill would guarantee federal employees a right to a jury trial in federal district court if the Merit Systems Protection Board, a federal agency that hears complaints from whistle-blowers, did not take action on a whistle-blower's claim in 180 days.

Although Congress has passed laws to protect federal employees from reprisals when they speak up, whistle-blower advocates contend that the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has sole jurisdiction over federal whistle-blower cases, has interpreted the laws in a way that makes it almost impossible for federal employees to defend themselves.

At yesterday's hearing, advocates for whistle-blowers -- William G. Weaver, an associate professor at the University of Texas at El Paso; Nick Schwellenbach, an investigator with the Project on Government Oversight; Tom Devine, legal director for the Government Accountability Project; and Mark Zaid, a lawyer and executive director of the James Madison Project -- testified in support of the Waxman bill.

"Whistle-blowers risk their professional survival to challenge abuses of power that betray the public trust," Devine said. "This is freedom of speech when it counts."

He cited several whistle-blowers who spoke out on vital issues of public concern, including a law enforcement officer who sought improvements in the federal air-marshal program and was then was investigated and assigned to desk duty.

Although the committee members at the hearing, including Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.) and Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), signaled support for the bill, its prospects are uncertain.

Previous legislative efforts have faltered, largely because the Justice Department has objected to expanding whistle-blower rights. Department officials have contended that more protection for whistle-blowers could hinder agency operations and compromise classified information.

Platts sponsored a whistle-blower bill last year that was approved by the committee on a 34 to 1 vote but did not reach the floor. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii) moved a whistle-blower measure through the Senate as part of a defense bill, only to see it dropped during House-Senate negotiations.

Akaka, joined by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), reintroduced whistle-blower legislation in January. The bill, which has a more limited scope that Waxman's measure, is pending before the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Waxman plans to put his bill before the House committee today, if weather permits, for amendments and debate.

Md. Police Unit Free Of U.S. Oversight (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The Prince George's County police canine unit, which in recent years operated under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, has improved to the point that the oversight is no longer necessary, a federal judge in Maryland has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus on Monday granted a motion filed jointly by the Justice Department, the county and the police department to end the federal oversight that began in 2004, Prince George's officials said.

The judge's order means the department has succeeded in reforming the canine unit by dramatically reducing the number of bites inflicted by police dogs, beefing up supervision of canine teams, instituting reviews of biting incidents and improving documentation of such encounters, county officials said.

"Something must be working, because I haven't heard any complaints about dogs biting," Titus said in court Monday.

The oversight will formally end March 11.

A separate agreement between county officials and the Justice Department, which was negotiated to end a Justice investigation into allegations of excessive force by county police, is still operative. The department is in substantial compliance with the terms of that agreement, which calls for broad reforms regarding use of force, training and other issues, said Sharon Taylor, a spokeswoman for the police department.

The end of the canine consent decree "is absolutely good news. This department has worked really hard to get to this place," said Police Chief Melvin C. High. "I am very proud of the members of our canine unit and the efforts they have made."

County resident Redmond Barnes, a member of a group that advocates for police accountability, said he hopes the positive changes in the canine unit signal the beginning of broader police reforms.

"Federal intervention seems to be having an impact, and we can only hope it will have a greater impact," said Barnes, a member of the People's Coalition for Police Accountability.

On a practical level, the end of the consent decree means police officials will no longer undergo periodic Justice Department reviews and will no longer be required to file detailed reports to Justice officials.

However, the canine unit reforms will continue, Taylor said.

The county police department has 11 canine teams, each consisting of a police dog and its officer handler. The unit includes Labrador retrievers as well as Belgian Malinois canines, which resemble German shepherds but are slightly smaller. Both sniff out bombs and drugs; the Belgian Malinois dogs also chase suspects.

Canine unit reforms have resulted in dramatically fewer injuries to suspects and other people.

During a seven-year period from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s, county police dogs were involved in nearly 800 biting incidents, according to an internal police report included in a federal civil lawsuit against a police canine handler. Most of the bite victims were people suspected of petty, nonviolent crimes. Some were bitten multiple times and suffered grave, debilitating injuries.

Last year, county police dogs apprehended 55 suspects without biting them, and they bit eight suspects, police officials said. The previous year, the police canines bit five people and apprehended 36 suspects without inflicting injury, police said.

For decades, county police dogs were trained to catch suspects by biting and holding them. In May 1999, police officials announced they were shifting to a new approach in which their police dogs would be trained to hold suspects at bay by barking at them, attacking only if the person attacked or tried to flee.

The 1999 policy change came six weeks after the FBI opened an investigation into whether the county canine unit was engaging in a pattern of excessive force.

That investigation led to the 2001 conviction in federal court of former canine officer Stephanie C. Mohr. A jury convicted Mohr of a federal civil rights violation for releasing her canine on an unarmed, unresisting homeless man who was surrounded by pistol-wielding police officers. Mohr is serving a 10-year prison sentence.

Ga. County Declines To Act On '46 Death (AP)

By Elliott Minor

AP, February 14, 2007

BUTLER, Ga. - A rural county's leaders declined to take action Tuesday on a request from two civil rights groups to support a federal probe into the unsolved 1946 killing of a black World War II veteran.

The groups and surviving relatives of Maceo Snipes, the first registered black voter in Taylor County, wanted the county commission's support before they mailed their request to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

But the relatives and activists stormed out to protest the line of questioning of an official who said local residents resent outsiders telling them what to do, and the commission did not act.

"I'm disappointed at the outcome. We didn't come to fight," said a cousin, Felix Snipes, 66, of Atlanta.

Commission member Patty Carson-James later said the state NAACP and the Prison & Jail Project did not need the commission's support for the probe.

"We're here trying to pave roads, get jobs and help our sheriff get drugs off the street," Carson-James said.

The activists and Snipes' relatives knew going into the meeting that there could be some tension. Some locals resent protests over courthouse plaques that segregate by race the names of area veterans.

At one point during the meeting, Carson-James, who is black and who has defended the segregated plaques, asked Snipes' relatives whether they were members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

John Cole Vodicka, leader of the Prison & Jail Project, objected, and a commission member ordered the sheriff to escort Vodicka out of the meeting. Vodicka, state NAACP president Edward DuBose and the family members left soon after.

Carson-James later said that she is a member of the local NAACP branch but that locals resent outsiders telling them what to do. She said residents support a commission plan to keep the segregated plaques for historic purposes, and install a new plaque that includes all the veterans' names.

DuBose called the commission response to the investigation request "the worst display of disrespect for citizens."

Maceo Snipes, who served most of his two-year Army hitch in the Pacific, was shot in the back by four white men in 1946 - a day after the 37-year-old voted for the first time, relatives say. He collapsed in the doorway of his farmhouse about 90 miles south of Atlanta and died two days later.

While his death certificate says he died of "gunshot wound by homicide," there is no evidence of a criminal probe into the killing, and no one was arrested.

Lawyers Defend Christian Prison Program In Iowa (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

Lawyers for Prison Fellowship Ministries and its affiliate, the Inner8Change Freedom Initiative, appeared before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit in St. Louis yesterday to defend the constitutionality of an evangelical Christian rehabilitation program they operate in a state prison in Iowa.

A federal judge ruled last June that the program, built around Bible study and prayer, violated the First Amendment's ban on government-sponsored religious indoctrination. Although inmates volunteered for the program, the judge, Robert W. Pratt of Federal District Court, found that they had been induced to join it to get safer housing and more accessible treatment options. Judge Pratt also found that they had been penalized if they dropped out or failed to fully participate in mandatory religious activities.

The prison program's lawyers emphasized the voluntary nature of the program, and the State of Iowa, a co-defendant, argued that it got valuable secular services for its money. The program is continuing during the appeal, lawyers for the state said.

Most of the appellate panel's questions focused on Judge Pratt's order that the prison ministry repay the estimated $1.5 million it got from Iowa, a step that the ministry's lawyers said would deter other faith-based groups from seeking government contracts.

A lawyer for Americans United for Separation of Church and State, the plaintiffs, argued that restitution was warranted because the ministry had ignored clear warnings that it was on shaky constitutional grounds.

One judge hearing the case found her own Supreme Court opinions cited by both sides. The judge, Sandra Day O'Connor, who as an associate justice shaped some significant First Amendment opinions before retiring in 2005, continues to serve as a substitute judge in appellate cases, as she did yesterday.

ANTITRUST:

Four Brands In Car Rental May Merge (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

A deal to combine four of the nation's largest car rental brands — National, Alamo, Thrifty and Dollar — is being discussed as the industry continues to consolidate.

Dollar Thrifty Automotive Group, a unit of DaimlerChrysler, is in early talks to merge with Vanguard Car Rental, of Tulsa, Okla., which owns National and Alamo, in a deal valued at more than $3 billion, according to people involved in the discussions.

The negotiations, which have been taking place on and off for several months, are at a particularly delicate stage, these people said, and may still collapse.

If completed, a deal would create the third-largest rental car company in the United States behind leaders Enterprise Rent-a-Car and Hertz Global Holdings, but outpacing Avis Budget Group in terms of revenue.

A deal could push rental car rates higher. Prices have already risen 10 percent to 20 percent in the last year as the Detroit automakers have tried to move away from providing discounted fleet vehicles to rental car companies and focus on higher-margin retail customers.

The average rental price of a midsize car has risen to about $57 a day this year, from $52 last year, according to Neil Abrams, president of Abrams Consulting Group in Purchase, N.Y., which follows the rental car business. A merger would make sense, he said, noting that "margins are flat." A combined company could probably squeeze millions of dollars in savings by eliminating back offices while continuing to operate all four brands as a way to segment the market.

"The only question," Mr. Abrams added, "is whether they are both chasing after the same customer."

And a deal would face antitrust scrutiny from regulators.

Fred Fleischner, a spokesman for Dollar Thrifty, declined to comment, citing the company's policy "not to comment on rumors."

J. J. Rissi, a spokeswoman for Cerberus Capital Management, which owns Vanguard, also declined to comment.

A merger would be the latest in a flurry of deals in the car rental business. Hertz was bought from Ford Motor in December 2005 by a consortium of private equity firms. In November, Hertz went public at $15 a share. (It closed yesterday at $20.36.) Avis Budget Group was recently spun off in the breakup of the Cendant Corporation.

Last week, Dollar Thrifty, a publicly held company with a market value of $1.13 billion, may have signaled to the market that it is considering a deal. In a regulatory filing, the company said that it had amended its employment agreement with its chief executive, Gary L. Paxton, and with other top employees. The amendment redefined a change-of-control provision to more than 60 percent of the company, up from more than 50 percent. The changes also included how long employees had to wait before leaving the company with compensation.

A deal with Vanguard would most likely be a reverse merger, so that Vanguard would be the controlling shareholder.

Vanguard has tried to go public before. Last year it filed for an initial public offering, saying that it had earned $105.3 million in income from $2.89 billion in revenue in 2005. It said that it held a 20.5 percent market share in the top 125 airport markets where it operated, behind the Avis Budget Group, then controlled by Cendant, and Hertz. Vanguard paid a $122.6 million special dividend last June.

In that same filing, Vanguard said it had about 3,800 locations in 82 countries as of last June. Its fleet numbered about 300,000, the filing said. The company said it buys its fleet from General Motors and DaimlerChrysler, and had agreements with other manufacturers like Toyota and Kia.

Cerberus Capital Management acquired Vanguard out of bankruptcy for $240.1 million in cash when it was called the ANC Rental Corporation.

The National car rental brand first entered use in 1947, while Alamo emerged in 1973. In the mid-1990s, H. Wayne Huizenga's Republic Industries acquired both, combining them into ANC. Republic Industries, now known as AutoNation, spun off ANC in 2000. By 2001, ANC had filed for bankruptcy.

Dollar was founded in 1965 in Los Angeles and acquired by the Chrysler Corporation in 1990, making it part of the carmaker's Pentastar Transportation Group, alongside Thrifty. Chrysler filed for an initial public offering of the rental car unit in November 1997. The company has 400 locations worldwide, including 260 locations in the United States, and a fleet of 188,000 cars worldwide, mostly DaimlerChrysler models.

Judge Delays Caremark Vote (WSJ)

Ruling on CVS Offer Will Let Express Clarify Its Antitrust Questions

A Delaware judge waded into the thick of the two-way takeover struggle for Caremark Rx Inc., postponing a shareholder vote on CVS Corp.'s bid, while nudging Caremark to begin negotiations with rival Express Scripts Inc.

The rare step to enjoin -- or delay -- the vote gave a much-needed boost to Express, whose $27.3 billion bid for Caremark has been repeatedly rebuffed by Caremark's board.

Coincidentally or not, Delaware Chancellor William B. Chandler III delayed the vote until at least March 9 from Feb. 20. The March date is the day after Express is supposed to receive government notice about the length of an antitrust review, a factor that has long loomed over the merger saga.

Mr. Chandler questioned Caremark's insistence that it can't speak to Express because such a deal would likely run afoul of antitrust laws. He noted that Caremark appeared to have no such concerns when it reviewed potential transactions with Express in 2001, 2003 and 2005. The judge chided Caremark for disclosing those past discussions on Monday -- just eight days before the scheduled shareholder vote.

A shareholder might want more time to weigh his vote, Mr. Chandler wrote, "in the face of Caremark's present protestations that antitrust difficulties loom so large as to prevent the board of directors from even discussing" the Express offer.

"This Caremark board keeps leaving money on the table," said Stuart Grant, a partner of law firm Grant & Eisenhofer, who filed for the delay on behalf of a Louisiana police retirement fund. "How much more money do we have to see them leaving on the table?"

Antitrust worries are nonetheless a big part of any Express-Caremark combination, which would unite the country's second- and third-largest managers of pharmacy benefits. It is still quite possible that federal authorities could seek a "second request" for information that would be a big blow to Express's ambitions.

"Is the ruling good for us? No," said one person who is advocating a CVS-Caremark tie-up. "But it will flush out whether the antitrust risk is real."

CVS and Caremark have suffered a number of setbacks in recent days, after several proxy advisory firms recommended Caremark shareholders reject the CVS offer.

EXPRESS SCRIPTS' RESPONSE

Express Scripts said CVS's improved offer "can't paper over a flawed process." Read the full text8 of the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0131903

Earlier yesterday, CVS boosted its bid for Caremark by increasing a special cash dividend offered to Caremark shareholders to $6 a share from $2 a share. This was the second time CVS had sweetened its bid for Caremark in the face of the richer deal offered by Express Scripts, raising the total deal price by some $2.6 billion.

At the close of trading yesterday, the CVS deal was worth $59.53 for each Caremark share, while Express's cash-and-stock offer was valued at $61.37. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Caremark traded higher than both offers, at $62.88, up $1.97.

Caremark said it will seek shareholder "approval as soon as possible," but it didn't indicate a new date for such a meeting.

Judge Delays Caremark Shareholder Vote (AP)

By Rose French, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 14, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - A Delaware judge ordered Caremark Rx Inc. to delay a shareholder vote on a proposed acquisition by CVS Corp. just hours after the drugstore operator tripled the special cash dividend it proposes to pay as part of the deal.

CVS, of Woonsocket, R.I., is competing with a hostile offer from pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. to buy Caremark, though the Caremark board favors the CVS bid.

CVS said it would raise the dividend payment to Caremark shareholders from $2 per share to $6 after several shareholders and proxy advisers called the CVS offer too low. Analysts said the move likely is aimed at trying to win over Caremark shareholders before they vote next Tuesday.

The increased dividend will add about $1.7 billion in value to the CVS deal, previously estimated at $24 billion. That brings it roughly into line with the Express Scripts bid worth about $26 billion.

Caremark shares rose $2.19, or 3.5 percent, to $63.19 on the New York Stock Exchange where CVS shares fell 39 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $32.10. Express Scripts stock rose 96 cents to $75.69 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The CVS offer has already won antitrust approval. But the offer from Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., has yet to receive antitrust clearance. Express Scripts is the third-largest pharmacy benefits manager and Caremark is No. 2.

Investment advisory firms Glass, Lewis & Co., CtW Investment Group and Institutional Shareholder Services have said that Caremark's board has not succeeded in getting the best deal for its shareholders and urged before the latest dividend increase that Caremark shareholders reject the CVS bid.

"When this thing was first announced, shareholders were only getting around $50 per share. It's come a long way," Speller said. "Right now it seems to be all about the price and the price relative to the risk."

"This increased offer is a desperate move to salvage the deal," Garland said. "Frankly what happened today reinforces shareholder concerns here. It was a terribly flawed process the Caremark board went through that failed to maximize value for Caremark shareholders.

Institutional Shareholder Services is continuing to recommend a vote against the Caremark and CVS merger, spokeswoman Sarah Cohn said.

Representatives with Glass, Lewis & Co. in San Francisco could not be immediately reached for comment.

Express Scripts said in news release that Caremark shareholders should vote against the proposed merger of CVS and Caremark to "send a message to the (Caremark) board that it is time to level the playing field."

"It is time for the Board to allow a full and fair process to determine what is in the best interests of Caremark stockholders," the company said.

Judge Delays Caremark-CVS Vote (SLPD)

By Mary Jo Feldstein, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 14, 2007

Express Scripts Inc. on Tuesday got more time to charm Caremark Rx shareholders when a judge delayed a vote on whether the company should merge with CVS Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0131904

The judge delayed the Caremark shareholders' vote until at least March 9, giving them more time to evaluate a higher CVS offer made public Tuesday as well as disclosures about the deal that surfaced in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing on Monday.

The delay also gives Express Scripts, based in Maryland Heights, a chance to win regulatory approval for its bid before the shareholders' vote.

Express Scripts should learn by March 8 whether the Federal Trade Commission would approve a Caremark—Express Scripts deal or whether regulators require a lengthy investigation to decide the matter. Express Scripts' lack of FTC approval has hurt its ability to gain the support of Caremark's shareholders.

CVS, the nation's No. 2 retail drug chain, announced in November its plan to combine with Caremark, based in Nashville, Tenn. Its bid was a $21 billion, all-stock offer that it said would create a new dynamic in the pharmaceutical industry.

Express Scripts is the nation's No. 3 pharmacy-benefits manager. In December, it countered CVS's bid for Caremark with a cash-and-stock offer valued at $26 billion and a vision of a larger, stronger pharmacy-benefits management company.

CVS first sweetened its bid in January, saying it would pay Caremark shareholders a special cash dividend of $2 a share when the deal closed. CVS raised its offer for Caremark again on Tuesday, tripling the special dividend to $6 a share.

The higher bid came a day after several shareholder groups — including Institutional Shareholder Services, the nation's largest investment adviser — opposed the CVS offer, saying Caremark shareholders could do better.

Using Tuesday's closing prices, the revised CVS offer of $59.59 a share trailed the Express Scripts bid of $61.37 and Caremark's share price of $62.88, up $1.97 in trading Tuesday. Shares of Express Scripts gained 68 cents to close at $75.41, while shares of CVS lost 40 cents to close at $32.09.

Meanwhile, analysts said Express Scripts and CVS might need to push their offers higher if they want to secure the support of Caremark's shareholders.

"Our analysis suggests that Express Scripts can possibly raise its bid to about $65," Arthur I. Henderson, an analyst with Jefferies & Co. in Nashville. "Beyond that price, we wouldn't be surprised if Express Scripts walks away from its acquisition offer and initiates its $1 billion accelerated buyback" of its own shares.

Negotiations with Express Scripts might yield a higher price, but Caremark's board has been unwilling to talk. Caremark has said the CVS offer is strategically superior, but its board's refusal to negotiate with Express Scripts has led to questions about whether it is acting in the shareholders' best interest.

A large group of Caremark shareholders on Tuesday pushed hard for a delay on the merger vote, saying they did not have enough time to consider the revised offer from CVS. The judge agreed.

"Caremark shareholders face irreparable harm if they are forced to make their decision without adequate time to consider relevant information revealed by defendants almost on the eve of a vote," Chancellor William B. Chandler III, the judge in Delaware overseeing the case, said in a letter to lawyers.

Express Scripts praised the delay, saying it is "time for the Caremark board to engage in a full and fair process to determine" the shareholders' best interest. Caremark said it would inform shareholders of the delay as soon as possible and that it looks forward to closing the deal with CVS as soon as possible.

Chandler said the revised offer, coupled with disclosures filed Monday with the SEC, convinced him that Caremark shareholders needed more time.

Caremark said Monday that on at least three occasions it has considered deals with Express Scripts. Shareholders might consider this "highly relevant," Chandler said.

"This is particularly true in the face of Caremark's present protestations that antitrust difficulties loom so large as to prevent the board of directors from even discussing an (Express Scripts) offer with an admittedly higher dollar value," Chandler said.

Caremark's directors are being investigated by the SEC in connection with possible options backdating. Related shareholder lawsuits could be void if Caremark merges with another company, Caremark said Monday. Chandler said that development also could "significantly" alter whether Caremark shareholders would agree to a merger.

While Caremark shareholders have been slow to embrace the deal with CVS, they haven't run toward Express Scripts either.

DOJ_NMG_0131905

So far, Express Scripts has obtained 4.3 million shares, or about 1 percent of Caremark's stock, through its tender offer. On Tuesday, it extended the expiration date of its offer to March 16.

Siemens And ABB Offices Raided In EU Cartel Probe (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels And Richard Milne In Frankfurt

Financial Times, February 14, 2007

The antitrust problems that have engulfed Siemens and several of its engineering rivals deepened yesterday when the European Commission raided the offices of several manufacturers in Germany, France and Austria in connection with a cartel probe.

The Commission refused to identify the companies targeted in the raids but Siemens and ABB confirmed that their offices had been searched.

Brussels said the groups were suspected of forming a price-fixing cartel in the market for transformers, key components in the power grid in controlling the voltage. Siemens said in a statement that the Brussels antitrust watchdog was investigating five companies, and added: "The EU Commission is investigating collusion in the area of power transformers in Germany, Austria and the Netherlands between 1999 and 2003."

The Commission refused to confirm the precise extent of its probe.

The raids are deeply troubling for the groups involved, coming weeks after Siemens, ABB, Alstom and other engineering companies were found guilty of operating another cartel in the market for electricity transmission systems. The groups were together fined a record €751m ($978m), with Siemens alone accounting for €397m of the total.

Companies that are found guilty of operating a cartel face fines of up to 10 per cent of their global annual turnover. The Commission is particularly tough on repeat offenders and, under new rules introduced last year, Siemens and its peers could find their fines being double the normal level should they be found guilty in any new case resulting from this month's raids.

The German engineering group said yesterday it had suspended three employees in connection with the probe at the power transmission division.

Udo Niehage, the president of Siemens' power transmission and distribution group, said: "Isolated incidents of this nature cast a bad light on the strong achievements of all other employees. This cannot be tolerated."

Siemens' latest woes come on top of a €420m bribery scandal that has tainted Siemens' image and raised questions about the competence of the German industrial group's controls and management.

The scandal has focused mainly on the telecoms division.

Siemens has denied wrongdoing and blamed a group of rogue employees.

In the cartel case, the Commission is likely to spend months, if not years, sifting the evidence and drawing up formal charges against the groups which will then get the chance to defend themselves in a hearing in Brussels before the Commission reaches its final verdict.

A spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, stressed that the raids in themselves did not prejudge the outcome of the investigation.

For Aluminum Companies, A Crush Of Consolidation? (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta And Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Aluminum companies may be next in line for consolidation as mining conglomerates scour for takeover targets.

Speculation is building that BHP Billiton Ltd., Rio Tinto PLC or another mining titan could bid to buy one of the world's aluminum heavyweights, particularly Pittsburgh's Alcoa Inc. or Alcan Inc. of Montreal.

Doing so would enable BHP or Rio Tinto to consolidate its position in the growing aluminum market, while preventing competitors from snatching up the few remaining blue-chip players at a time of accelerating consolidation in the natural-resources sector.

DOJ_NMG_0131906

Speculation about a possible transaction involving Alcoa yesterday boosted the Dow Jones Industrial Average, of which Alcoa is one of the 30 member stocks. Alcoa climbed $2.10, or 6.4%, to $35 on the New York Stock Exchange. Alcan was up $2.56, or 4.9%, to $54.75, also on the Big Board.

In London trading, BHP shares rose 2.6% to £10.76 ($20.95), while Rio Tinto rose 2.5% to £27.53. The two companies also have shares traded in Sydney, Australia, where they both declined slightly.

The price of aluminum, which is used to make everything from soda cans to airplane parts, has lagged behind some other metals in the recent commodity boom. In part, that is because China -- a driver of demand -- produces significant quantities of its own, diminishing the need for imports. Still, analysts believe global demand will continue to rise.

Rumors of a large aluminum deal have floated for more than a year, heating up again in recent days, after the Times of London reported that BHP and Rio Tinto had both "drawn up plans" for a $40 billion takeover of Alcoa. Rio Tinto and BHP declined to comment on the speculation, and Alcoa officials have played down the report. "We view this as rumors and rumors only," said Kevin Lowery, a spokesman for Alcoa.

Some analysts say they believe the rumors of interest from Rio Tinto and BHP are credible, though they remain far from certain a deal will occur, in part because they think the $40 billion price might be too high.

There are good reasons why a big aluminum deal might be attractive. Mining companies have struggled in recent years to find and develop new sources of raw-material supplies, and many of them believe it is safer to pick up assets through acquisitions than attempting higher-risk exploration projects.

Also, mining companies are awash in cash on profits earned since the commodity boom took off four years ago. Shareholders are clamoring for the companies to find new ways of spending that money to ensure they have strong growth prospects in the next decade.

Despite a somewhat uncertain outlook for commodity prices this year, long-term aluminum demand is expected to remain strong world-wide, with global consumption doubling to 60.6 million metric tons by 2020, according to Alcoa estimates. A metric ton is equal to 2,204.62 pounds.

There also are important reasons why a deal might not come together. Consolidating more aluminum output under one roof could raise hackles with antitrust regulators, especially since BHP and Rio Tinto already have sizable aluminum assets.

Alcoa and Alcan also come with significant "downstream" assets, such as smelters, that mining companies typically prefer to unload as they focus their businesses on the work of digging ore and minerals out of the ground rather than making that ore into metal.

Most big mining companies prefer to spread their risk over a number of basic commodities, and absorbing the bauxite and alumina assets of either Alcoa or Alcan could make them too reliant on a product already in their portfolio whose price growth might not match other commodities, analysts say. If BHP acquired Alcoa, for example, roughly 25% of its earnings would come from aluminum, compared with about 8% today, says Mark Pervan, an analyst at Daiwa Securities in Australia.

He reckons an offer from Rio Tinto is somewhat more likely.

Some analysts believe there is another, perhaps even more likely, suitor for an aluminum company such as Alcoa or Alcan: Xstrata PLC. The Swiss company has expanded through acquisitions, and some analysts believe it is keen to cement its place among the world's diversified mining titans before the good times end. That group includes not only BHP Billiton and Rio Tinto but also Companhia Vale do Rio Doce of Brazil and Anglo American PLC of London.

Xstrata said it couldn't comment on any merger speculation.

It also is possible mining companies will wind up preferring Alcan over Alcoa. Although Alcoa has overshadowed Alcan by many business measurements for years, that dynamic may be starting to reverse. After a 2003 acquisition of French aluminum company Pechiney SA and a reorganization, Alcan found itself on par with Alcoa in terms of some divisions and assets, though Alcoa remains the larger company, with a market value of $27 billion compared with Alcan's $18 billion. Alcan stock was up 19% in the past three years, while Alcoa's was down 15%, before yesterday's stock jump. "You can say Alcan has done better, period," says John Tumazos, a metals analyst with Prudential Securities in New York.

Google Said To Violate Copyright Laws (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0131907

By Thomas Crampton

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 13 — A Brussels court ruled Tuesday that Google had violated copyright laws by publishing links to articles from Belgian newspapers without permission. Legal experts said the case could have broad implications in Europe for the news indexes provided by search engines.

The ruling, which Google said it would appeal, was hailed by some newspaper industry representatives and may also have an impact on a lawsuit against Google by the news service Agence France-Presse.

"As the first decision to condemn a search engine for indexing news articles, you can be sure publishers around the world are paying attention," said Cyril Fabre, a lawyer in Paris at Alexen, a law firm specializing in Internet law and intellectual property. "The implications in Europe are particularly strong since copyright law is so uniform across the Continent."

The Brussels court ruled that Google, which operates the dominant Internet search engine, must pay 25,000 euros, or $32,600, for each day it displayed content from the plaintiff publications in violation of copyright. The court scaled back a September ruling that called for damages of up to 1 million euros a day and required Google to publish the judgment on its home page.

The group that brought the case, Copiepresse, manages copyright issues for more than one dozen Belgian newspapers, most published in French. It said it had also asked the French division of Yahoo to stop showing the group's news reports.

"Today we celebrate a victory for content producers," said Margaret Boribon, secretary-general of Copiepresse. "We showed that Google cannot make profit for free from the credibility of our newspaper brands, hard work of our journalists and skill of our photographers."

Google carries advertising on its general Belgian site, Google.be, but not in its news index. Links to the publications represented by Copiepresse have already been removed from both.

The lawsuit, filed shortly after Google introduced the Belgian news site in January 2006, originally included two organizations representing journalists and photographers, but they reached a deal with the search engine. Google said the accord involved making use of content in new ways, but would not elaborate.

"Google also tried to offer us a deal, but it was ridiculously small compared with the deals the others got," Ms. Boribon said. She indicated that the publishers were seeking a revenue-sharing arrangement.

Yoram Elkaim, a lawyer in Paris for Google, said, "I am not aware of any such discussions with the Copiepresse folks."

Google believes that pointing to content on the Web is legal under copyright law, Mr. Elkaim added. "We have always explained that any licensing agreements Google does with content providers is for use that goes beyond indexing or referencing," he said.

Jessica Powell, a spokeswoman in London for Google, said the main complaints in the case — making reference to articles without prior permission, and the continued availability of articles in Google's database after newspapers have restricted access to them — are issues easily rectified without legal action.

"This is an isolated case, and it would be inaccurate to portray Google News as standing in conflict with the publishing industry," she said.

Legal experts in the United States said the decision would have no direct impact there. But if upheld, they said, it could result in headaches for Google on both sides of the Atlantic.

"It could set up a chain reaction, especially in European countries, where the authors' rights are stronger," said Pamela Samuelson, a law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, and the co-director of the Berkeley Center for Law and Policy. "If a Belgian court causes Google to change its ways, by preventing links from happening or forcing it to pay, other countries and other newspapers and other entities that have put things on the Web could say 'me too.' "

Still, she said, "I think that argument that linking is an infringement is not a particularly strong argument."

Some newspaper representatives hailed the ruling. "Today was a victory for copyright protection," said Larry Kilman, a spokesman in Paris for the World Association of Newspapers. "Search engines cannot unilaterally decide what happens to content."

DOJ_NMG_0131908

Yet Mr. Kilman added that Google and newspapers have clear benefits from working with each other. Google uses the content to attract users, and newspapers use the traffic to increase readership.

The case on which the court decision will probably have the most direct impact is a lawsuit filed against Google in February 2005 in France by Agence France-Presse. The initial briefs have been exchanged for the case, which awaits a trial date before the Paris commercial court. A.F.P. has a separate case against Google in the United States.

"We are making many of the same legal arguments as Copiepresse," said Asim Singh, a lawyer at Sokolow, Carreras & Partners, which represents A.F.P. in the French lawsuit. "And there is no jurisdiction closer to French law than Belgium."

A Google Loss In Europe May Spur Other Lawsuits (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick In London And Anne Jolis In Brussels

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

As media companies around the globe grapple with how they are compensated when their material is shared online, a Belgian court said Google Inc. can't post news articles from local newspapers on its Web sites in Belgium.

In a closely watched ruling, the Brussels Court of First Instance said Google can't offer any links to articles or post any articles or photographs from French- and German-language Belgian newspapers. (No Dutch-language Belgian newspapers participated in the suit.) The judgment upheld the court's initial ruling in September, which the Internet-search firm had challenged.

A Google spokeswoman said the Mountain View, Calif., company plans to appeal. "We believe Google News is entirely legal," she said. The company has always argued that the use by Google News of headlines and introductory paragraphs from articles published on the Web doesn't breach copyrights.

The ruling may provide ammunition for other news associations. Already, Agence France Presse, the French wire service, is suing Google in U.S. District Court in Washington, accusing it of violating AFP's copyright by using its headlines, photographs and story fragments in Google News. AFP is demanding payment when Google uses excerpts of its articles and photographs in the U.S.

Also in the U.S., the Authors Guild and a group of major publishers backed by the Association of American Publishers have brought two separate suits against Google in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, alleging Google is abusing their copyright by digitizing books without permission in order to make their contents searchable on the Web. Google has denied wrongdoing in all three cases; all are still pending.

Copiepresse s.c.c.r.l, a group that collects copyright fees for publishers and represented the Belgian newspapers, said it is open to letting its stories appear on Google, as long as Google pays for them, said Margaret Boribon, secretary-general of Copiepresse.

The court decision stops Google News, a site featuring summaries of articles published on the Web, and www.google.be, Belgium's most popular Internet-search engine, from publishing even snippets of stories as well as full stories and photographs.

In Google's favor, the court reduced the fine for copyright violation set in September to $30,000 a day from $1.3 million a day. It is unclear how big a penalty Google faces, since it removed links to the newspapers after the initial ruling.

While Belgium's media market is tiny, lawyers said the decision could trigger similar litigation in France, Italy, Spain and Germany, especially if Google's appeal fails. "I would expect in other European countries there will be copycat suits," said Thomas Vinje, an Internet lawyer at London law firm Clifford Chance LLP, who isn't involved in the case.

But Denis Bouchez, director of the French National Newspaper Association, said, "We're not going to sue them for the time being."

Earlier this week, News Corp., Viacom Inc., Sony Corp., General Electric Co.'s NBC Universal, Time Warner Inc. and Walt Disney Co. accused Google of supporting two Web sites offering access to illegal movie downloads. In response, Google said it prohibits its advertisers from selling copyright-infringing materials.

In Belgium, Copiepresse also is pursuing other Internet-search engines and sent letters to Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp. Copiepresse said it demanded the search engines remove its members' material from their news sites until they agree to ask permission and pay before using it, or face fines.

DOJ_NMG_0131909

Yahoo spokesman Alex Laity said Yahoo has temporarily removed the links, though he said that "our activity complies with all legal requirements." Microsoft declined to comment.

Mills Spurns Earlier Suitor For Higher Bid (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Mills Corp., the troubled Chevy Chase mall developer, said yesterday that it favored a $1.6 billion offer from Simon Property Group and hedge fund Farallon Capital Management instead of an earlier takeover agreement with Brookfield Asset Management.

Mills said its board of directors concluded that the Simon-Farallon offer, $24 per share, was "superior" to Brookfield's proposed deal of $21 per share, valued at $1.35 billion. The board authorized Mills to end the deal with Brookfield. When it was offered in January, Brookfield's bid represented an 18 percent premium over the price of Mills stock, but the share price has since jumped on news of a possible merger.

Mills, which owns 38 shopping centers nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, said in a statement that it would give Brookfield three days to top its previous offer, however, before it breaks the agreement signed Jan. 17. The company said it was "ready and willing to negotiate such an amendment" with Brookfield, which is headquartered in Toronto.

Katherine Vyse, a spokeswoman for Brookfield, declined to comment.

Along with the higher price, Mills said its board preferred the Simon-Farallon deal because it could be closed more quickly. If it ends the Brookfield agreement, Mills would likely absorb a $40 million breakup fee, but some Wall Street analysts said that was not a considerable amount.

Mill shares closed yesterday at 26.24, up 49 cents, or about 2 percent.

Mills, one of the first developers of oversize malls known as mega-malls, has struggled in the past year with accounting problems and heavy debt that the company said in January could push it into bankruptcy.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating Mills's accounting missteps, which the company said were widespread and could cost shareholders up to $352 million in equity. Mills has yet to file its 2005 annual earnings report and plans to restate earnings as far back as 2001.

To prepare for a sale, Mills has shed major assets, including its stake in the $2 billion Meadowlands Xanadu mall project in northern New Jersey and replaced almost all of its top management.

Had Brookfield acquired Mills, it would have been its first venture into North American retail real estate. It has timber and power holdings, along with commercial real estate that includes the World Financial Center in New York.

Plant Death Costs Honeywell $12 Million (AP)

AP, February 14, 2007

Honeywell Agrees to Pay $12 Million to Settle Chemical Plant Death Charge

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) -- Honeywell International Inc. has agreed to pay $12 million in fines and restitution resulting from a fatal accident at its Baton Rouge chemical plant in 2003, the Justice Department said Tuesday.

Honeywell agreed to plead guilty to violating the federal Clean Air Act, U.S. Attorney David Dugas said in a news release. A court date for formally entering the plea has not been set.

The charge stemmed from an accident at the plant on July 29, 2003. A plant worker, Delvin Henry, was doused by a corrosive material after opening a vat that had been labeled as containing a benign refrigerant. He died from his injuries the next day.

Through the plea agreement, Henry's three children will receive $2 million. The company also will pay an $8 million criminal fine, $750,000 to the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality, $750,000 to the Louisiana State Police hazardous materials unit and $500,000 to the state police emergency operations center.

Dugas said much of the alleged negligent conduct contained in the charge occurred during the 1990s involving many people who no longer work for the company.

Honeywell cooperated fully and has implemented changes at the plant since the accidents, prosecutors said.

Peter Dalpe, a spokesman for Morris Township, N.J.-based Honeywell, said that, over the past several years, the company has "made substantial investments in expertise, equipment and personnel at the Baton Rouge facility and have significantly improved safety performance there."

Shares of Honeywell rose 42 cents Tuesday to close at $46.51 on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Agency Violated Law In Seed Case, Judge Rules (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the Agriculture Department violated the law by failing to adequately assess possible environmental impacts before approving Monsanto's genetically engineered alfalfa.

Judge Charles R. Breyer of Federal District Court in San Francisco said the agency had been "cavalier" in deciding that a full environmental impact statement was not needed because the potential environmental and economic effects of the crop were not significant.

Plaintiffs in the case — some alfalfa seed companies and environmental and farm advocacy groups — said they would push to stop the sales and planting of the alfalfa, which is resistant to Monsanto's Roundup herbicide.

Joseph Mendelson, legal director of the Center for Food Safety, a Washington advocacy group that organized the lawsuit, said the decision by itself could block commercial sales of genetically engineered alfalfa seeds but that the plaintiffs would ask for an injunction to make sure. Judge Breyer asked the parties to meet and propose remedies to him by Feb. 26.

Christopher R. Horner, a spokesman for Monsanto, said the company had not seen the decision but thought it would not affect its business. Monsanto was not named in the suit, which was filed against the Agriculture Department.

Calls to several spokesmen for the Agriculture Department were not returned. A recording in the department's communications office said the government closed early yesterday because of expected bad weather in Washington.

A federal judge in Washington said last week that the Agriculture Department had not done adequate assessments before approving field trials of genetically engineered grass. And last August a federal judge in Hawaii, in a case involving field trials of crops engineered to produce pharmaceuticals, ruled that the Agriculture Department had not adequately assessed the possible impact on endangered species.

Mr. Mendelson of the Center for Food Safety said yesterday's decision could set a precedent that would require the Agriculture Department to do full impact statements for other biotech crops before they are approved.

The Roundup Ready alfalfa was deregulated by the Agriculture Department in June 2005, meaning it could be grown outside of field trials. It was the first approval in years of a new genetically engineered crop. Because alfalfa is the fourth most widely planted crop in the United States, the action presented a big opportunity for Monsanto.

The Agriculture Department had first done an environmental assessment, which concluded that a longer and more detailed environmental impact statement was not needed. This was in part, the agency said, because the implanted gene conferring herbicide resistance was harmless to people and livestock.

But Judge Breyer, in his 20-page opinion, said that the agency had not adequately considered the possibility that the gene could be transferred by pollen to organic or conventional alfalfa, hurting sales of organic farmers or exports to countries like Japan that did not want the genetically engineered variety.

"An action which potentially eliminates or at least greatly reduces the availability of a particular plant — here, nonengineered alfalfa — has a significant effect on the human environment," he wrote.

The judge also said that the Agriculture Department had too easily dismissed the possibility that planting Roundup-resistant alfalfa would lead to wider use of Roundup, which in turn would contribute to the development of weeds resistant to the popular herbicide. That is particularly a risk, he said, because many other crops like soybeans and corn are also resistant to Roundup, which is known generically as glyphosate.

DOJ_NMG_0131911

"One would expect that some federal agency is considering whether there is some risk to engineering all of America's crops to include the gene that confers resistance to glyphosate," he wrote.

Energy CEOs Encourage Emissions Caps (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Corporate CEOs do not usually come to Capitol Hill to lobby for more government regulation. But that's what a group of executives did Tuesday, urging Congress to cap emissions blamed for global warming.

Peter Darbee, chairman and chief executive officer of PG&E Corp. — parent of California's largest utility, Pacific Gas and Electric Co. — called for the United States to be "at the forefront of addressing global climate change" by approving a mandatory program to reduce greenhouse gases.

Charles O. Holliday Jr., chairman and chief executive of DuPont Co., added that he believed "voluntary efforts alone will not solve the problem."

Proponents of a mandatory program for reducing greenhouse gas emissions see support from such businessmen as crucial to getting legislation through the narrowly divided Congress and past President Bush's veto pen.

The executives were invited to appear at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee hearing by its chairwoman, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has made passage of legislation addressing global warming her top priority.

The testimony from the executives, including Steve Elbert, vice chairman of BP America, was intended to rebut arguments that mandatory caps on emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases would be bad for business and drive up costs.

The CEOs impressed at least one Republican. "You got my attention," Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) told them.

Still, he remained noncommittal on whether he would support a mandatory-cap bill.

Some other committee Republicans, however, dismissed the CEOs' testimony, underscoring the challenge facing proponents of emission caps.

Sen. James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, perhaps Congress' leading skeptic of human activity as a cause of global warming, accused the executives of advocating limits in order to boost investments by their companies in cleaner energy sources, such as solar power.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) contended that mandatory caps would lead to higher energy costs in his state, which is heavily dependent on coal-fired power. Coal-fired power plants are a major source of carbon dioxide emissions.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who is sponsoring a bill that would cap emissions from power plants, acknowledged that there was "not much Republican support" for such measures. But he said that he thought there would be more support after the CEOs' testimony.

The hearing was one of four on climate change held Tuesday on Capitol Hill. Several more are scheduled in the weeks ahead, including one featuring former Vice President Al Gore, an outspoken advocate of taking steps to curb global warming.

Other supporters of such efforts have been heartened by the attention being devoted to the issue in the Democratic-controlled Congress.

The executives who testified Tuesday are part of a coalition of companies and environmental groups that have called for a "cap and trade" program that would allow companies that reduce emissions to below a level set by the federal government to sell credits to companies that exceed the cap. Its backers say the program is designed to ensure that the overall emission level is met, without seriously hindering some businesses.

Exxon Chief Cautions Against Rapid Action To Cut Carbon Emissions (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss And Jad Mouawad

New York Times, February 14, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 13 — The chief executive of Exxon Mobil, Rex W. Tillerson, warned Tuesday that governments should not rush into policies that could damage the global economy in order to limit carbon emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0131912

In a speech at a major industry gathering, Mr. Tillerson acknowledged that the planet was warming while carbon dioxide levels were increasing, suggesting a more accommodating position than the hard-nosed stance Exxon had held.

But in the same speech, Mr. Tillerson, who leads the world's largest publicly traded company, gave an unalloyed defense of the oil industry and predicted that hydrocarbons would dominate the world's transportation as energy demand grows by an expected 40 percent by 2030.

There is no significant alternative to oil in coming decades and Exxon will continue to make oil and natural gas its primary products, he said.

"The scale advantages of oil and natural gas across a broad array of applications provide economic value unmatched by any alternative," he said.

Mr. Tillerson's tone, if not the substance of his remarks, at times broke with the rigid positions of his predecessor, Lee Raymond, who has long been considered a skeptic in the global warming debate.

"That's Exxon-speak," said Barbara Shook, an analyst for Energy Intelligence Group, a publishing and information services company. "It's their own dialect, but if you look at where Exxon was one and a half years ago they may not have shifted their position 180 degrees, but they are moving."

Mr. Tillerson's remarks were his first formal and extensive comments since the publication of a report two weeks ago by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a leading panel of international scientists and reviewers, concluding that there is 90 percent certainty that human activity is decisive in changing the global climate.

Mr. Tillerson told reporters that he had not read the report but said, "My understanding is there's not a clear 100 percent conclusion drawn." He added: "Nobody can conclusively 100 percent know how this is going to play out. I think that's important."

Taken together, his statements suggested that Exxon was navigating between positions defending oil as an energy source and its core business, and showing sensitivity to growing public concerns about a warming climate.

President Bush has called for increasing development and use of biofuels. And Democrats now controlling Congress have said they favor higher taxes on oil companies to pay for research in alternative energy.

Mr. Tillerson acknowledged a small role for alternative fuels in the future, saying he thought that ethanol and other types of biofuels have "an important role to play" given the projected growth in energy demand.

He poked fun, however, at ethanol, calling it "moonshine."

"I am not an expert on biofuels," he said. "I am not an expert on farming. I don't have a lot of technology to add to moonshine."

But it was on the subject of global warming that Mr. Tillerson drew the most interest from energy leaders at the conference, which was organized by the energy consulting firm Cambridge Energy Research Associates.

"The risks to society and ecosystems from climate change could prove to be significant," Mr. Tillerson said. "So, despite the uncertainties, it is prudent to develop and implement sensible strategies that address these risks."

But at the end of speechmaking and answering questions, Mr. Tillerson expressed concern that policy makers could damage the world economy with precipitous environmental policies. He warned that future generations could be sorry for hasty policies taken today without more careful study.

"This is a centuries-long kind of problem, and we are going to learn more as we go," he said.

He noted that some scientific reports describing models of climate change concluded with a "range of potential outcomes." He added: "A range implies a certain degree of uncertainty. Policy decisions need to accommodate that uncertainty."

Exxon, which has had record earnings the last two years, has been a target of environmental groups for financing organizations that have questioned climate science and for its business activities around the world. Much of the emissions of greenhouse gases blamed for global warming come from the burning of fossil fuels like gasoline and natural gas.

Mr. Tillerson said his company supported breakthrough research in cellulosic ethanol, which is made from grasses and woodchips, and he was clear about Exxon's role. "There is really nothing I see Exxon can bring to this," he said. "We don't see a direct role for ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0131913

The report by the panel on climate change was widely considered the most authoritative study on the subject. It said for the first time that global warming was unequivocal and concluded that human activity had very likely caused most of the rise in temperatures since 1950. The report said that global warming could be blunted by prompt action.

Mr. Tillerson defended the energy industry as being environmentally responsible. "The footprint required of our activities is getting smaller and more efficient," he said, "proving that energy production and environmental protection need not be a zero-sum."

Coke Dealer Gets 24 Years In Prison (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 14, 2007

Mario Luis Rojas Jr., 39, a fugitive for 7 ½ years, a $3-million con man and bigtime cocaine trafficker, officially closed the family business Friday.

His new life begins in a federal prison, where he'll serve a 24-year sentence thanks to U.S. District Judge Bruce Kauffman. Rojas earlier pleaded guilty to conspiracy and three counts of distribution of cocaine.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Ewald Zittlau had asked for a 27-year-term, but suggested that Rojas receive credit for his time in custody here and in Mexico.

The Colombian drug trafficker, who hired his brother and two sisters and a family friend for his drug ring, admitted importing 750 kilos of cocaine to Philadelphia in the late 1990s in shipments of 104 kilos, 295 kilos and 351 kilos.

His saga began on Sept. 1, 1998, when he was arrested with 104 kilos of cocaine in the Northeast by city and Bucks County authorities and state troopers. Rojas agreed to cooperate.

So the state put Rojas up in the now-closed Adams Mark Hotel, at Monument Road and City Avenue, where he was debriefed with round-the-clock troopers in the next room.

Within 12 days, he had bribed a high school buddy, state trooper Antonio Romero, Jr., with a promise of a $3 million payday in return for a key to escape.

Rojas then reneged on the $3 million and his deal to cooperate and fled to Mexico, where he resumed shipping cocaine to Philadelphia, said Zittlau.

During an investigation of the escape, the FBI conducted a "reverse sting" and supplied the trooper's cousin, Jose L. Davila, with five kilograms of "sham" cocaine as if it were a partial payment of the $3 million owed by Rojas.

The FBI arrested Davila, who quickly turned on his cousin and taped Romero, an 11-year trooper assigned to the Belmont barracks, giving the go-ahead to sell the coke.

Investigators also learned that Romero had been stealing small amounts of marijuana evidence for a year, between 1997 and 1998.

After his arrest, Romero admitted his role in the escape and to giving nearly 50 pounds of weed to Davila to sell and the two split the profits.

At sentencing, a tearful Romero asked for mercy, but was slammed with eight years in prison and five years supervised release on drug and extortion charges, while troopers, agents and cops who worked with him glared at the turncoat.

Davila was sentenced to a year and a day, five years' supervised release and a $1,200 fine.

Meantime, the U.S. Department of Justice notified Mexico of the warrant for Rojas' arrest. Authorities arrested him in Mexico City on Sept. 23, 1999.

For 5 ½ years, Rojas fought extradition to the U.S., then complained at his sentencing that he suffered cruel and unusual punishment because he was cooped up with 17 inmates in one Mexican cell.

Asked why he fought extradition if conditions were so bad, his attorney, Dennis Cogan, told the court that Rogas fought extradition on the advice of his Mexican attorneys.

DOJ_NMG_0131914

At sentencing, Rojas apologized to his parents and a sister for getting two sisters, Marilyn and Naydia Rojas, 33, and 34, respectively, and his little brother, Mauricio Rojas, 29, involved in the drug business, as well as a family friend, Jorge Aldea, 35.

His brother and both sisters each received 10-year federal prison terms, and his friend, Aldea, was sentenced to 20 years.

More Medical Pot Needed For Science, Judge Says (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 13, 2007

Washington - Medical researchers need more marijuana sources because government supplies aren't meeting scientific demand, a federal judge has ruled.

In an emphatic but nonbinding opinion, the Drug Enforcement Administration's own judge is recommending that a University of Massachusetts professor be allowed to grow a legal pot crop. The real winners could be those suffering from painful and wasting diseases, proponents believe.

"The existing supply of marijuana is not adequate," Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen Bittner ruled.

The federal government's 12-acre marijuana plot at the University of Mississippi provides neither the quantity nor quality scientists need, researchers contend.

The DEA isn't required to follow Bittner's 88-page opinion, and the Bush administration's anti-drug stance may make it unlikely that the pot-growing rules will loosen. A decision is still months away, the DEA said.

The American Civil Liberties Union's Drug Law Reform Project has been representing University of Massachusetts scientist Lyle Craker. Since 2001, Craker has been confronting numerous bureaucratic and legal obstacles in his request for permission to grow marijuana for research in such areas as developing vaporizers that can efficiently deliver pot smoke.

The latest research made public this week indicated that marijuana provided more pain relief for AIDS patients than prescription drugs did.

The Bush administration quickly dismissed those findings as a "smoke screen," and it has remained hostile to Craker's research efforts.

More Medical Marijuana Needed (FB)

Fresno Bee, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - Medical researchers need more marijuana because government supplies aren't meeting scientific demand, a federal judge has ruled.

In an emphatic but non-binding opinion, the Drug Enforcement Administration's own judge is recommending that a University of Massachusetts professor be allowed to grow his own legal pot crop. The real winners could be those suffering from painful diseases, proponents believe.

"The existing supply of marijuana is not adequate," Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen Bittner ruled.

The federal government's sole marijuana farm at the University of Mississippi produces neither the quantity nor the quality of marijuana that scientists need, researchers contend. While Bittner did not embrace those criticisms, she agreed the current system for producing and distributing research marijuana is flawed.

"Competition in the manufacture of marijuana for research purposes is inadequate," Bittner determined.

The DEA is not required to follow Judge Bittner's 88-page opinion, and the Bush administration's anti-drug stance may make it unlikely that the grass-growing rules will loosen. Both sides will now get a chance to file comments on the opinion before DEA administrators make their ruling.

"We could still be months away from a final decision," DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said Tuesday afternoon, adding that "obviously, we're going to take the judge's opinion into consideration."

Still, the ruling issued late Monday and made public Tuesday is resonating in both labs and the worlds of civil libertarians.

"(The) ruling is an important step toward allowing medical marijuana patients to get their medicine from a pharmacy just like everyone else," said Allen Hopper, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union.

Based in California's seaside town of Santa Cruz, the ACLU's Drug Law Reform Project has been representing University of Massachusetts scientist Lyle Craker in the marijuana case. Since 2001, Craker has been confronting numerous bureaucratic and legal obstacles in his request for permission to grow research-grade marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0131915

"This ruling is a victory for science, medicine and the public good," Craker stated. "I hope that the DEA abides by the decision and grants me the opportunity to do my job unimpeded by drug war politics."

An agronomist with a doctorate from the University of Minnesota, Craker had been asked to grow bulk marijuana by a small group called the Multidisciplinary Approach for Psychedelic Studies. The latter group wants to conduct research in areas like developing vaporizers that can efficiently deliver pot smoke.

The latest research made public this week, quickly disputed by the White House, indicated that marijuana provided more pain relief than prescriptions drugs for AIDS patients.

"People have a right to know more about what might help them in their suffering and pain or illness, whatever it might be," former California legislator John Vasconcellos testified, in words repeated within Bittner's opinion. "The more research, the better."

The University of Mississippi has had a 12-acre outdoor plot and a monopoly on growing government-grade marijuana since 1968. The university sub-contracts with North Carolina's Research Triangle Institute, which runs a machine that can roll up to 1,000 finished marijuana cigarettes in an hour.

The government-grown pot is too "harsh," filled with stems and seeds and low in potency, some researchers testified.

"The material was of such poor quality, we did not deem it to be representative of medical cannibas," researcher Dr. Ethan Russo asserted.

Judge Sides With Botanist On Pot Supply (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 13, 2007

A Massachusetts botanist should be allowed to grow marijuana for medical study, a hearing officer said Monday in a ruling that would end a longtime government requirement that all federally approved researchers get their pot supplies from the University of Mississippi.

Because of the monopoly arrangement, in effect since 1968, "there is currently an inadequate supply of marijuana available for research purposes," said Mary Ellen Bittner, a Drug Enforcement Administration administrative law judge. She said the application by Lyle Craker, a University of Massachusetts professor of plant biology, "would be in the public interest."

The ruling is actually only a recommendation to the DEA, which supports the current policy. Agency spokesman Garrison Courtney said a deputy administrator would make the final decision after reviewing arguments from lawyers for the DEA staff and for Craker. The agency's decision could be appealed to a federal court in Washington, D.C.

"It's going to be a hard case to win," said Anjuli Verna of the American Civil Liberties Union's drug law reform project, which represents Craker. She said the court could overturn a DEA veto of Bittner's ruling only if it was found that the agency was acting arbitrarily.

Currently, all researchers on marijuana in the United States must obtain licenses and get their drug supplies from the National Institute on Drug Abuse, which has had an exclusive contract with the University of Mississippi for more than 38 years.

The government and the university project overseer say they supply high-quality marijuana, with varying potencies, to all researchers with a legitimate need, and currently provide the drug to nearly 500 patients in clinical trials. An exclusive contract is necessary, the DEA contends, to prevent diversion of the "most heavily abused" of drugs in the government's list of dangerous substances.

But the ACLU's Verna said many researchers have complained that the Mississippi marijuana is "very low-grade, low-potency," requiring increased usage -- with potential health problems -- to get the desired effect.

"Research is simply stymied," Verna said. She said government-approved researchers in other drugs, such as LSD and cocaine, can get their supplies from a number of laboratories.

Bittner said in her ruling that the quality of the government-supplied marijuana was "generally adequate," despite some problems. But she said some researchers with approved projects have been unable to obtain marijuana because of the federal policy. She also found little risk that marijuana grown by Craker would be diverted to illegal uses.

DOJ_NMG_0131916

Craker's application, first filed in 2001, was sponsored by an organization called the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies, which proposed to fund his indoor cultivation and provide the marijuana to federally approved researchers. Both of Massachusetts' senators, Democrats Edward Kennedy and John Kerry, have written to the DEA in support of Craker.

The agency turned Craker down in 2003, saying there was no need for additional research supplies.

DEA Judge Supports Medical Marijuana Research (NCG)

North County Gazette, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON - The American Civil Liberties Union applauded a ruling issued by a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration judge that recommends ending the federal government's 65- year monopoly on the supply of marijuana available for Food and Drug Administration-approved medical research.

The ACLU represents University of Massachusetts-Amherst Professor Lyle Craker, who petitioned the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) for a license to grow research-grade marijuana for use in privately-funded studies that aim to develop the plant into a legal, prescription medicine. The DEA judge ruled that it is in the public interest to end the federal National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) monopoly on the supply of marijuana that can be used in Food and Drug Administration (FDA)-approved research.

"For too long the DEA has inappropriately inserted politics into a regulatory process that should be left to the FDA and medical science," said Allen Hopper, an attorney with the ACLU Drug Law Reform Project. "We are pleased that the judge has recommended an end to the federal government's blockade of medical marijuana research."

The DEA must now either accept or reject the court's recommendation, and scientists, doctors and medical marijuana patients nationwide joined the ACLU in urging the agency to comply with the court's finding and halt federal obstruction of medical marijuana research.

"This ruling is a victory for science, medicine and the public good," said Professor Craker. "I hope that the DEA abides by the decision and allows the work to go forward unimpeded by drug war politics." The ruling issued Monday, Feb. 12 by U.S. Department of Justice-appointed Administrative Law Judge Mary Ellen Bittner marks a major step forward in the six year struggle by Professor Craker to gain a DEA license to grow research-grade marijuana for use by other scientists in privately funded, government-approved studies.

Following nine days of hearings, testimony and evidence from both sides, including from researchers who reported that the government denied their requests for marijuana for use in FDA-approved research protocols, Judge Bittner concluded, "that there is currently an inadequate supply of marijuana available for research purposes…" and that, "Respondent's registration to cultivate marijuana would be in the public interest."

Thirty-eight members of Congress and a broad range of scientific and medical organizations have joined Professor Craker in challenging the federal government's policy of blocking administrative channels and obstructing research that could lead to the development of marijuana as a prescription medicine. These organizations include the Lymphoma Foundation of America, the National Association for Public Health Policy, the Multiple Sclerosis Foundation, as well as several state medical and nurses' associations.

Marijuana is the only Schedule I drug that DEA has prohibited from being produced by private laboratories for scientific research. Other controlled substances, including LSD, MDMA (also known as "Ecstasy"), heroin and cocaine, are available to researchers from DEA-licensed private laboratories, such as the one Professor Craker plans to establish.

In contrast, NIDA has remained scientists' sole source of marijuana, despite criticism over the agency's refusal to make marijuana available for all FDA-approved research into the plant's potential medical value. The ACLU and others point out that such research conflicts with NIDA's mission to study the harmful effects of drugs of abuse. In addition, researchers report that marijuana available through NIDA is of low quality and variety and is not optimized to meet FDA standards for prescription drug development.

Professor Craker's proposed facility to grow high-quality medical marijuana for research purposes will be funded by the Multidisciplinary Association for Psychedelic Studies (MAPS), a non-profit pharmaceutical company with plans to develop marijuana into a fully legal, prescription medication.

"For decades, we've been told by the politicians that marijuana has no proven medical value while scientists have been denied the ability to prove otherwise," said Rick Doblin, Ph.D., president and founder of MAPS. "Hopefully, today's decision marks a shift towards science, not politics, guiding medicine in America." Despite federal prohibition, 12 states have enacted legislation protecting patients who use medical marijuana with a physician's recommendation from prosecution under state law, and national polls consistently find that roughly 75 percent of Americans support the use of medical marijuana.

"Today's ruling is an important step toward allowing medical marijuana patients to get their medicine from a pharmacy just like everyone else," added the ACLU's Hopper. "That would clear up the controversies surrounding state medical marijuana laws."

The ACLU is co-counsel in the case, In the Matter of Lyle Craker, with Julie Carpenter at the Washington D.C. law firm Jenner & Block, LLP and is assisted by Steptoe & Johnson, LLP.

Meth Kingpin's 22 Felonies Bring Life Prison Sentence (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, February 13, 2007

The ringleader of one of Tucson's largest methamphetamine organizations was sentenced to life in prison Monday.

Timothy Owens, 50, was convicted last month on 22 felony counts following a three-week trial in Pima County Superior Court.

According to Deputy Pima County Attorney Richard Wintory, Owens and Donna Greenwell, 51, ran a large methamphetamine ring in the middle of Tucson for about 18 months.

Owens was responsible for obtaining the methamphetamine and Greenwell was responsible for selling the drug or exchanging it for stolen property.

A ledger found in Greenwell's possession showed that during a seven-month period, Greenwell sold more than 20 pounds of methamphetamine for $245,000 in cash, plus an additional $200,000 in tools, guns, cars and other property, Wintory said.

Owens and Greenwell were indicted along with 39 other people in August 2005, but the investigation into the case began in the fall of 2004, Wintory said.

The Counter Narcotics Alliance was asked by the Tucson Police Department for help in investigating the burgeoning methamphetamine business in Midtown, Wintory said.

It was soon afterward that Rich Kivi, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, discovered that many of the same people were being arrested again and again on drug-related charges only to be released to commit new crimes while awaiting trial.

Included on the list of repeat offenders were Owens and Greenwell, Wintory said.

Kivi learned that in July 2004, Greenwell had been arrested by Tucson police officers after a routine traffic stop turned up several bags of methamphetamine and cocaine in her car.

When Kivi looked into the case further, he discovered that locked up in an evidence locker was a ledger seized along with the drugs.

To his surprise, inside the ledger was a list of seven month's worth of drug transactions, Wintory said.

Kivi and other members of the task force were investigating information from the ledger when another break in the case occurred in January 2005, Wintory said.

Because Owens was caught sneaking into the United States with one pound of methamphetamine, he had decided the organization needed to learn how to cook its own methamphetamine, Wintory said.

Owens orchestrated the kidnapping of a methamphetamine cook and the burglary of a meth lab, Wintory said.

Unfortunately for Owens, Wintory said, he and six others were caught in the process.

DOJ_NMG_0131918

Despite Owens being confined in the Pima County jail, Wintory said Owens didn't stop his criminal activity there.

Over the next few months, Owens unsuccessfully tried to recruit three men to kill five people — three who could testify against him at trial and two others who owed the ring drug debts, Wintory said.

Jail officials monitoring Owens' phone calls overheard the phone calls and taped them, Wintory said.

When Owens went to trial last month, the phone calls were played in court for jurors, Wintory said. Jurors also learned of other phone calls in which Owens arranged for drug debts to be collected, for new dealers to be recruited, for robberies to be committed and for witnesses to be intimidated.

They also learned Owens and other members of the ring regularly called their friends and family members from jail to tell them what to say to Pretrial Service officers to ensure they would be able to bond out of jail, Wintory said. The friends and family members would regularly lie about where the suspects were living and working so they wouldn't look likely to flee if released from jail.

Owens was convicted of illegal control of an enterprise, use of an electronic communication device in drug transactions, solicitation to commit murder and kidnapping, and a variety of drug charges.

On Monday, Pima County Superior Court Judge Michael Cruikshank sentenced Owens to a mix of concurrent and consecutive sentences.

Owens is eligible for parole after 25 years on the life sentence, but if he is paroled he'll start a 25-year sentence, Wintory said.

Greenwell, 51, pleaded guilty to 16 counts last month immediately after opening statements in her trial.

She, too, is facing a life sentence.

Convicted Leader Of Tucson Drug Ring Gets Life Sentence (AP)

AP, February 14, 2007

TUCSON, Ariz. -- The leader of a ring that distributed large amounts of methamphetamine in Tucson has been sentenced to life in prison.

Timothy Owens, 50, was convicted of 22 felony counts last month following a three-week trial in Pima County Superior Court.

Owens was sentenced Monday for his role in obtaining more than 20 pounds of meth that was later sold by Donna Greenwell, 51, who pleaded guilty to 16 counts at the start of her trial last month. She also faces a life sentence.

Owens and Greenwell ran a large methamphetamine ring for more than 18 months, said Deputy Pima County Attorney Richard Wintory.

The case came to investigators' attention when a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent reviewing files discovered that many of the same people were being arrested on drug-related charges only to be released to commit new crimes while awaiting trial.

Included on the list of repeat offenders were Owens and Greenwell, Wintory said. The agent learned that in July 2004, Greenwell had been arrested by Tucson police officers after a routine traffic stop turned up several bags of methamphetamine and cocaine in her car. He reviewed a ledger seized from Greenwell in an evidence locker and found records detailing the sale of 20 pounds of meth over a six-month period.

In January 2005, Owens was caught sneaking into the United States with one pound of methamphetamine, and decided the organization needed to learn how to cook its own methamphetamine, Wintory said.

Owens orchestrated the kidnapping of a methamphetamine cook and the burglary of a meth lab, Wintory said. But he and six others were caught in the process. While confined to jail in the following months, Owens unsuccessfully tried to recruit three men to kill five people. Jail officials monitoring Owens' phone calls taped them, Wintory said.

The calls were played for the jury during his trial. He was convicted of illegal control of an enterprise, use of an electronic communication device in drug transactions, solicitation to commit murder and kidnapping, and a variety of drug charges.

Former N.Y. Trooper Admits Posing As DEA Man In Bizarre 'Raid' (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, February 14, 2007

Michael Gluchowski had all the trappings of a bona fide DEA agent when he showed up at a home on a quiet block in suburban Bergen County and announced he was investigating the residence as a drug house.

He flashed a silver badge and sported a Drug Enforcement Administration raid jacket. He also carried two loaded semi-automatic handguns in his holster and waistband.

But even after he said he had the wrong place and left, the resident, David Cheung, was suspicious. Why would a DEA agent show up for a bust alone? He called the local police in Demarest.

"It didn't seem right," Cheung recalled in a telephone interview. He said he was home doing paperwork for his video production company when Gluchowski arrived. "Even if he was undercover, he didn't look altogether there. He had a beard. He was very frail."

Cheung's suspicions proved correct: Gluchowski, a retired New York state trooper, pleaded guilty to impersonating a federal agent yesterday before U.S. District Judge Faith Hochberg in Newark.

Before retiring in 2001, Gluchowski, 49, was assigned to a DEA task force for more than a decade, his attorney said. Years ago, he had investigated the house where Cheung now lives as a "stash house," where drugs and money were kept, authorities said.

Gluchowski returned to the house on Sept. 6, 2006, and authorities suspect he wanted to steal contraband but abandoned his plot after realizing the previous residents had moved out and Cheung had moved in.

"He was up to no good, to say the least," said Gerard McAleer, special agent in charge of the DEA's New Jersey division. "We're just grateful it didn't go to the next level."

Police put out a bulletin with a description of Gluchowski's SUV, and he was pulled over in Fort Lee. In addition to the two pistols, police found a 12-gauge shotgun and hollow-point bullets in his car, according to court papers.

John Yauch, the public defender representing Gluchowski, had a more innocent explanation for his client's actions: He was doing research for a book about his years with the DEA.

"It was nothing nefarious," Yauch said. Asked why his client was so heavily armed, he said, "He was involved with a lot of very bad people when he was with the DEA."

Yauch said a psychologist who has been treating Gluchowski since his arrest last year diagnosed him with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Prosecutors noted a month after his arrest, Gluchowski was pulled over in his hometown of Brewster, N.Y., and arrested after a search turned up crack cocaine and a crack pipe.

"Individuals need money to feed drug habits," Assistant U.S. Attorney Sharon Ashe wrote in court papers.

Yauch denied his client had a drug problem, saying, "he worked and gave a good part of his life in his effort fight the war on drugs."

Gluchowski could face up to three years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Federal sentencing guidelines recommend a prison term of zero to six months under his plea agreement. The sentencing date has not been set.

Cheung, the homeowner, said he was glad he wouldn't have to testify. He said he had been taken aback when Gluchowski showed up at his home, but he was never scared because he knows karate.

"He wasn't a big, threatening person," Cheung said. "If he would have pulled a gun out, it would have been taken away from him."

The Lawmakers: Fewer Anti-meth Bills Are Expected This Year (MB)

By Michael Doyle

Modesto Bee, February 13, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House meth caucus is bigger than ever. Anti-meth bills are proliferating, their titles more elaborate by the day.

But none of this means the 110th Congress will do something new about the drug.

Instead, 2007 may turn out to be a year for consolidation, as lawmakers evaluate results from their most recent anti-meth package signed by President Bush in March.

"I want to see what happens," Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein said. "I'm open to what the needs are, but we're going to try and answer the question of how well the last bill is working."

Feinstein, D-Calif., was one of the chief sponsors of the 2006 Combat Meth Act, passed as part of a larger anti-terrorism bill. Cold medicines take the biggest hit in the law, which kicked in Sept. 30.

In hopes of denying meth producers a key ingredient, the law moves cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter. It limits individual monthly purchases to 9 grams, or about 300 cold pills, and it requires signatures and identification for purchases.

"The bill introduces common-sense safeguards," Bush said.

Some provisions take effect automatically. Others do not, and their impact is contingent on future congressional action.

The 2006 legislation, for instance, author-izes $99 million a year for meth-related enforcement, training and research. Next year, though, lawmakers must decide how much money to actually provide. Meth needs will be competing against other law enforcement priorities.

A test arrived this month, when the Bush administration released its proposed fiscal 2008 budget. Bush disappointed lawmakers again by proposing to cut funds for certain law enforcement programs, including the Community Oriented Policing Services grants used by many Central Valley cities.

"This budget reflects the misplaced priorities of the Bush administration," Feinstein said. "It once again squeezes many of the programs that matter most to Americans."

Lawmakers this year also must decide how much money will be devoted to the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas, such as the Fresno-based program targeting the valley methamphetamine trade.

"We always have a meth objective in the beginning of the year," said Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Visalia. "The biggest one will be increasing funding for the HIDTA."

Mariposa Republican George Radanovich agreed that "we're focused on making sure the HIDTAs are funded." With 28 such regional organizations nationwide — covering 43 percent of all U.S. counties — Radanovich added that competition for funding has increased.

Politically, a spreading problem is a mixed blessing.

The Congressional Caucus to Fight and Control Methamphetamine grew to 144 members in the recently expired 109th Congress. That translates to broader clout. It also means, though, that other states have a growing claim on the federal anti-meth investment.

For instance, Feinstein's co-sponsor on the 2006 meth bill was from Missouri. The same lawmaker, Republican Sen. James Talent, helped usher through a congressional resolution resulting in National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, which was recognized Nov. 30.

The symbolism of a special day set aside for meth awareness is matched by the unrelenting marketing that goes into the naming of bills. In the 109th Congress, for instance, lawmakers sponsored the likes of the Clean, Learn, Education, Abolish, Neutralize and Undermine Production (CLEAN-UP) of Methamphetamines Act, the Arrest Methamphetamine Act and the Exile Meth Act.

These bills included some overlapping proposals, such as new state grants, that ultimately were included in the bill passed by Congress and signed by Bush.

Former Customs Officer Gets 9 Years In Drug Case (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, February 14, 2007

A former customs officer was sentenced to nine years in prison Tuesday after he knowingly allowed a vehicle with 440 pounds of cocaine inside to come into the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0131921

Fernando Arango, 52, was working for U.S. Customs and Border Protection at the port of entry in Nogales when he decided to counsel a person who he believed to be a drug trafficker on how to purchase an RV and have it altered to smuggle drugs into the country, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona.

On Oct. 1, 2005, Arango, who lives in Rio Rico, inspected the vehicle and it was driven through the port of entry by the drug trafficker, who was really an undercover officer, the release said.

Arango was given $50,000 by the officer and was then arrested.

Former Border Patrol Official Sentenced In Cocaine Case (AR)

Arizona Republic, February 13, 2007

A former border patrol official was sentenced in Tucson today to nine years in prison for trying to distribute cocaine.

Fernando Arango, 52, pleaded guilty last October to attempting to possess with intent to distribute cocaine. Arango, of Rio Rico, was formerly a U.S. Customs and Border Protection officer at a port of entry in Nogales.

While he still worked for the Border Patrol Arango taught a person, whom he believed was a drug smuggler, how to have a vehicle altered with a hidden compartment to smuggle drugs into the United States, officials said.

After the vehicle was rigged Arango inspected the vehicle and made sure it was allowed to pass through the U.S. port of entry. Arango believed the vehicle contained 200 kilograms of cocaine when he helped it cross the border on October 1, 2005.

Arango was paid $50,000 by a person working with law enforcement and then arrested, officials said.

The residing judge told Arango, that he betrayed his position of trust and that his sentence was to punish him as well as deter other, according to a press release.

A former federal Customs and Border Protection agent faces nine years in prison for taking a bribe.The feds say 52-year-old Fernando Arango of Rio Rico allowed a motor home packed with 440 pounds of cocaine to pass through his checkpoint at the Mariposa Port of Entry at Nogales.The U-S Attorney's Office says Arango faced a maximum sentence of life in prison and a four (m) million dollar fine.Arango had plead guilty to a charge of attempting to possess with intention to distribute cocaine in October.Arango was caught in a sting operation in October, 2005 when a law enforcement informant met him and paid him for his help.In other meetings with the informant, the feds say Arango advised him to buy an R-V.Arango then taught the informant how to build a false compartment to hold the smuggled cocaine.

IMMIGRATION:

Banking On Illegal Immigrants (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, David Streitfeld And Adrian G. Uribarri, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

A move to issue credit cards to people without Social Security numbers draws anger and praise.

Bank of America said Tuesday that it was issuing credit cards to Spanish-speaking immigrants who may not have Social Security numbers, triggering complaints that the nation's largest retail bank is tacitly endorsing illegal immigration.

The bank described the program as a pilot, limited for now to 51 branches in Los Angeles County, and said it could go national this year.

The credit cards are not aimed specifically at illegal immigrants, a bank spokeswoman said, but instead people who lack solid credit histories. Even so, the bank was bombarded with angry phone calls.

On Capitol Hill, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) accused the lender of aiding terrorists, while the Department of Homeland Security worried that the program could be exploited by criminals.

DOJ_NMG_0131922

"At face value the program seems to be problematic," said Russ Knocke, a department spokesman. "It seems to be lending itself to possibilities of perpetrating identity theft or creating more risk for money laundering."

The bank's program may be controversial, but it also vividly demonstrates that businesses view the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants not as lawbreakers but as customers.

Other major banks including Wells Fargo & Co. and Citibank have launched similar initiatives to gain customers in the burgeoning Latino community.

Wells Fargo began a pilot program last year in Los Angeles and Orange counties to offer home mortgages to immigrants who have lived in the United States for at least two years. The customers are allowed to identify themselves using taxpayer numbers issued by the Internal Revenue Service instead of Social Security numbers. That's the same type of identification number an immigrant can use to obtain a credit card under Bank of America's pilot program.

Wells Fargo may follow Bank of America's lead on credit cards.

"We are also looking at the possibility of offering unsecured credit cards to customers who may not have Social Security numbers," Wells Fargo spokeswoman Mary Trigg said.

Although important for all major banks, the immigrant market is especially key for Bank of America. Though now based in North Carolina, the bank, once headquartered in San Francisco, still has its largest retail operation in California, home to a huge Latino population.

"Bank of America is the biggest bank for Hispanics in the country, and it made a decision a couple of years ago to keep pushing that market," including buying a 25% stake in a Mexican bank, said Richard Bove, a banking analyst for investment firm Punk, Ziegel & Co.

The emphasis may pay off, but "the political backlash is going to be substantial," he said.

That prediction seemed to be borne out Tuesday, after the program was reported in the Wall Street Journal.

"It helps to further embed illegal immigrants into American society," said Steven Camarota, research director for the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, which backs stricter enforcement of immigration laws. "It makes amnesty a fait accompli."

Tancredo said he sent a letter to U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking them to look into the program.

"I hope the administration will shut down this reckless and illegal program before Bank of America extends a line of credit to a potential terrorist," said Tancredo, a hard- line foe of illegal immigration.

A Justice Department official declined to comment on the legality of the program.

Bank of America spokeswoman Alexandra C. Trower said the company complied fully with all banking and anti-terrorism laws governing customer identification, which she said permitted the use of taxpayer ID numbers instead of Social Security numbers.

Bank executives said participants needed another form of identification, such as ID cards issued by foreign consulates. Applicants must also have had a Bank of America checking account for at least three months.

William P. Cook, former general counsel of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, said the bank's program was neither illegal nor problematic.

"It's sad that such a forward-thinking move is being mischaracterized as if it were an improper activity," said Cook, who is now in private practice.

There's a serious issue behind the flap, said Gordon H. Hanson, an economist and immigration expert at UC San Diego. The federal government has been stalemated on the immigration issue for years, abdicating its role in defining rights for 12 million people, and Bank of America moved into the breach, he said. It couldn't make immigrants citizens, but it could make them customers.

"Are we undermining civil society?" Hanson asked. "That's an entirely valid question."

Robert Gnaizda of the Greenlining Institute, which lobbies for improved financial services in low-income neighborhoods, called the program "excellent news."

DOJ_NMG_0131923

Immigrants with scant credit histories can buy houses only with high-interest loans. Getting a bank card helps them establish their credit and qualify for better mortgage rates, he said.

Potential customers also liked the idea.

Lionel Archila, 51, is a Guatemala native who arrived in Los Angeles after a dozen years in Canada. A former accountant, he works odd jobs as a handyman and construction worker. He sometimes goes days without pay.

"It's magnificent from a financial point of view," Archila, waiting for a bus in downtown L.A., said about the prospect for getting a credit card. "But I would use it for my basic needs. I wouldn't get caught in the trap of buying the latest TV."

Roberto Flores, a 55-year-old Angeleno who moved to the United States from Michoacan, Mexico, in 1975, long ago got comfortable with credit accounts. He has at least two: one at La Curacao, a department store catering to Latinos, and another at Home Depot.

He said life without credit could be difficult for struggling immigrants.

"Anything helps," he said.

Despite Bank of America's compelling interest in Latino markets, it was arch-rival Wells Fargo that kicked off the competition in 2001, when it became the first U.S. bank to accept identification cards from Mexican consulates to open an account.

Since then, Wells has opened more than 1 million accounts for Mexicans using the consular card. It also accepts Guatemalan, Argentine and Colombian identity cards. The assumption is that most immigrants using the cards to identify themselves are here illegally, Wells Fargo spokeswoman Trigg said, but the bank doesn't ask.

Citibank already issues credit cards to some immigrants without Social Security numbers if they have taxpayer identification numbers, spokeswoman Janis Tarter said. The bank issues such cards under its own brand and the brand of its subsidiary, Banamex USA.

Citibank began issuing the cards nearly three years ago. Tarter said she couldn't recall anyone complaining.

Feinstein Questions Treatment Of Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

A senior Democratic senator and longtime border security advocate wants the Departments of Justice and Homeland Security to explain the "extreme" prison sentences two U.S. Border Patrol agents received for shooting a fleeing drug-smuggling suspect.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California said in letters to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff that the government's prosecution had a "chilling effect" on the ability of other agents to carry out their duties and had significantly affected their morale.

Given the circumstances of the cases and the fact that neither agent had prior convictions or "any other aggravating circumstances to warrant particularly harsh treatment under the law," Mrs. Feinstein said they were given "sentences that some individuals who are convicted of murder wouldn't receive."

"Border Patrol agents have a difficult and often dangerous job in guarding our nation's borders," she said. "I believe that aggressive prosecution of Border Patrol agents has a chilling effect on their ability to carry out their duties and on the morale of all agents.

"I also believe that if wrong doing does occur, ensuring fair and safe treatment is essential," she said. "I am extremely concerned about how this case continues to unfold."

A senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Mrs. Feinstein also encouraged the Justice Department to "move forward promptly" in its review of the case in the wake of the recent beating of one of the agents at the Federal Detention Center in Yazoo, Miss. She said a prompt review could put President Bush "in a position, if necessary, to timely evaluate pardon or clemency petitions that are filed."

Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October to 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, for shooting Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks as he fled back into Mexico. The Mexican national had abandoned a van containing 743 pounds of marijuana and was shot during an attempt to avoid apprehension.

"I strongly believe the sentences in this case are too extreme given the criminal background of Mr. Aldrete-Davila and his possession of large quantities of drugs, and given the fact that Mr. Aldrete-Davila had physically resisted at least one attempt by Agents Ramos and Compean to bring him into custody," Mrs. Feinstein said.

Mrs. Feinstein has been given approval by Judicial Committee Chairman Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, for hearings on the matter before the subcommittee on terrorism, technology and homeland security, which she heads.

In her letters, Mrs. Feinstein asked Mr. Gonzales for specific information concerning the sentences the agents received and the beating of Ramos in federal prison. She asked Mr. Chertoff for additional information on a heavily redacted Office of Inspector General report on the case released last week.

In a separate letter to Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley G. Lappin, Mrs. Feinstein requested information on the treatment of the agents in prison and details about the assault on Ramos while in federal custody. She also asked Mr. Lappin to explain why the agents were not being adequately protected.

"It is not hard to predict that two federal agents would be targeted in a prison population and that special precautions should have been employed to ensure their safety," she said.

Mrs. Feinstein also questioned Mr. Gonzales about why prosecutors originally indicted the agents on three criminal charges, but then expanded the indictment on three separate occasions, adding new charges each time. She asked who within Justice approved each set of charges.

She asked Mr. Chertoff why the Inspector General's Office reported that at least three other Border Patrol agents participated in a cover-up of the shooting, but redacted their names from a final report on the incident.

"Please explain why society benefited most by absolving these agents entirely and keeping them on the force so that they could testify in a criminal prosecution against Agents Ramos and Compean," she said.

TAX:

Tax Plan Aims To Show Prices Of Stock 'Buys' (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Seeking to raise government revenues without raising taxes, a bipartisan group of lawmakers will join President Bush today in supporting a plan to require securities brokers, mutual funds and others to report the original purchase price that an investor paid for stocks, bonds and other securities, and thus cut down on underreporting of capital gains.

The proposal, to be introduced in the House and Senate, aims to help close the "tax gap" -- the difference between what the government collects in revenue each year and what it believes it is entitled to collect.

Internal Revenue Service researchers estimate the gap at about $290 billion a year, and lawmakers -- as well as Mr. Bush -- would like to tap into that money to help pay for other priorities.

Members of Congress and the Bush administration both say investors, either intentionally or not, often underreport the amount of money they make when they sell a stock by misstating the original purchase price. Both Mr. Bush's plan and the proposed legislation would seek to correct that by requiring brokerage firms and others to track the purchase price and -- when an investor sells a stock, bond or mutual fund -- report the "adjusted-cost basis" to the taxpayer and the IRS.

The adjusted-cost basis factors in the purchase and sale price, plus any intervening corporate action that affects value, such as reinvested dividends, stock splits or mergers.

Mr. Bush's budget assumes the change, if enacted, would bring in about $6.7 billion over 10 years, while the lawmakers assume about $7 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0131925

The legislation, which is being lead by Sens. Evan Bayh (D., Ind.) and Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) and Reps. Rahm Emanuel (D., Ill.) and Walter Jones (R., N.C.) is similar to a bill introduced by Mr. Bayh last year that never made it out of Congress. Democrats now control Congress, so the legislation is seen as having a better chance of success.

The proposal could run into resistance from brokerage firms and others in the securities industry, which complained in the past about the amount of paperwork required in tracking purchase prices.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Truth And Credibility (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The 12 jurors in I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's trial will soon be sifting through the evidence, trying to determine whether the prosecution proved, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Libby lied to investigators about conversations with reporters in the Valerie Plame affair.

As a former president famously said: "Perjury is a hard rap to prove." And the jurors' job may well be difficult.

If only they could take advantage of the Pentagon's new "Polygraph and Credibility Assessment Program." That, Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England writes in a Jan. 25 directive, is a whole new way to see if someone is lying, by combining lie detectors with "credibility assessment" -- CA for short.

CA is a "multi-disciplinary field of existing as well as potential techniques and procedures to assess truthfulness" -- or at least truthiness -- "that relies on physiological reactions and behavioral measures to test the agreement between an individual's memories and statements," England said in the directive, unearthed by Secrecy News. Critics have said polygraphs are unreliable and suggested other factors be used for employee screening.

The new program will be overseen by the undersecretary of defense for intelligence, who will be, once he's confirmed, retired Air Force Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., who is to succeed Stephen Cambone.Bushism on the Agenda

Speaking of Libby, a colleague notes that his schedule for June 10, 2003, which was introduced at his trial, notes: "6:00pm -- Strategery Meeting." This would be a jovial nod to comedian Will Ferrell of "Saturday Night Live" fame, and his made-up Bushism as he impersonated President Bush wrestling with the English language.

The scheduled meeting apparently was of White House counselor Karl Rove's Office of Strategic Initiatives.Cheney Taking Questions

Meanwhile, reporters covering the Libby trial doubtless were crushed by news yesterday that neither he nor his former boss, Vice President Cheney, would be taking the stand. But that doesn't mean Cheney is trying to avoid a sharp grilling.

In fact, Cheney is this very morning appearing for what is likely to be a tough session at a National Association of Manufacturers "Q&A, issue breakfast," our invite says, with about "300 manufacturers from around the nation."

Wanna bet there won't be any questions about Valerie Plame?Foley Makes Himself Scarce

Let's have a hearty, albeit temporary, Loop Welcome Back for former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who is in town this week apparently to move out of his home on the famed GOP enclave on D Street SE on Capitol Hill.

Foley was at his old house yesterday, a Loop Fan reports, overseeing the movers clearing it out. He was spotted about 6:30 a.m., fussing with a garbage bag in the front yard and ducking back into the house when he saw a neighbor walking her dog.Second KBR Driver Killed

A couple of weeks ago, we reported the death in Baghdad of a garbage-truck driver working for KBR who was shot Jan. 13 by Australian and U.S. military guards at a checkpoint near a hospital in the Green Zone. Now another KBR truck driver has been killed -- and another person in the truck was wounded -- Feb. 5 at Camp Anaconda, an air base about 50 miles north of Baghdad, according to the Associated Press.

A military spokesman said the shooting came in "an escalation-of-force incident," which often means that a driver approaching a checkpoint did not respond to an order to move slowly and stop. The driver's name was not released.

But the wire service cited a Web site posting from a funeral home in Chesaning, Mich., that said KBR driver Donald Tolfree, of nearby Owosso, had been killed Monday in Balad, Iraq, which is near Camp Anaconda. A KBR spokeswoman said the shooting is under investigation.Back Home at State

Condoleezza Rice, no longer home alone. The Senate on Monday confirmed former national intelligence director John Negroponte as deputy secretary of state, a post vacant since July. Negroponte, former ambassador to the United Nations, and to Iraq, Honduras, Mexico and the Philippines, said yesterday at a welcoming ceremony at State that he was "delighted that one of my first acts is going to be this afternoon to declare this a snow day."

Negroponte's portfolio as deputy was expected to include the pesky North Korea nuke problem. But Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill appears to have hammered out an agreement on that. Maybe it was because the North Koreans heard Negroponte was coming?Khalilzad on the Somewhat Fast Track

Also on the personnel front . . . The White House has sent up to the Senate the nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, now our man in Baghdad, to be ambassador to the United Nations. The move Monday came nearly two months after his selection was announced. We're told the Senate, barring some unforeseen fracas, may confirm him in early March.

Foreign policy veteran Tom Graham, who was, until Friday, National Security Council senior director for Russia, is heading to the private sector to work with Kissinger McLarty Associates. Graham, who did two tours in Moscow as a Foreign Service officer in the embassy, is credited with coining the name "oligarchs" for the avaricious tycoons that snapped up state assets during the early years following the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Ford M. Fraker, an investment banker and former head of banking at Saudi International Bank, is President Bush's pick to be ambassador to Saudi Arabia. Fraker founded and now chairs the London-based Trinity Group and is a consultant to Intercontinental Real Estate in Boston.

Lt. Gen. Dell L. Dailey, now director of the center for special operations at MacDill Air Force Base, has been tapped to be the State Department's coordinator for counterterrorism.

Lack Of Black Bench Nominees Criticized (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean

National Law Journal, February 14, 2007

In nine of 11 Southern states, President George W. Bush has never nominated an African-American for any of 62 openings for federal trial court judgeships, according to federal court data.

In his home state of Texas, the president has not nominated a single black judge to the federal bench in 18 nominations sent to the Senate during the past six years, according to Leslie Proll, director of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund's Washington office.

The lack of black nominees has caused some African-American lawyers to express concern that retiring black judges appointed years ago will leave a new crop of Southern lawyers who may never see a black judge on the federal bench.

Mississippi and Alabama have not had a black judge appointed in more than 20 years, a situation Proll called, "very egregious. So many of the Carter judges are leaving the court through death or retirement. Generations are changing on the bench, and nobody is following them," she said.

In Alabama, where all nine Bush nominees have been white, U.S. Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., said, "It is inconceivable to me that there has not been a black judge of caliber to serve on the federal bench in the last 20 years.

"The first thing you hear is they can't find anyone qualified. That is not plausible, given the number of black lawyers in the state," Davis said.

PROBLEM IN CIRCUITS

The more powerful federal appellate courts of the 4th, 5th and 11th U.S. circuit courts of appeals have fared little better with black nominations. Of 14 nominees, no blacks have been proposed for the 5th or 11th circuits.

Bush has nominated three blacks to the 4th Circuit -- Claude Allen of Virginia, who later withdrew in the face of Democratic opposition; Judge Roger Gregory, originally a recess appointment by President Clinton renominated by Bush in 2001; and Judge Allyson Duncan of North Carolina, confirmed in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0131927

Presidents typically consider judicial recommendations by senators from the state affected. In the 5th Circuit, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., put the only black federal judge in the state on a short list of recommendations for the 5th Circuit in 2004 and 2007, according to Susan Irby, Lott's communication director. But Chief Judge Henry T. Wingate, a 1985 Reagan appointee to Mississippi's Southern District, was passed over both times in favor of white candidates: Charles Pickering, who left in 2004 when his controversial recess appointment expired, and Leslie Southwick, nominated on Jan. 9.

Irby said Lott "casts a wide net" when seeking potential judicial recommendations. "I can't give you specifics, but he has reached out to a diverse group of folks," she said.

Carlton Reeves, president-elect of the Magnolia Bar Association, which represents black lawyers, said Lott, "has never, to my knowledge, consulted with the Magnolia Bar, and we have been in existence since 1955."

Irby said she "took umbrage" at not including the recent nomination of Halil Ozerden, whose family came from Turkey, as "putting diversity on the court. It is unfair not to note that he is not Caucasian," she said, in apparent reference to his nationality rather than ethnicity.

In 11 Southern states of the 4th, 5th and 11th circuits, 75 trial court nominations produced no blacks in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia or West Virginia, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts and NAACP Legal Defense Fund.

Bush did nominate one African-American in Florida, Marcia Cooke, and one in Maryland, William Quarles. In addition, he has nominated 11 Hispanics to district courts in Texas, Florida and Mississippi and one Hispanic to the 5th Circuit.

National Bar Association President Linnes Finney of Stuart, Fla., said that while the number of black nominees is "disappointing," the "White House general counsels have been receptive to meeting with us to discuss appointment of African-Americans to the federal judiciary."

The White House did not respond to repeated requests for comment on its nominations, nor did Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchinson, R-Texas.; John Cornyn, R-Texas; Thad Cochran, R-Miss.; or Senate Judiciary Committee member Jeff Sessions, R-Ala.

Nationwide, Bush has appointed 18 black judges out of 263 appointments to all federal courts during his six years in office, according to the Senate Judiciary Committee and federal judiciary data.

CBC Prepping For Rare Bush Meeting (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

Members of the Congressional Black Caucus said Tuesday they weren't getting their hopes up in advance of this week's private meeting with President Bush, the first such planned encounter in two years.

Even as many of the group's 44 lawmakers confirmed they plan to attend Thursday's White House meeting, acknowledging the event's importance, Members offered doubt that the session would yield any tangible results.

"It's only logical that we have to consider what has happened in the past at these meetings," said Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.).

Although those sessions, most recently in January 2005, have produced "good discussions," Cummings asserted: "Quite often it was hard to see significant actions taken as a result of the meetings."

The Maryland lawmaker added that given that history, Members remain understandably apprehensive about the upcoming meeting.

"One of the things you always wonder about with President Bush is whether this is a photo-op," Cummings said.

Rep. Artur Davis (Ala.), who attended a December meeting with Bush as a member of the centrist New Democrat Coalition, said he also remains doubtful that the commander in chief is actively reaching out to lawmakers, as opposed to simply seeking support for his own agenda.

"The president is frankly not so eager to hear about other agendas out there," Davis said. "Bipartisanship isn't just Democrats agreeing with him. He has to listen to Democrats."

DOJ_NMG_0131928

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) asserted that even the power-switch that put Democrats in control of Congress — although nonpartisan, the CBC's membership includes no Republicans — will have little impact on the session's outcome.

"I expect nothing from the president," said Conyers, who chairs the House Judiciary Committee.

"We had an election. He didn't change his course in Iraq," Conyers added, citing the president's recent proposal to deploy more than 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, a measure that Democrats have condemned in a nonbinding resolution under debate on the House floor this week. "I don't hold out any hope that he will be any more helpful to us."

Nevertheless, Conyers said he plans to attend the meeting and raise issues related to the ongoing restoration efforts from Hurricane Katrina.

CBC Chairwoman Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (D-Mich.), who requested the White House meeting, declined to discuss which topics will be raised at the summit, stating that the Caucus will address those specifics at its weekly meeting today.

But CBC lawmakers said issues including the Iraq War and Katrina likely will dominate the meeting, along with subjects highlighted on the group's agenda such as disparities in education and health care.

"It's important to have a dialogue," acknowledged Cummings, himself a former CBC chairman. "There may be some things we can do together."

In particular, Cummings suggested that lawmakers will raise the Gulf Coast cleanup, and some of the bureaucratic hurdles residents continue to face as they seek to rebuild their homes and communities.

"Can he use the power of the presidency to cut the red tape?" Cummings said.

In addition, the Maryland lawmaker said he will focus on the Iraq War, constructing a list of a half-dozen questions, including concerns over whether troops are being properly trained before being deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as whether they are equipped during their service.

Despite anticipated disagreements on issues including Iraq, Cummings said he views the meeting as an opportunity to "plant the seeds" of their proposals with the president.

"We have to try to appeal to his conscience," Cummings said.

At least a few lawmakers said they are optimistic about the meeting.

Rep. Albert Wynn (D-Md.) said he believes the Democrats' new status as the House majority will give the CBC more leverage in the discussion "and a bigger voice in the conversation."

"He will probably be listening with a keener ear," Wynn added.

Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), who served as CBC chairman when the organization last met with Bush, said: "The president understands that Democrats are in the majority and that does create a difference dynamic."

But Watt remained cautious, stating that he could not predict "whether that results in anything concrete."

Former CBC Executive Director Paul Brathwaite asserted that one measure of the success of Thursday's meeting would be whether lawmakers and the White House make a commitment to meet regularly to gauge progress on their common goals.

"The key has always been what comes next, what about the follow-up," said Brathwaite, who characterized past meetings with the Bush and lawmakers as substantive, although he declined to discuss details of those private discussions.

"Are there ways to measure progress on any of the things that we've talked about, whether it's Katrina or Iraq or the budget?" added Brathwaite. "There needs to be some sort of benchmark as to whether or not we're making progress."

ABA Supports Federal Judge Pay Raise (AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, February 14, 2007

The 420,000-member American Bar Association came to the defense of judges during its Miami meeting, expressing support for a pay raise for federal judges and pledging to defend aggressively against ballot measures that compromise judicial independence.

ABA President Karen Mathis told her membership Monday that district judges, who earn $165,200 a year, certainly should be paid more than first-year lawyers at New York City firms. Starting annual salaries there now are $160,000.

DOJ_NMG_0131929

Former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker recently wrote that district judges would be making roughly $100,000 a year more today had their pay risen at the same pace as U.S. salaries generally.

Chief Justice John Roberts also highlighted judicial pay in his year-end report, noting that judges were leaving their lifetime-tenure jobs at an alarming rate for much better-paying jobs in the private sector.

Measure On Security Reviews Of Investments Draws Criticism (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A House committee voted to curb the government's ability to reopen reviews into how foreign investments in U.S. companies might affect national security. But some business leaders said the proposed change doesn't go far enough.

At issue is the Bush administration's decision to reserve the right to revisit -- and potentially unwind -- foreign-led deals, even after they have been cleared by the U.S. government. The Bush administration insisted on including such an "evergreen authority" clause as part of its approval in November of the $11.6 billion purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by France's Alcatel SA. Business, concerned about the uncertainty added by such a clause, has lobbied Congress over the issue.

Under U.S. regulations, certain foreign-investment deals must undergo a review by, and receive approval from, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., before going ahead. The secretive panel was set up in 1975 and is represented by 12 government departments and agencies, led by the Treasury Department.

The House Financial Services Committee, acting on an amendment advanced by its chairman, Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), yesterday approved a measure requiring that any decision to expose business deals to additional security reviews be triggered at the most senior levels of the government. Under the proposal, only officials who are ranked third or higher in any department -- undersecretaries and above -- could trigger a reopening of a case. They would be authorized to do so only in situations where there is a perceived breach by the foreign company of a past agreement with the U.S. government.

"The burden would be on the undersecretary to find a material breach," Mr. Frank said. "We raise the level under which it happens."

But Todd Malan, president of the Organization for International Investment, a group representing American subsidiaries of foreign companies, urged that the so-called evergreen authority be made even more difficult to invoke, if not taken away from the administration entirely. He said the authority acts as "a cloud on clear title" in deals involving foreign companies.

Mr. Frank's proposal was folded into a broader bill, which Mr. Malan said his group supports, designed to raise U.S. scrutiny of the security implications of foreign-led deals. That bill cleared the House Financial Services Committee by voice vote, and is expected to garner wide support on the House floor when it is considered, possibly in the final week of February. Senate leaders have also vowed to take on the issue.

The House committee also approved, by a 40-29 vote, an amendment requiring a presidential decision in transactions involving companies from countries deemed by the U.S. to be sponsors of terrorism.

Bush Budget Plan's Drug Fees Attacked (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, February 14, 2007

President Bush's proposed budget will create new industry fees to help finance the Food and Drug Administration, tying it more closely to the businesses it regulates.

The FDA says fees help it get good products to market faster, but critics say they give business too much influence. At a congressional hearing Tuesday on the FDA's drug-review record, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said the drug-review fees already in place have helped compromise the FDA's ability to ensure a safe drug supply.

Of the FDA's proposed $2.1 billion budget for fiscal 2008, 21.3% would come from user fees paid mostly by drug, medical device and food companies. That's about the same as in last year's proposed budget.

The FDA first required drugmakers in 1993 to pay fees to help fund reviews of new human drugs before they are approved for sale. User fees for animal-drug reviews began in 2003 and for medical-device reviews in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0131930

Now, the FDA seeks fees for generic-drug reviews, for food and animal-feed exporters seeking FDA certification, and for re-inspections of FDA-regulated facilities, including manufacturing plants, that fail a first FDA check. Drugmakers will pay the bulk of the $444 million in fees the FDA expects to raise in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1.

In addition to criticism from some members of Congress, the drug industry is questioning the growth of user fees, too. In the next fiscal year, drugmakers will fund almost 60% of the FDA's reviews of human-drug applications, estimates the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America. That's up from about 40% 10 years ago. "There's concern about it getting this high," says Alan Goldhammer, PhRMA deputy vice president for regulatory affairs.

The Biotechnology Industry Association says user fees should fund no more than half the FDA's drug-review budget. The fees started because companies wanted faster drug reviews, but they were never envisioned to get this big, says James Greenwood, the association's CEO.

He says user fees have not compromised the FDA's independence in drug reviews. But he adds that the level of fees gives ammunition to FDA and industry critics.

The administration says generic-drug fees are needed to defray the costs of a soaring number of reviews.

The president's budget includes $81 billion in new user fees for numerous industries over five years — double the level proposed last year — according to Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., chairman of the House Budget Committee. In an analysis, Spratt said Congress has rejected many new fees in the past and "is likely to do so again."

Senators Take Health Plan To Bush (AP)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 14, 2007

A group of 10 senators — five Republicans and five Democrats — told President Bush on Tuesday that they have agreed on a blueprint for increasing health insurance coverage, and they would like to work with him on it.

The White House, hoping to generate some positive momentum for the president's domestic agenda, quickly took the lawmakers up on their offer. Spokesman Tony Fratto said the senator's letter was unique in the current political climate and he hoped that meetings with the senators' staff could begin soon.

"It's a letter we'd love to get on Social Security," Fratto said. "Tell me of another letter like this on an important issue, that's bipartisan, and says let's try to work on a common problem."

The senators said they disagreed that the Senate is too divided to pass comprehensive health care legislation. Their blueprint, while vague on many points, contains two proposals that are essential, said Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore.

The first point was a "big lift" for Republicans, he said. It acknowledges that legislation should ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality health insurance, while protecting current government programs such as Medicare and Medicaid.

The second point required compromise from Democrats, he said, because they agreed with Bush that the current federal tax rules for health insurance disproportionately favor the rich while promoting inefficiency.

Bush has proposed a major shift in tax policy that would, for the first time, treat health insurance costs as taxable income. The result is that workers' taxable wages would shoot up dramatically.

But then the president calls for a standard tax deduction for those who buy health insurance — $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for individual coverage. The result is that most people would see a tax break at first.

Wyden said the lawmakers were not endorsing the president's tax proposal. They only acknowledged that the current tax rules were problematic.

Allan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council, said Bush was committed to working with the lawmakers.

"The president put his health care proposal forward in the State of the Union. These senators are taking that proposal seriously, and we look forward to working with them to find common ground," Hubbard said.

However, many Democratic leaders have criticized the president's tax proposal, and many have predicted little chance of major health care legislation passing before the next election.

DOJ_NMG_0131931

In a joint statement two weeks ago, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said that health care is a crisis when it comes to costs and coverage "and the president's plan will make both fronts worse for millions of Americans."

The 10 senators who wrote Bush were Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad of North Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Maria Cantwell of Washington, Herb Kohl of Wisconsin, and Wyden, and Republican Sens. Jim DeMint of South Carolina, Robert Bennett of Utah, Mike Crapo of Idaho, Trent Lott of Mississippi and John Thune of South Dakota.

Adding Up The Reasons For Expensive Health Care (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

It's hardly an original point, but now that health-care reform is back on the political agenda, it's worth emphasizing: The reason the system has been so resistant to change is that lots of powerful interests do very nicely with things just the way they are.

Or, put another way: Although doctors, hospitals, insurers and drug companies say they, too, want things to change, any comprehensive reform would reduce their incomes and their profits.

All this becomes quite clear from a new study on the U.S. health-care system released without fanfare last month by McKinsey Global Institute, the independent research arm of the giant consulting firm, which counts many health-industry giants among it clients.

The study aimed to determine why the United States spends nearly double the average of other industrialized countries on health care -- with no better, and in some cases inferior, medical outcomes. Even after adjusting for wealth, population mix and higher levels of some diseases, McKinsey calculated that we spend $477 billion a year more on health care than would be expected if the United States fit the spending pattern of 13 other advanced countries. That staggering waste of money works out to 3.6 percent of the nation's entire economic output, or $1,645 per person, every year.

In laying out with remarkable clarity how and where we overpay, the McKinsey report punctures myths, exposes common misconceptions and highlights realities long ignored in the health-care debate.

Let's start with one the American Medical Association hopes no one will notice, which is that American doctors make a lot more money than doctors elsewhere -- roughly twice as much. The average incomes of $274,000 for specialists and $173,000 for general practitioners are, respectively, 6.6 and 4.2 times those of the average patient. The rate in the other countries is 4 and 3.2.

According to McKinsey, the difference works out to $58 billion a year. What drives it is not how much doctors charge per procedure, but how many procedures they perform and how many patients they see -- a volume of business 60 percent higher here than elsewhere.

Included in the income figures is $8 billion physicians earn as investors in diagnostic labs and outpatient surgical clinics. The good news is that those private facilities charge 20 to 30 percent less than hospitals for what they do. But McKinsey found that they don't save the system any money because the doctors who invest in them wind up ordering more tests and surgeries than doctors who don't -- in the case of tests, two to eight times more.

What we have here is pretty good circumstantial evidence of Pearlstein's First Law of Health Economics, which holds that if you pay doctors on the basis of how many procedures they do, and you leave it to doctors and their insured patients to decide how much health care they get, consumption of health services will rise to whatever level is necessary for doctors to earn as much as the lawyers who sue them.

Don't be distracted by arguments that American doctors need to make more because they have to pay $20 billion a year in malpractice insurance premiums forced on them by a hostile legal system, or an equal amount for all the paperwork required by our private insurance system. The $58 billion in what the study defines as excess physician income is calculated after those expenses are paid.

And McKinsey gives the back of its hand to the argument that American doctors deserve to earn more because of all the loans they take out while going through medical school and residency. Comparing median lifetime annual salary to median educational debt at graduation, McKinsey found that doctors do better than those in other professions requiring advanced degrees.

While higher volume is the story behind higher physician costs in the United States, the culprit for spending on hospitals and drugs is higher prices.

While Americans spend fewer days in the hospital than people elsewhere, that efficiency is more than offset by a higher average cost per day -- $1,666, four times the industrial-country average. There are multiple causes for this $224 billion in annual overspending on hospital services -- everything from more serious illnesses to more nurses per bed to extraordinary overhead and capital costs. The hospitals will whine about all their free care for the uninsured. McKinsey concludes that is a relatively minor factor in an industry that has managed to rack up hefty operating profits in recent years, even at supposedly nonprofit hospitals.

Despite all that annoying drug advertising on TV, Americans pop fewer pills than people elsewhere. But, according to McKinsey, we still manage to spend $57 billion a year more for drugs than other developed countries. Some of that is because the newest and most expensive drugs are typically available here 18 months before most other places. But the much bigger reason, McKinsey found, is that drug companies are able to charge, on average, 60 to 70 percent more for branded prescription drugs.

We can debate whether drug companies really need the extraordinary returns they get to sustain the level of innovation they produce; one can certainly point to other innovative high-tech industries that manage to thrive on more reasonable returns. But the industry's vast lobbying apparatus has yet to come up with a credible reason for why such a disproportionate share of that return has to come from Americans.

Proponents of a government-run "single-payer" system will certainly home in on the $84 billion a year that McKinsey found that Americans spend to administer the private sector portion of its health system -- a cost that national health plans largely avoid. But as long as Americans continue to reject a government-run health system, a private system will require something close to the $30 billion a year in after-tax profits earned by health insurance companies. What may not be necessary, McKinsey suggests, is the $32 billion that the industry spends each year on marketing and figuring out the premium for each individual or group customer in each state. Insurance-market reform could eliminate much of that expense.

Of course, any effort to reduce these excess costs faces determined opposition from well-financed lobbies, which is why many reformers prefer to focus on the goal of extending coverage to the 47 million Americans who don't have health insurance. But doing the one without the other, the McKinsey researchers warn, would be economic folly. Offering universal coverage without reining in costs would add another $77 billion each year in unnecessary and unproductive health spending.

Senate To Move On $464B Spending Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, February 14, 2007

The Senate is poised to send President Bush a huge spending bill that strikes a balance between Democrats controlling Congress and Republicans whose budget work stalled last year.

The catchall $464 billion measure would fund 13 Cabinet agencies covering foreign aid and every domestic agency save for the Homeland Security Department. A final vote is slated for Wednesday after Democrats on Tuesday won a key vote to limit debate by a lopsided 71-26 margin.

The measure will be the first major bill to work its way through both the House and Senate since the Democratic takeover, but it also has support from Bush because it sticks within the overall budget limit he and congressional Republicans set last year.

At the same time, the bill reflects the priorities of its Democratic authors, who shifted funds from Bush's requests for foreign aid and military base projects to popular programs such as health research, law enforcement and low-income housing, among others.

The vote to cut off debate — forcing a final vote Wednesday — split Republicans, with conservatives protesting hardball tactics by Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and pragmatists preferring to move on with the budget and avoid any possible confrontation over a partial government shutdown.

Republicans found little to criticize in the bill itself, and many senior GOP lawmakers helped write the measure.

Bush has signaled he will sign the bill, even though Democrats drained $3 billion from his budget for construction and closure of military bases. And he appears willing to accept several billion dollars added to the bill through bookkeeping maneuvers such as tapping a crime victims fund and claiming phantom savings from highway programs.

Most of the resulting spending offered small but welcome funding increases to agencies limping along at or below last year's funding levels. Agencies such as the FBI faced furloughs, while the Veterans Affairs Department needed $3.6 billion above last year for its health care programs.

State governments in particular were anxious for additional highway construction funds instead of seeing them frozen at 2006 levels.

All of the budgeting work was supposed to have been completed months ago, but Republicans didn't want to make some of the tough choices before the election and made no serious effort to complete the work after it. The leftovers required weeks of negotiations to clean up, and since Senate Republicans were deeply involved in the talks, the bill had considerable momentum when reaching the floor last week.

The bill also provides increases for underperforming schools and community health centers, and grants to state and local law enforcement agencies.

Lawmakers were especially pleased with a $260 boost, to $4,310, in the maximum Pell Grant for low-income college students, and with a 40 percent increase, to $4.5 billion, for fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas.

On the other hand, Bush did not get as much for NASA as he desired, and Republicans blasted Democrats for cutting $3 billion from Bush's request to implement a 2005 round of military base closings and consolidations. They said the budget cuts would slow the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases such as Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and also delay funding for communities to prepare closed bases for other uses.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., promised the military base funding would be provided in a $100 billion-plus Iraq war funding bill expected to advance next month — though GOP critics say such a maneuver would amount to budgetary trick that would use the Iraq funding bill to get around funding limits.

The bill is free of congressional "earmarks" — the projects lawmakers like to slip into spending bills, such as grants for local governments, homestate universities, hospitals and roads. Such projects exploded in number under Republican control of Congress over the last 12 years.

Spending Bill Headed To Final Vote In Senate (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

Democrats won a key test vote yesterday as the Senate prepares to send a massive $464 billion catchall spending bill to President Bush's desk.

The bill would wrap up budget business left unfinished last year after Congress failed to complete work on nine spending bills covering foreign aid and every domestic agency save for the Department of Homeland Security.

The measure will be the first major bill to work its way through both the House and Senate since the Democratic takeover last month. It has support from the president because it sticks within the overall budget limit set by him and congressional Republicans last year.

The Senate voted 71-26 to limit debate on the bill, clearing the way for a final vote in time to beat a midnight deadline tomorrow. Republicans agreed despite frustration with hardball tactics employed by Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, who denied rank-and-file lawmakers any chance to amend the measure.

That is ordinarily the kind of move that incites the minority party to filibuster. But with much in the bill to please senators, including senior Republicans on the Appropriations Committee, Republicans didn't have the stomach to hold up the bill.

The bill reflects the priorities of its authors, the Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations committees, who shifted funds from Mr. Bush's requests for foreign aid and military base projects to popular programs such as health research, law enforcement and low-income housing.

Most of the funding shifts were small but were needed to avoid furloughs or other problems at agencies such as the FBI that are limping along at or below last year's funding levels. State governments in particular are eager for additional highway-construction funds instead of having them frozen at 2006 levels.

All of the budgeting work was supposed to have been completed months ago, but the Republican-led Congress made no serious effort to complete the work before the midterm elections in November.

Republicans criticized the measure for cutting $3 billion from Mr. Bush's request to implement a 2005 round of military base closings and consolidations. They said the budget cuts would slow the redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases such as Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and also delay funding for communities to prepare closed bases for other uses.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, promised that the military base funding would be provided in a $100 billion-plus Iraq war funding bill expected to advance next month -- though Republican critics say such a maneuver would amount to budgetary trick that would use the Iraq funding bill to circumvent funding limits.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, took to the floor yesterday to criticize Democrats for failing to fund a $30 million program he authored to test newborns for the AIDS virus. The National Alliance of State and Territorial AIDS Directors opposed Mr. Coburn's amendment because it would cut funding in other AIDS prevention programs.

Spending Plan Nears Passage; House Clears Way For Iraq Debate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Congress is poised to send President Bush a $463.5 billion spending bill that bears the imprint of the new Democratic majority and presages budget battles over defense and domestic priorities.

Veterans' medical services, education and health care will see spending increases even as $3.1 billion is cut from Mr. Bush's 2007 request for military-construction funds to accommodate base closings overseas.

Senate Republicans had protested the cut, but 23 of them joined Democrats on a 71-26 procedural vote that sealed passage of the bill, which will dictate spending for the final eight months of this fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

The Senate vote came as the House began debate on a resolution challenging Mr. Bush's decision to send at least 21,500 more U.S. troops to try to curb sectarian violence in Iraq. The twin events underscore how central defense spending will be to the 2008 budget debate this spring, and how emotions over the Iraq war can make the debate more difficult for both parties.

The administration's $481.1 billion defense budget represents an 11.3% increase, not counting an additional $141.7 billion for costs of the Iraq war and other overseas military operations, such as Afghanistan. By comparison, Mr. Bush's promises just a 1% increase in domestic non-defense appropriations; with passage of the bill now and the resulting effect on 2007 spending, the White House concedes that increase will be half what it said a week ago or 0.5%.

In shaping their budget, Democrats will surely trim from the president's defense request to pay for domestic priorities. The debate is more complicated this year because of the emotions of Iraq, changes in the defense industry, and pressure for emergency funds to meet demands from Gulf Coast states still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.) must navigate in a chamber divided by Iraq, and with only a one-vote majority in the absence of Sen. Tim Johnson (D., S.D.), who is recovering from a stroke.

"I've got a 50-49 majority until Senator Johnson gets back," Mr. Conrad says. "Can you imagine holding those 50 on the war costs alone?"

The huge expenditures for Iraq have reflected a major government investment not in the high profile ships, fighters and tanks of past military buildups, but more in trucks, body armor, and communications equipment needed for a mobile Army in this type of war.

For example, Wisconsin's Oshkosh Truck Corp. saw its defense sales rise to $1.3 billion in 2006 from $774 million in fiscal 2004, a 68% increase. As midlevel defense contractors have commanded a greater share of the budget, there is potential competition with larger players such as Lockheed Martin Corp., which takes the lead in new weapons systems such as the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which the U.S. Air Force is trying to fund in part through the president's latest Iraq war supplemental request.

A third pressure point is the aftermath of Katrina, and Democratic promises to do more to help states facing huge reconstruction costs. The administration has opened the door by incorporating some domestic disaster aid into its Iraq supplemental, and that also sets up competition with defense funds.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) said Katrina would be a priority this spring, and housing issues affecting Gulf Coast states reflect larger pent-up demand for more federal action on low-income housing elsewhere.

Antipoverty groups have supported provisions in the bill that would redistribute $460 million in housing assistance, and while some cities will be net losers, supporters argue in many cases idle funds will be put to work.

"The old approach shorted hundreds of local agencies and caused them to cut their programs, even as other agencies piled up millions of dollars in unspent funds," said Bob Greenstein, of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in Washington. "Under the new approach, such cuts will be avoided and more families in need will be served, because the funds will be distributed far more efficiently."

Democrats Prove Accounting Gimmicks Are Bipartisan (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON - When President Bush sent Congress his 2008 budget last week, Democratic lawmakers accused him of using accounting gimmicks to appear fiscally responsible and intent on reducing the federal deficit.

Turns out, the Democrats have some accounting tricks of their own.

A massive spending bill to fund the government through September contains billions of dollars in savings that exist only on paper, but which free up real money to spend on discretionary programs Bush has sought to cut.

"It's a way of finding some money to reassert Democratic priorities without being labeled big spenders," said Tim Penny, a former Democratic congressman from Minnesota.

The House of Representatives passed the $463.5 billion appropriations legislation Jan. 31, and the Senate took it up Tuesday.

While the Bush budget looks ahead, the appropriations measure covers the current fiscal year.

Budget experts from both parties, including current and former lawmakers and senior aides, said the Democrats' legislation relies on various types of creative accounting and side deals in order for it to appear to avoid new deficit spending.

Among the examples:

-The measure provides $2.49 billion for the ongoing realignment and closing of military bases, less than half the amount authorized by the last Congress. There is bipartisan agreement to make up the difference - $3.14 billion - in subsequent "emergency" supplemental appropriations.

-The measure eliminates $3.5 billion in "contract authority" for federal highway projects, but it doesn't decrease "obligation limitations" by an equivalent amount. Congress uses "contract authority" to set how much money states can seek in highway grants, but it doesn't determine how much money they actually get. Appropriators make those decisions each year by setting "obligation limitations," and those limitations must be lowered in order for the actual spending to be decreased.

-The bill puts a $625 million cap on the amount of money to be distributed from the Crime Victims Fund, which Congress created in 1984 to help the victims of heinous crimes. The cap saves $1.25 billion on paper, but the government is required by previous law to pay the crime victims, so there will be no corresponding reduction in spending.

Democrats now running Congress needed to craft the giant spending bill because Republicans voted out of power in November had appropriated money only for the Defense and Homeland Security departments.

A temporary measure providing discretionary funds for the rest of the government expires Thursday, so Congress must approve the current bill by then. The House passed it 286-140, and the Senate is expected to approve it.

Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia and Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin, the new Democratic chairmen of the Senate and House appropriations committees, put the measure together without hearings. Lawmakers cannot offer amendments.

"We're very proud of this bill because this is the cleanest bill that has passed Congress in a long time," said Kirstin Brost, a spokeswoman for Obey. "We got rid of all the earmarks. We got rid of all kinds of gimmicks that the president had proposed."

DOJ_NMG_0131936

Byrd, well known for using arcane budget procedures to bring federal windfalls back home to West Virginia, didn't respond to interview requests.

Some of the beneficiaries of the extra money freed up by the Democrats' maneuvers are state and local police, the Army Corps of Engineers and Amtrak.

"Republican appropriators did this, too," said Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, senior Republican on the House Budget Committee. "These guys add up their priorities, find out they're over (budget limits) by $10 billion or $12 billion, then they come up with these gimmicks to massage the numbers. I hate to say it, but both parties do it."

Such bookkeeping maneuvers are so well known on Capitol Hill that lawmakers and aides jokingly call them "Enron accounting rules," after the Houston energy company that collapsed because of phony fiscal schemes that sent several senior executives to prison.

William Hoagland, who served as a Senate Budget Committee staff director for 20 years, was former Majority Leader Bill Frist's point man on fiscal matters from 2003 through last year.

"These pay shifts, these delays, these advance appropriations are not unusual," Hoagland said. "They're not big in the grand scheme of things, but they can make a difference in whether you can fund a program at $100 million versus $200 million. In the average American's world, that's a lot of money."

Sen. Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican, said he would vote against the bill, despite having led a successful drive to prevent it from having new earmarks, secret, anonymous funding for lawmakers' pet projects.

"All in all, I feel like this represents some progress, even though there are still a lot of budgetary games stuck in here," DeMint said.

Hoagland acknowledged that the former GOP congressional leaders bequeathed a financial muddle to their Democratic successors, who now need to get 2007 funding behind them and focus on appropriations for the 2008 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

"One could claim that this is just cleaning up the mess we (Republicans) left behind," Hoagland said.

Business Seeks To Defeat Bill On Unions (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Business interests are bracing for their first clash with the Democratic Congress, raising millions of dollars to defeat a proposal to ease labor-organizing efforts.

A House committee is set to begin work today on the Employee Free Choice Act, which would give greater legal protection for union organizers and would let workers choose to organize simply by signing pro-union cards rather than holding a federally supervised election.

Labor leaders made enactment of such a law a priority, after spending heavily in last year's elections to help their Democratic allies win control of Congress.

The AFL-CIO and other labor groups say that having the ability to organize workers through a card-signing process will help them to stem the multidecade decline in union representation. The percentage of wage and salaried workers in unions last year was 12%, compared with 20% in 1983. More union members may translate into greater political influence and clout at the bargaining table.

Lining up against the bill is the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, including trade groups such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce as well as retailers and the National Federation of Independent Business. The group plans to run television ads in several states and House districts, targeting Democrats and Republicans.

"We will make sure that there is some pain associated with voting for this," said coalition spokesman Todd Harris.

Their efforts parallel those of the Center for Union Facts, which also is rallying companies to oppose the law and spent between $2 million and $3 million last year on television and other ads against it.

Business leaders say the law could allow unions to organize all or a portion of a company's work force before management became aware of the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0131937

Small franchise owners "could wake up one day, and they'd be organized. This is so efficient for unions, it makes it possible to organize on a very small scale," said David French of the International Franchise Association.

Labor leaders say a federally supervised organizing election remains an option if one-third of the workers want it. The use of organizing cards is important, they say, because union advocates and workers have faced retaliation in some workplaces as balloting approaches.

Supporters say they can get the bill through the House, where it has bipartisan support, but business groups hope to gain ground in the more narrowly divided Senate, particularly among Republicans who could try to block it with a filibuster.

That is where both sides expect a showdown. The business community "realizes that they have the advantage right now in terms of how the law is implemented," said AFL-CIO President John Sweeney.

Even if the bill fails, labor leaders want recorded votes in both chambers so they have a record for the 2008 elections.

Business, Labor Brace For Battle (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

In what is set to be their first major showdown since Democrats took control of Congress, business and labor interests are poised for a multimillion-dollar clash over a measure to make it easier for workers to unionize.

Deep-pocketed corporate lobbying groups have joined together to defeat the proposal, today announcing the launch of a new coalition to coordinate their activities. The effort, called the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, has the backing of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business, among others.

Facing them is an informal alliance of labor groups, headed by the AFL-CIO and the breakaway Change to Win unions, working across a divide in the labor movement to advance the measure. They also have the backing of Americans United, a liberal group closely aligned with Congressional Democrats.

At issue in the fight is the Employee Free Choice Act. A top priority for labor unions and Democratic leadership, the bill would allow employees at a workplace to organize once a majority sign cards indicating they want to join a union.

Labor officials say the issue is about economic fairness, arguing corporate intimidation has contributed to a decades-long slide in union membership, which in turn has frozen workers out of improving economic conditions. Businesses counter that replacing the current system of secret-ballot votes will violate workers' privacy and expose them to bullying by union organizers.

With union membership continuing to drop — it fell to 12 percent of all workers last year from 12.5 the year before — the issue is gaining urgency in the labor movement. Labor unions, which provide critical help funding Democratic electoral efforts, reportedly signed up 150,000 new members last year using the card-check elections.

Under the bill, workers could pick whether to unionize through card checks or secret-ballot elections, and their employers would be bound to recognize the result.

The bill, set for markup today in the House Education and Labor Committee, is expected to cruise to House passage next month. It already claims 234 cosponsors, including seven Republicans.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) hopes to introduce it early next month, and labor lobbyists said they are already working to line up a majority of Senators to sign on. But even though they got a jumpstart pushing the bill — kicking off their drive in December with a Capitol Hill press event featuring Kennedy and House labor panel chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) — labor lobbyists acknowledge they face tough odds.

For starters, rounding up the 60 votes needed to end a filibuster could be difficult. "It's a challenge," said Bill Samuel, director of legislation for the AFL-CIO. "We hope that a strong House vote will convince Senators this is the right thing to do." Even then, President Bush is expected to veto the measure.

The battle will be joined next week when lawmakers head home for the Presidents Day recess.

The AFL-CIO plans to target 90 Congressional districts, mostly to shore up support for lawmakers who have indicated they will back the measure. About a dozen of their targets will be Republicans so far undecided or opposed.

DOJ_NMG_0131938

Americans United will take on an additional 15 to 20 GOPers who have lined up against the bill, spokesman Brad Woodhouse said. “Our view is that the folks within the labor community can hug their targets,” he said. “On the other hand, we want to thump those that don’t do the right thing.”

Officials with the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace declined to discuss specifics of their plans for the break, but said they will tap the state affiliates of their member groups to start reaching out to members. “We’re going to be very active in the field over the next few weeks. And we’ll begin the education campaign as Members return home,” said Danielle Ringwood, a member of the coalition’s management committee and lobbyist for the Associated Builders and Contractors.

The business-backed group launches today with a Web site (www.myprivateballot.com) and polling information supporting their position. At the House markup today, coalition representatives will hand out fliers featuring a photo of a toilet, and inset, a voting booth, with the tagline: “Some things are designed for privacy. Here are two of them.”

The group has tapped Todd Harris, a partner with the all-Republican firm DC Navigators and a former aide to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), to head up its media and lobbying strategy.

In the face of the daunting tally of co-sponsors, coalition leaders said they are not going to concede the House vote. Instead, they are aiming to find signers whose support is soft. “A lot of Members have signed onto this bill without really grasping what they’ve co-sponsored. Our task as a coalition is to educate them and help them understand they’ve been sold a bill of goods,” said David French, another coalition manager and lobbyist with the International Franchise Association.

But a House Republican aide said for GOPers and their allies, the best hope “is to extract as much blood as possible through the debate, and then let the Senate weigh in from there.”

The foes are concentrating on field work for the meantime, but both sides said they plan to be on the air with ads as the fight moves to the Senate. And they each pledged they have the resources to keep up the fight for a long time — into next year and beyond if necessary.

For support, Americans United is calling on groups that lent money and organizational strength to its Change America Now campaign, which backed up the economic pieces of House Democrats’ “100 hours” agenda. That group is still focused on final passage of a minimum wage hike, but with House Democrats pivoting to regular order, Woodhouse said the employee card-check bill will become a top priority.

“It fits nicely into the broad spectrum of issues we’re pushing to relieve the middle class squeeze and create a better balance in the economy between the most productive workforce in the world and corporate executives and managers,” he said. “This may be a longer-term process. But if Republicans obstruct this, then part of what we do is make sure they pay a price with the public.”

Harris said his group is just getting started.

“We’re literally in the process of getting the curtain open on this thing. Over the next six months to a year, you’re going to see the coalition highlighting not only the impressive group of organizations that are supporting us but making sure people understand that underneath this fight in Washington are real lives, and real workers whose right to privacy is going to be stripped away should this bill pass,” he said.

If the Big Six Want to Talk About CO2 Emissions, California Will Listen

In response to your Feb. 6 editorial "Legal Hot Air":

The world's six largest automakers are crying foul about a recent case filed by California seeking redress for CO2-induced damage. They argue that courts are not the proper place for this kind of "global" issue. This sudden aversion to litigation is perplexing, given that these same companies have sued states repeatedly, in numerous jurisdictions, insisting that the courts must overturn all state laws dealing with greenhouse gas emissions. The companies hew to this path of complete resistance despite the fact that the vast majority of climate scientists believe that the world is facing a potential catastrophe.

Let me be clear: I also would prefer to reach solutions outside of the courthouse. Litigation can be expensive and time consuming. That is why I asked for a meeting with each of the CEOs of the car companies to find practical solutions to global warming. If they want to sideline the lawyers and talk about solutions, I am all for it. Meantime, they shouldn't call California's lawsuit "frivolous" while maintaining so many lawsuits of their own.

California's public nuisance case is well grounded in precedent. For more than 100 years the Supreme Court has allowed states to take legal action to prevent the destruction of their air and natural resources. In a case called Georgia v. Tennessee Copper, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes -- not a man known for indulging frivolous claims -- wrote, "It is a fair and reasonable demand on the part of a sovereign that the air over its territory should not be polluted on a great scale . . . or threatened by the act of persons beyond its control. . . ." More recently, the Supreme Court declared, "Air pollution is, of course, one of the most notorious types of public nuisance in modern experience."

The Big Six automakers generate 20% of all of the human-made carbon dioxide emissions in the U.S., and at least 30% of such emissions in California. Yet they oppose any federal action to curtail greenhouse gases. To date, their intense lobbying has been very successful: Congress has not improved fuel efficiency standards in 15 years, President Bush steadfastly refuses to consider caps on greenhouse gases, and the Environmental Protection Agency says that the Clean Air Act does not apply to CO2.

Meanwhile, California, with more than one thousand miles of coastline and a Sierra snow pack containing one third of the state's annual water supply, faces rising sea levels and rapidly melting snow. This threatens levees, flood control systems and California's irrigated agriculture. Already, spring snow melt occurs a week earlier, with greater flooding, than it did 30 years ago. The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change just warned us again that the threats from global warming are mounting. It is time to act.

Under our tripartite system of government, courts have an essential role to play, even in issues as complex as global warming. Justice Holmes could be speaking directly to the automakers, when he wrote: "This is a suit by a state for an injury to it in its capacity of quasi-sovereign. In that capacity the state has an interest independent of . . . its citizens, in all the earth and air within its domain. It has the last word as to whether its mountains shall be stripped of their forests and its inhabitants shall breathe pure air." And, we can add, whether emissions of greenhouse gases can harm its economy and environment.

Global warming is a serious, unavoidable challenge and we need to face it. The path of litigation, first taken up by the auto companies, is not my preference. But a legal cease fire requires that both sides lay down their arms. We should use our considerable joint resources to help fashion a common sense and practical approach. I stand ready to do so.

Required Health Plans Ethically Impossible

We read of health-care plan after plan that in some manner "require" all people to purchase health insurance ("The Budget and Your Wallet -- How Plans to Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured," Personal Journal, Feb. 6). Exactly what are we to do with the person who doesn't purchase health insurance (thus, breaking the law), and then who shows up at the door of the ER with chest pains?

Until we are willing to let people die on the steps of the hospital, an approach that I don't support, any law "requiring" the purchase of coverage, without active enforcement and without penalties for non-compliance, will quickly be written off by the uncovered masses as a law without teeth. "Requiring" coverage is just a feel-good phrase.

Gutter Snipes or Savvy Businessmen?

Friday's piece on strippers and Super Bowl Sunday ("Wardrobe Malfunctions, Inc.," Weekend Journal, Feb. 2) was certainly funny, but the sound of my own chuckles had the fortunate effect of bringing me to my senses. I remembered how our popular culture continues to slide into the gutter without much of a splash or any apparent resistance from those who know better.

Who but a sanctimonious prude would question another man's decision to amuse his friends at half time by paying a stranger to remove her clothing right there in the den among the nachos, chicken wings and Little League trophies? To call it sleazy or dishonorable seems too harsh and uncomfortably judgmental.

And that's my point. Hiring a stripper is sleazy and dishonorable, but I get the sense that, by an unspoken rule among us men, we're all supposed to keep our mouths shut about it and just have a few laughs. The tone of this story, even its publication, suggests that the Journal has, on some level, adopted that unspoken rule. We should all know better. Why not some dissent for a change?

Sam Walker wrote a really terrific article. I administer a class at the University of Arizona designed to encourage science students to become entrepreneurs, and only days ago did we discuss supply-chain management and distribution. When I read this piece, I was delighted how he exposed the business side of this industry and articulated the need for superb supply-chain management and customer-needs analysis to sustain and grow these businesses. The article reinforced a guiding principle I emphasize in my class: The fundamentals of operation, sustainability, growth and expansion of any business are universal across industry lines. The distribution techniques that bring triumph to the "exotic dancing" industry can also bring success in biotechnology and optics. The article serves as a great case study. You can learn a lot from any victorious business, and I hope my students got this message from the piece as much as I did.

What Mean Means

Dr. Robert Myers, in his Feb. 1 Letter to the Editor responding to Charles Murray's three-part editorial-page series "On Education," compounds Mr. Murray's original error regarding definitions of mathematical mean vs. mathematical median. Mr. Murray stated that half of all children in the U.S. are below average intelligence; Dr. Myers stated that Mr. Murray should have written below the mean, not the average.

The mean and the average are the same thing. What both authors should have said is median. The median, by definition, is the value below which exactly half of the sample points fall. Though for many common statistical distributions the mean, a.k.a. average, and the median are close, sometimes equal, they are not necessarily so.

Senator Seeks to Focus The War on al Qaeda

Kimberley A. Strassel's Feb. 2 Potomac Watch column "Senator Feingold's Sin" was right to single out the senator's "honesty" and "backbone" for his effort to require that U.S. troops be redeployed from Iraq. But to say that "the Wisconsin pacifist might not understand the importance of winning in Iraq" misunderstands Sen. Feingold and his effort, which is based on strengthening U.S. national security above all else.

The senator called for redeploying our troops from Iraq because our massive, indefinite presence there is weakening our ability to fight the terrorist networks that threaten this country around the world. He voted to go to war in Afghanistan precisely because he wanted U.S. forces to eliminate the Taliban and destroy a safe haven for terrorist networks that threaten our country.

As your editorial noted, Congress has the power to end a war. Sen. Feingold wants Congress to use that power to end U.S. involvement in this disastrous war in Iraq, so that we can fight al Qaeda and other global threats more aggressively and effectively. That doesn't sound like a pacifist, does it?

Georgia Congressman Norwood Dies At 65 (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131941

Rep. Charles Norwood Jr., a blunt-spoken Georgia Republican who sold his dental practice and ran for Congress at age 52, died Tuesday after battling cancer and lung disease.

Norwood, 65, died at his home in Augusta, Ga., his spokesman said. House members debating the war in Iraq interrupted proceedings for two moments of silence in his honor.

President Bush, in a statement, described Norwood as "a good friend and a strong, spirited legislator who always stuck to his principles."

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue called Norwood an "incredible example of strength and dedication" and ordered flags to be lowered at all state buildings.

The vacancy created by his death will be filled by a special election.

A feisty, tobacco-chewing conservative who loved to hunt and who railed against government bureaucracy, he beat Democratic incumbent Don Johnson in 1994 to become the first Republican to represent his eastern Georgia district since shortly after the Civil War.

Norwood had a dry wit and rarely settled for diplomatic language. When a Democrat complained that Norwood cut off questioning at a mine safety hearing last year, Norwood responded: "When you get in charge, you get to run the damn thing. Right now, you're not."

He wasn't afraid to criticize his own party when he thought it was veering off course. Last year he called Republicans who backed compromise immigration legislation "turncoats."

Norwood's passion was health care. Taking on insurance companies, he spent much of his political career pressing for a "patients' bill of rights" aimed at giving consumers better access to care, including greater ability to sue insurers.

More recently, he focused on the issue of immigration, saying the country faces a "true invasion" and calling for nearly 40,000 troops on the border. He was one of just 33 House members to vote against renewing the Voting Rights Act last year, arguing that it discriminates against Southern states over long-past racial transgressions.

Norwood prided himself on serving his district, touting his success in cutting through federal regulations a decade ago to allow a constituent to bring home a stuffed polar bear he had killed on a hunting trip in Canada.

Born in Valdosta, Ga., on July 27, 1941, he attended public schools before going off to boarding school at Baylor School, a military academy in Chattanooga, Tenn.

While there, Norwood shot and killed a close friend while playing quick-draw with what they thought was an unloaded pistol. An advocate for gun rights, he said the accident convinced him that education and training are the best gun control.

He married his wife, Gloria, in 1962 while at Georgia Southern College. He earned a doctorate in dental surgery from Georgetown University in Washington, volunteered for the Army and served a combat tour in Vietnam in 1968, earning two Bronze Stars.

He is survived by his wife, two sons, Charles and Carlton, and four grandchildren.

The family scheduled a public visitation Wednesday and public memorial service Thursday, both in Augusta.

Special House Election Looms (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

As politicians from Capitol Hill to Atlanta mourned the death of Rep. Charlie Norwood (R-Ga.) on Tuesday, calculations and preparations already were under way for a special election to fill the vacancy in the Augusta-based 10th district.

Among the local GOP lawmakers considered most likely to run to succeed Norwood are state Rep. Barry Fleming and state Sens. Ralph Hudgens and Jim Whitehead.

Former state Sen. Brian Kemp (R) and state Rep. Ben Harbin (R) also have been mentioned as possible candidates. However, Harbin's perch as chairman of the Appropriations Committee is a powerful incentive for him to stay put.

In Georgia, state lawmakers must resign their seats once they qualify to run in a special election — a requirement that could severely limit what otherwise would be a large field of candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0131942

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) now has 10 days to issue a writ of election, which will allow the Georgia secretary of state's office to set the date for the special election. The contest, which must occur 30 days after the writ of election is issued, will be an all-party primary in which the first-place finisher must get more than 50 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff.

If a runoff is necessary, it will occur four weeks after the special election.

Although some Georgia municipalities are holding elections on March 20, neither of the 10th district's largest cities has local elections already scheduled for that date.

One of the biggest questions that remains to be answered is whether Norwood, who had been hospitalized almost since the beginning of the year while he received cancer treatments, had a preferred successor in mind.

As his health deteriorated his refusal to relinquish the seat he had held for a dozen years had led to speculation that he may have been laying the groundwork for the candidate of his choice to succeed him.

There also has been quiet talk about whether the Congressman's widow, Gloria Norwood, may play in role in the race to succeed her husband.

The 10th district covers the northeast corner of the state, anchored by the population centers of Augusta and Athens.

The district heavily favors Republicans, although slightly less so now than it did at the beginning of the previous Congress. When GOP state lawmakers redrew Congressional boundaries in 2005, they put Democratic-friendly Athens back in the district and also slightly increased the black population in an effort to make the neighboring 12th district more vulnerable to a Republican takeover.

About 16 percent of registered voters in the 10th district are black.

Hudgens, chairman of the state Senate Insurance and Labor Committee, said last week that he would run if there was a vacancy.

He has run for Congress several times before, with his most recent race being the 1994 GOP primary that he lost to Norwood.

Fleming, meanwhile, is viewed as one of the Legislature's rising stars. First elected in 2002, he currently is House Majority Whip and is a former chairman of the Columbia County Commission. He introduced a resolution this week honoring Norwood.

Whitehead, a businessman who was elected to the state Senate in 2004, is well-respected and has personal wealth he could devote to a Congressional run.

Fleming and Whitehead both represent Norwood's base in suburban Augusta, while Hudgens represents territory near Athens.

Kemp, meanwhile, also is from Athens and represented a swing state Senate district until the beginning of this year.

In 2006, he lost a primary bid for state agriculture commissioner, but he still is young and observers say his political career is far from over. He would appear to have the least to lose in gambling on a Congressional run because he doesn't have a legislative seat that he would be forced to relinquish.

Former Rep. Max Burns (R-Ga.), who represented the 12th district for a single term in Congress before being defeated in 2004, also has been mentioned as possibly interested in running for Norwood's seat. Burns narrowly lost a rematch with Rep. John Barrow (D) in 2006. While his home is far outside of the 10th district boundaries, Burns did represent Athens and some of the territory in the current 10th district when he was in Congress.

Several Democrats have been mentioned as possible candidates in the race to succeed Norwood, although the strong Republican nature of the district and recent political trends in the state make it appear unlikely that the party could take control of the seat.

The list of Democrats mentioned include Athens Mayor Doc Eldridge, state Reps. Jeanette Jamieson and Alan Powell and former state Sen. Carol Jackson.

Tenth district Democratic Party Chairman Terry Holley, the nominee against Norwood in 2006, also is interested in running again.

Norwood won re-election to a seventh term in November with 67 percent of the vote.

If the GOP field is crowded and Democrats are able to coalesce behind a top candidate, it might be possible to force the leading Republican candidate into a runoff. But it would be an uphill battle for the Democrat to win in a two-person contest.

Bush Offers A Rare Look At Relations With Father (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — It was a moment of public sentimentality that seemed almost un-Bush-like.

Speaking on C-Span on Monday, President Bush said of his father, "I am actually more concerned about him than I have ever been in my life, because he's paying too much attention to the news."

Mr. Bush continued: "I understand how difficult it is for a person who loves somebody to see them out in the political process and to kind of endure the criticism. My answer to him is, 'Look, don't pay attention to it. I'm doing fine.' "

His comments were a rare window into a complicated father-son relationship that has been a source of endless fascination in Washington and promises to fascinate future historians no less.

Mr. Bush has often spoken with pride of his father, and even made the case to invade Iraq in 2002 by once saying of Saddam Hussein, "After all, this is the guy who tried to kill my dad." Yet Mr. Bush, who is more frequently likened to his strong-willed mother than his more sentimental father, has at times seemed to run his administration based on what he and his aides view as his father's mistakes.

He had regularly referred to the former president's broken "no new taxes" pledge when emphasizing he has no plans to reverse course on taxes himself; his aides have often spoken about what they see as his father's error in failing to take out Saddam Hussein in the first war in the Persian Gulf. Their criticism of past United States policy in the Middle East as seeking "stability" at the expense of democracy has often been taken as a rebuke, in part, of his father's approach.

Tension between their camps has seemed especially acute in recent months, with some of Mr. Bush's aides and political associates scoffing at the approach to Iraq suggested in part by his father's old hand, James A. Baker III. Mr. Baker was a co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group and is considered something of an emissary for the so-called 41 crowd. But there are new signs that Mr. Bush, who once needed to establish a political identity distinct from his father's, is now more willing to embrace his father's political legacy.

Asked by C-Span to name presidents from whom he draws inspiration, Mr. Bush, who has often harkened to Harry S. Truman and Abraham Lincoln, said, "Well, first of all it's the obvious and that would be my dad." Asked to name the most underrated presidents, he named his father again, saying, "He followed President Reagan, who was such a really strong president that people have yet to take a look at my dad."

It has never been clear how much advice Mr. Bush receives from his father or how often they compare notes. But the two men share the bond of experiencing the intense scrutiny and criticism that only a president can know.

The former president has spoken of it. In an interview with Larry King on CNN in October, Mr. Bush, 82, described how he had taken to yelling at the television when his son's critics sounded off, though, he conceded, "It doesn't do any good."

"On some predictable critics, I sit there and talk back at the TV," Mr. Bush said. "Look at that stupid guy on there again saying ugly things about my son."

Rich Bond, a former chief of staff to the former president, said the elder Mr. Bush's more vocal concern for his son seemed to stem from "a combination of the big heart, his age and the unbelievably bad coverage George is getting."

At a political leadership forum held by his son Jeb in his last days as governor of Florida in December, the former president sobbed as he recalled Jeb's failed 1994 campaign for governor, saying, "A true measure of a man is how you handle victory and how you handle defeat."

Peggy Noonan, a former speechwriter for Ronald Reagan and the elder Mr. Bush, wrote in The Wall Street Journal, "No one who knows George H. W. Bush thinks that moment was only about Jeb."

Rather, Ms. Noonan said, "It would more likely have been about a number of things, and another son, and more than him."

Rep. Ellison Calls The Cops To Snuff Tancredo's Cigar (HILL)

By Betsy Rothstein

The Hill, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131944

Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.) believes it is his right as a Muslim to be sworn into Congress with the Quran. But apparently, the freshman lawmaker doesn't believe it's Rep. Tom Tancredo's (R-Colo.) right to smoke a cigar in his congressional office.

Ellison's office called the Capitol Hill Police on Tancredo last Wednesday night as Tancredo was in his office smoking a cigar. The lawmakers have neighboring offices on the first floor of the Longworth House Office Building.

Tancredo was still stunned a day later. "It's very bizarre," said Tancredo, who has never met Ellison. "Seemed to me not a good way to say hello."

And let's face it. Calling the cops on a colleague takes the cake for the nerviest behavior so far among members of this year's freshman class of Congress.

This is how it all went down. On Wednesday evening, around 6 p.m., Tancredo was preparing for his trip to Mississippi. And as he so often does, he was unwinding with a cigar.

Soon enough, however, a police officer walked in to check on the smoke. The officer told Tancredo that the officer came because he was required to do so and not because the officer wanted to. The officer had already told Ellison that Tancredo was permitted to smoke in his office. The visit was more a formality.

Tancredo said he would not stop smoking in his office. "Heck, no!" he said. "If he [Ellison] would have [had] the courtesy to say something I'm sure I would have been more accommodating to his wishes."

To help keep his office free of impurities, Tancredo has three air purifiers. And he has no plans to meet Ellison anytime soon. "I'm sure we will, but I'm not going to make a point [of it]," the presidential hopeful said, adding that he supported Ellison's right to be sworn in with the Quran.

Ellison's press secretary, Rick Jauert, made the call to the Superintendent's office when he noticed the smoke. "I called because the smoke was coming through the walls," Jauert said, adding that the Superintendent's office referred him to the Capitol Police.

Jauert said he then informed his boss what he had done. He said "fine," Jauert said. "He's complained of the smoke before."

Congress And Self-Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

Taxpayers have been slowly discovering the bad, the ugly and, lately, a touch of good in Congress's tight relations with the lobbying industry. Last November's candidates promised all manner of reform, and the good was the enactment of a long-overdue ban on lobbyists' currying insider clout by taking lawmakers on freebie vacations and other junkets. But the bad remains to be dealt with: the practice of lawmakers creating secondary "leadership" kitties to sock away extra money from lobbyists and other special-interest donors beyond the usual campaign committees.

What's ugly are the crass ways members routinely press lobbyists for leadership donations — for things like $5,000 hunting and fishing trips, and a face-to-face cup of designer coffee that costs a donor $2,500. They use the money to cross-pollinate fellow politicians' campaigns and, more and more, as a V.I.P. slush fund to pay for extra trips and other indulgences that are hardly the stuff of leadership.

Critics in Congress know the free-flowing PAC's, as the next big scandal waiting in the wings, should be banned under campaign finance law. The leaders of the House Democratic campaign committee, in fact, have already canceled the committee's annual ski weekend for lobbyists. Members should follow suit and ban the grossly misnamed leadership PACs as a step toward serious campaign finance reform.

"Only a moron would sell a vote for a $2,000 contribution," said one typical House member preoccupied with fund-raising. The comment unfortunately raises the question of what more tempting price might eventually emerge.

U.S. Trade Deficit Hits New High For Fifth Year In A Row (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

DOJ_NMG_0131945

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — Here's a news flash: The U.S. trade deficit set a record last year.

If that seems pretty much like a dog-bites-man story, maybe it's because 2006 marked the fifth-consecutive year that the trade deficit hit a new high. The U.S. last ran an annual trade surplus in 1975 as the Vietnam War wound down and Saturday Night Live made its television debut.

The Census Bureau reported Tuesday that the U.S. incurred a $763.6 billion trade gap last year, including a worse-than-expected monthly deficit in December of $61.2 billion. As a result of the new monthly reading, the Commerce Department is expected to revise downward its estimate that the U.S. economy expanded at an annual rate of 3.5% in the fourth quarter.

There's hope, however, that the U.S. trade imbalance with the rest of the world in goods and services may have peaked. "It's going to get a bit better," says Nigel Gault, chief U.S. economist at Global Insight.

The trade deficit last year was about $47 billion larger than in 2005, but almost all of that deterioration ($42 billion) was due to higher oil prices. With oil now well below its 2006 peak of $75 per barrel, Gault says the U.S. can expect to spend about $40 billion less on foreign oil in 2007.

Robust export performance also offers reason for optimism. In 2006, exports hit $1.4 billion, up 12.8% compared with 2005. This year, foreign sales are expected to post additional gains amid continued strong demand from customers in Europe and Japan.

If so, the 2007 trade deficit would shrink to about $680 billion, Gault says. Others, such as Brad Setser of Roubini Global Economics, expect the deficit to plateau. The U.S. trade gap with Europe already is narrowing, though trade with Asia remains far out of balance.

Some iconoclasts think the trade figures aren't worth the attention. Noting that the U.S. economy enjoyed remarkable growth over the past quarter century, even as the trade deficit ballooned, Russell Roberts, an economics professor at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va., calls trade worries "greatly overblown."

Still, the issue carries enormous political weight, and Democrats Tuesday were quick to hammer the Bush administration for the rising deficit. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California called for a "fundamental shift" in policy in a letter to President Bush that blamed stagnant wages and factory job losses on his trade strategy.

Bush is seeking an extension of his authority to negotiate trade deals, setting up a major skirmish with congressional Democrats. Another target for lawmakers will be China, which has the most unbalanced U.S. trade relationship. The Sino-U.S. trade deficit climbed 15% last year to $232.5 billion.

But China also has emerged as a major U.S. customer. In 2006, China, now the fourth-largest market for U.S. exporters, bought more U.S. goods than goods from India, France and Brazil combined.

Trade Gap Widens, Yet Outlook Is Upbeat (WSJ)

By Elizabeth Price

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Even as the U.S. trade gap widened in December for the first time in four months, economists said trade is likely to contribute to growth in coming months, as exports continue on an uptrend and oil prices, which surged in December, fall back.

Economists have long predicted that as economic demand among top U.S. trading partners caught up with rapid U.S. economic growth, the U.S. trade deficit would shrink.

"The wider gap in December does not overturn the view that the deficit has peaked," said Nigel Gault, an economist at consulting firm Global Insight.

The U.S. deficit in trade of goods and services in December grew 5.3% from the previous month to $61.18 billion, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. That marked the first monthly widening of the deficit since August. The shortfall for all of 2006 grew 6.5% to a high of $763.59 billion. It was the trade deficit's fifth yearly record in a row.

The deficit with China, by far the largest U.S. trading partner, also hit a record for the year at $232.55 billion, sparking calls for action from the Democratic-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0131946

In a letter to President Bush yesterday, Democratic congressional leaders urged the administration to get tougher in persuading China, Japan, and the European Union to lower barriers to U.S. goods, such as by using U.S. trade laws to penalize China and Japan for alleged currency manipulation.

In December, the U.S.'s monthly deficits with its trade partners mostly narrowed, however.

The gap with China shrank to $19 billion from November's $22.92 billion. The trade deficit with Canada rose, while deficits with Mexico and the European Union narrowed.

"Our exports for the year" were up strongly, "almost 13%, which is very significant growth," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said yesterday.

But during December, a 2.1% gain in imports outpaced a 0.6% rise in the value of U.S. exports. Oil accounted for much of the import gain, as the average price per barrel rose $1.59 to $53.84 for the month. Lower oil prices helped trim the trade deficit last fall. But a surprise decision by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries in December to cut production, together with the onset of colder weather, helped push up prices, boosting U.S. oil imports in dollar terms. Oil prices fell in January, and are expected to stay lower this year than in the first half of 2006.

The December trade gap was wider than the Commerce Department calculated last month when it said the U.S. economy grew 3.5% in the fourth quarter. Following yesterday's report, economists on Wall Street said the government later this month would likely lower its final growth estimate sharply for the fourth quarter.

Lou Crandall, an economist at New York economic research firm Wrightson ICAP, said he shaved a half-point from his forecast for fourth-quarter growth to just 2.2%. Still, he said trade would probably contribute to U.S. output in the months ahead, as exports are on a rising trend and oil prices softened in January.

U.S. demand for foreign-made autos and imports of industrial supplies together added more than $3 billion to the deficit. Imports of consumer goods were up, while imports of capital goods, like computers and electronic equipment fell.

U.S. exports rose to a record $125.56 billion in December, lifted by American wheat, fruit and other agriculture products. Exports of consumer goods rose, while U.S. sales of high-value aircraft eased, following a big jump in November.

For 5th Year, Trade Gap Hits Record (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — The United States ran a record trade deficit in 2006 for the fifth consecutive year, the Census Bureau reported Tuesday in an announcement that quickly reignited the dispute between the Bush administration and Democrats over the value of past and future deals lowering trade barriers.

The bureau said that the trade deficit, or gap between what the United States sells abroad and what it imports, reached a new high of $763.3 billion last year, a 6.5 percent increase over the year before. The deficit was fueled by the continuing American need for foreign oil and imports of consumer goods from China and other countries.

The record trade deficit was no surprise, since it had been foreshadowed in monthly figures over the last year. But in the current tense political climate in Washington, it was seized upon by both the Bush administration and its critics. It also seemed certain to become a factor in the accelerating presidential race.

Leading Bush administration officials noted that although the deficit had reached new levels, exports of American products were also growing at record rates, in many cases to the countries with which the United States had signed trade deals in the last six years.

“Our exports for the last year are up by nearly 13 percent,” Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, said in a telephone interview. “We’ve said all along that our strategy is to grow exports and ensure that companies know about the trade agreements we have, rather than a protectionist strategy of cutting off imports.”

Mr. Gutierrez, who interrupted a trip to India to discuss the trade figures, is one of several officials pushing Congress to approve pending trade deals with Panama, Colombia and Peru, and to extend President Bush’s authority to negotiate future trade deals and get an up-or-down vote in Congress for them. That authority expires June 30.

Democrats used the latest trade numbers to demand what the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, called "a new direction" in trade policies, placing more emphasis on opening foreign markets to American goods, protecting American products from piracy and counterfeiting, and helping American industry become more competitive.

"The consequences of these persistent and massive trade deficits include not only failed businesses, displaced workers, lower real wages, and rising inequality, but also permanent devastation of our communities," Ms. Pelosi said in a letter to Mr. Bush signed by other House Democrats.

Ms. Pelosi and the House Democratic leaders said they supported future trade deals, including efforts to conclude a global trade accord in talks sponsored by the World Trade Organization, but that these deals needed to include more-open markets abroad and efforts at home to help workers displaced by imports.

The Democratic response from the House was notable, however, for its basic embrace of the principle of negotiating trade deals and its openness to renewing the president's negotiating authority, which is known as fast track because of the provision allowing for one up-or-down vote.

A much tougher stance was taken by consumer, environmental and labor groups. They called on Congress to let the president's negotiating authority expire and to reject the various pending trade deals and the philosophy of free trade that led to past accords like the North American Free Trade Agreement, or Nafta, with Mexico and Canada.

"The 2006 midterm elections showed that members of Congress bear the political liability for this failed trade policy," said Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch, a group affiliated with the consumer advocate Ralph Nader. She called on Congress to respond by "permanently burying" the fast-track approach.

Put together, these statements suggested that a gap remains among liberals and within the Democratic Party in Congress foreshadowing what could be a similar disagreement among Democratic presidential candidates over the issue of trade.

Since the election in November, in which Democrats captured Congress, many lawmakers predicted that trade deals negotiated by the Bush administration would have a harder time winning approval. Several Democrats, like Sherrod Brown, now a senator from Ohio, ran on platforms promising to block trade deals.

But since arriving in January, several Democratic leaders have gone out of their way to say that they would be receptive to approving trade deals, and to giving Mr. Bush extended authority to negotiate them, provided the administration agrees to certain provisions, particularly providing help for workers hurt by cheap imports.

Many political analysts note, for instance, that the Democrats raised considerable funds for their election victory last year on Wall Street and among figures in the chip-making, computer and entertainment industries of the West Coast, all of which depend on export markets for their products.

On the other hand, Richard Trumka, secretary treasurer of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said Tuesday that the new trade figures meant that extending trade negotiating authority was "the last thing we need to do" and that the labor organization would fight "any extension" this year. His comments thus set up a possible collision between labor and the Democratic leadership in Congress.

Both Senator Max Baucus, a Montana Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Representative Charles B. Rangel, a New York Democrat who is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, have said they want to work with the Bush administration on future trade deals.

The trade statistics Tuesday came as the administration is juggling a three-part challenge in trade. The most immediate is the future of three bilateral trade deals with Peru, Colombia and Panama.

The second is overextending the president's negotiating authority, which in turn depends on a third issue, the possible conclusion of negotiations on a global trade deal in the so-called Doha round, named after the capital of Qatar, where talks began several years ago.

Whether Congress approves any trade deals will probably depend on the Bush administration's willingness to incorporate other elements into trade deals, including requirements that trading partners adhere to certain labor standards accepted by the International Labor Organization, a division of the United Nations.

Negotiations are under way now over whether the administration is willing to add labor standards and also possibly environmental standards, getting trading partners to live up to certain environmental laws in the deals involving Peru, Colombia and Panama.

Democrats say that if deals can be worked out on environmental and labor standards, and on helping workers who might lose their jobs, they could become a "template" for future deals that might win favor even in a Democratic-led Congress.

Most Democrats are expected to oppose such trade deals, but administration vote-counters are hoping that as many as 90 or 100 Democrats might support them in concert with most Republicans and help win Congressional approval.

Mr. Gutierrez said the new trade figures showed the importance of approving these deals. He said that the dozen or so countries with which the United States had negotiated bilateral trade deals since 2006 accounted for 40 percent of American exports, even though they represented only 7 percent of the world economy.

A separate deal negotiated with Central American countries, which was barely approved by Congress in 2005, led to a surge in exports, Mr. Gutierrez said. Commerce Department officials said that the new trade figures showed that exports grew faster than imports last year for the first time in a decade. The reason the deficit still grew in the last year, they said, was because exports were growing from a lower base.

Commerce officials say that American companies are selling high technology machinery, airplanes, automobile parts, precious metals, farm goods and computer chips but that these items are overwhelmed by imports of oil and inexpensive consumer goods, from shoes to clothing to automobiles.

Another argument made by the Bush administration is that the loss of American jobs is not just because of cheap imports but because technology changes have let manufacturers produce goods with fewer people.

Paulson's New Aide on China

The Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., has named Alan Holmer, a former drug industry lobbyist and trade official under President Ronald Reagan, as the department's top aide on dealing with China.

Mr. Holmer will be the lead organizer of the United States-China Strategic Economic Dialogue, a twice-a-year process started in December. The appointment yesterday follows the Feb. 2 decision to leave by Timothy D. Adams, the Treasury's under secretary for international affairs. The second meeting of the China dialogue is scheduled for May in Washington.

Mr. Holmer retired as president and chief executive of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America in January 2005.

Oil Prices, Imported Goods Push Trade Gap To Record (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The U.S. trade deficit climbed to a record high for the fifth straight year, with 2006 imports exceeding exports by $764 billion, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. The gap reflects higher oil prices, which increased the nation's import bill, and American consumers' rising appetite for foreign-made goods.

The figures raised tensions in Washington, unleashing criticism on Capitol Hill of the Bush administration's pursuit of new trade deals. They also provoked a fresh round of demands for action against China, whose trade surplus with the United States swelled to a record $233 billion last year, according to the Commerce Department.

The data also prompted some economists to cut their economic growth projections. Several private analysts said the trade figures, combined with other indicators such as the prolonged slump in the housing market, imply the economy grew at a modest annual rate of 2.2 percent in the last three months of 2006 -- well below the 3.5 percent pace estimated earlier this month by the Commerce Department in a preliminary report.

Wall Street, as it often does, took cheer from bad news. Stocks rallied yesterday as the prospect of slower growth eased concerns that the Federal Reserve might bump up interest rates to fight inflation, and revived hopes in some quarters that the Fed might cut rates soon. But slower growth could also make businesses more cautious about expanding, meaning higher unemployment for U.S. workers.

In Congress, the new Democratic leadership used the record deficit to accuse the Bush administration of selling out the interests of American workers in pursuit of trade deals. In a letter to President Bush, top Democrats, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, called the trade deficit "unsustainable," listing among its consequences "failed businesses, displaced workers, lower real wages and rising inequality."

The House leaders called on the president to submit an action plan within 90 days aimed at shrinking the deficit by removing barriers to U.S. exports and eradicating trading practices they regard as unfair.

A White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, said the letter was "not the most helpful approach." But he added that the White House would "work with Congress" in seeking approval for new trade deals.

"Trade is good for America," Fratto said. "There are dislocations for people when you trade. A factory closes, those are real people. But the benefits that accrue to all Americans are clear."

Increasing the pressure on Beijing, a bipartisan group of senators introduced legislation yesterday that would revoke China's permanent normal trade relations with the United States. That would restore the system, in place until 2001, that forced China to pass congressional review of its trade practices each year to maintain unhindered access to the American market.

The Bush administration is scrambling to stay ahead of congressional demands for action on China. Earlier this month, the administration announced that it would pursue a case against China at the World Trade Organization for allegedly subsidizing exports, a process that could eventually allow the United States to impose retaliatory tariffs.

Yesterday, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. named a former Reagan administration deputy U.S. trade representative, Alan F. Holmer, as his special envoy to China for a dialogue on economic issues he launched last year.

Paulson has been under pressure to show results in his campaign to persuade China to allow the value of its currency, the yuan, to float freely. Manufacturers and labor unions in the United States accuse China of keeping the yuan artificially low to make its goods unfairly cheap on world markets, thereby taking jobs from Americans.

China asserts that it has been made a scapegoat for the loss of U.S. manufacturing jobs. Many of China's exports are produced in factories owned by U.S. firms for shipment to American stores, said Zhang Erzhen, a trade expert at Nanjing University.

Zhang echoed contentions from Beijing that China's trade surplus with the United States would be smaller if Washington relented on national-security restrictions that bar Chinese companies from purchasing some U.S.-made high-technology goods.

Despite the gap, the trade figures confirmed a trend the Bush administration has been highlighting as it seeks congressional approval for trade pacts with Colombia, Peru and Panama: In 2006, U.S. exports grew faster than imports, slightly limiting the growth of the trade deficit.

"Our booming export numbers show the competitiveness of American workers and companies," Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said in a statement from New Delhi, where he was meeting with Indian leaders in talks aimed at boosting trade. "Our nation's prosperity is dependent on engaging and winning in international markets." Gutierrez noted that American exports to China grew by 32 percent last year compared with 2005.

The Bush administration has pointed to robust exports as it seeks to persuade Congress to renew the administration's authority to negotiate trade deals and submit them to Congress for a simple up-or-down vote without amendments. That authority, known as "fast-track," is set to expire at the end of June, leaving uncertain both the fate of pending deals and the long-stalled trade talks known as the Doha round, which are aimed at lowering tariffs around the world.

"Trade agreements mean more exports," U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said during a speech Monday at the National Press Club, as she urged Congress to extend the president's trade authority. "More exports mean better jobs."

But labor groups, lobbying against an extension of the president's trade authority, noted that imports dwarf exports so much that the recent gains are essentially a trifle.

In 2006, the United States exported $1.4 trillion of goods and services, 12.7 percent more than in 2005, according to the Commerce Department. But imports climbed 10.5 percent to $2.2 trillion, leaving the $764 billion deficit. Since 2001, the trade deficit has jumped 110 percent, from $363 billion that year.

"If President Bush deserves blank-check trade negotiating authority from Congress with this record, then Paris Hilton deserves to be Girl Scout of the Year," declared Alan Tonelson, a research fellow at the U.S. Business and Industry Council, an advocacy group that opposes the administration's trade policies.

Though a record trade deficit had been expected, an the acceleration in December caught economists by surprise, leading to the revision of growth forecasts. A bigger trade deficit means more U.S. demand for goods and services was satisfied by imports rather than by domestic firms.

"The economy is on the soft side," said Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist for Goldman Sachs. He forecasts below-average growth this year, with a rise in unemployment.

Some analysts fret that the trade deficit's continuing climb raises the possibility of a precipitous drop in the dollar. For now, China, Japan and many oil-producing countries are plowing the proceeds of their exports to the United States back into the country by buying U.S. Treasury bills, propping up the dollar and allowing the Fed to keep interest rates low. But if these nations get spooked by the size of the trade deficit and reduce their dollar purchases, the value of the U.S. currency could plunge, forcing interest rates higher and hurting the economy.

"Instead of producing products, we're just printing money," said Peter Schiff, president of Euro Pacific Capital, a brokerage firm in Darien, Conn. "We're in serious trouble."

Dow's Biggest Gain Of 2007 Ushers In Bernanke Testimony (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Stocks came storming back after a three-session pullback, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average pushing to within 20 points of a record.

Logging their biggest gain this year in both point and percentage terms, the industrials rose 102.30 points, or 0.81%, to 12654.85. The blue-chip average is up 1.5% for 2007. The last record close was 12673.68, on Feb. 1.

Explaining the advances, traders pointed to a Times of London report that Alcoa could get a takeover bid, to an analyst upgrade of General Motors and to a 3M plan to buy back shares.

Investors turned hopeful that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke will play down the chances of a Fed interest-rate increase when he testifies before the Senate Banking Committee today.

Every time stocks have pulled back in the past seven months, they have fallen less than 2% and quickly rebounded. That just happened again. New money appears to be coming in, notably from overseas, where governments, oil companies and exporters have dollars to invest.

"There is a lot of money from oil producers and from emerging economies out there. It is finding its way into our marketplace," said Doug Johnston, head of trading at Boston brokerage house Canaccord Adams.

Investors learned that the U.S. trade deficit was wider than expected in December, which ordinarily would be bad news. But it suggests that U.S. economic growth was slower than expected, putting less pressure on the Fed to raise rates.

The day's stock rises came despite a $1.25 jump in crude-oil-futures prices to $59.06 a barrel. Oil traders blamed the current winter storm, an oil-refinery fire and an International Energy Agency report forecasting higher demand.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.76%, or 10.89 points, to 1444.26, up 1.8% in 2007. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.39%, or 9.50 points, to 2459.88, leaving it up 1.8% for the year.

Investors liked seeing the Dow Jones Transportation Average and the Dow Jones Utility Average both set records yesterday -- 5011.87 on the transports and 475.10 on the utilities. Indexes of small and midsize stocks neared records. Having so many indexes at or near records suggests that the advances are broad.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.68%, or 1.67 points, to 248.83.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.6 billion shares, as 2,409 stocks rose and 922 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 3/32, or 94 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.814%. The 30-year bond was down 8/32 to yield 4.901%.

DOJ_NMG_0131951

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 121.17 yen, down from 121.94, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.3037 from $1.2964.

Big Deficit, But No Retreat (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Wall Street stocks jumped yesterday after the Commerce Department reported record trade deficits and reports circulated about a possible takeover bid for aluminum giant Alcoa.

The Dow Jones industrial average posted steady gains throughout the day, closing at 12,654.85, up 102.30, or 0.8 percent. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.8 percent, while the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index added 0.4 percent.

"It's going to take a lot to move this market down," said John F. O'Donoghue, co-head of equity trading at Cowen. "The world is basically awash in cash right now."

Alcoa shares jumped after reports that BHP Billiton and Rio Tinto were contemplating $40 billion bids, which investors took as a sign that the market was still very much in buying mode.

Chris Low, chief economist at FTN Financial, said investors were also heartened by the decision of a Merrill Lynch analyst to upgrade the firm's rating on GM to "buy" from "sell," saying the auto company is expected to make better use of its liquidity.

Some analysts said the markets were due for a rally with investors sitting on the sidelines with cash after last week's correction, when the Dow fell 0.45 percent due to concern that inflation would affect interest rates.

"This is the way good markets act; we had a good January, we were due for a pause," said Al Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards. "There was modest pullback, and yet it was enough to excite sideline cash. It indicates the market still has upside momentum."

Investors seem to be emboldened by continued growth in corporate profits, with the financial services sector reporting strong fourth-quarter earnings.

Stocks also rallied as the prospect of slower growth eased worries that the Federal Reserve might raise interest rates to fight inflation. But slow growth could lead business to invest less and unemployment rates to rise.

Low said recent data have been "going the right way," but he did not rule out the possibility of another bump in the benchmark interest rate, which stands at 5.25 percent.

"Inflation is slowing down. If he wants to, he can certainly take a more friendly tone," Low said, referring to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke. "The only reason I'm a little nervous is that there were speeches by three or four members of the Open Market Committee last week and they were very nervous about inflation."

Bernanke is scheduled to testify about the economy before Congress today and Thursday.

The Commerce Department yesterday reported that the U.S. trade deficit grew to $764 billion in 2006, fifth consecutive annual record.

Alan F. Skrainka, chief market strategist at Edward Jones, said investors should proceed cautiously, keeping in mind the cyclical nature of the markets. For seven months, he said, the Dow has not had a correction larger than 2 percent, the longest rally without such a decline in 50 years.

"I would say the bulls are in charge and focused on the blue chip sector, recognizing good value," he said. "Investors should be optimistic but at the same time recognize that a correction is possible at any time. It's been so long since we had one."

More than four stocks rose for every one that dropped on the New York Stock Exchange yesterday. Shares of energy companies were also up, helped by oil's gain of $1.25 a barrel.Movers

GM rose 2.5 percent, to $36.59.

3M gained 2.5 percent, to $76.43, on news it would buy back up to $7 billion shares.

Alcoa rose $2.10, or 6.4 percent, to $35.00.

TODAY'S AGENDA Bernanke To Lay Out His View Of Economy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131952

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke begins his two-day semiannual economic report to Congress, with financial markets braced for hawkish signals on interest rates. The economy continues to chug along despite the drag from the slower housing market, and investors are concerned that a future rate increase is still on the table. Mr. Bernanke's testimony on Capitol Hill begins at 10 a.m. EST.

Chrysler to Cut Jobs, Plant in Revamping

DaimlerChrysler is set to unveil a major restructuring plan for its loss-plagued U.S. operations, with at least one plant closure and the ax coming down on about 10,000 workers. Chrysler, which needs to cut costs and boost per-vehicle profit margins, is expected to pull back on gas-guzzling SUVs and put more emphasis on passenger cars. For CEO Zetsche, the turnaround plan could be the last chance to prove the wisdom behind the DaimlerChrysler merger. (See related article1.)

January Retail Sales May Show Slight Gain

Retail sales for January, as measured by the government, are expected to rise modestly on the month, but not as sharply as the 0.9% jump recorded in December. Interest rates, weather, gift cards and gas prices will all factor into consumer spending patterns. Most forecasts call for a gain in the range of 0.3% to 0.5%. Stripping out autos, retail sales are projected to rise in the range of 0.4% to 0.6%. Commerce Department report at 8:30 a.m. EST.

What's Up With The Slow Growth In Workers' Pay? (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies on Capitol Hill today and Thursday he will likely be peppered with questions about why wages are not rising at a more rapid pace.

But he may have to leave lawmakers guessing.

That's because economists aren't sure why wages haven't increased at a faster pace even though the labor market is tight. A tight labor market is often a precursor to a big pickup in pay as employers enter into bidding wars to attract and retain workers.

Adjusted for inflation, average hourly earnings for non-supervisory workers rose 1.7% in December from a year earlier, according to the government. While earnings rose five consecutive months through December and are rising at the fastest rate in years, economists say they aren't sure why the gains haven't been larger given the jobless rate, at 4.5% in December, is near a five-year low.

"It has been curious in this cycle why wage growth has lagged," ClearView Economics head Ken Mayland says.

Bernanke likely will be asked about the slow growth in workers' wages when he delivers his twice-yearly testimony on the economy to lawmakers. A number of Democrats, including Senate Banking Committee Chairman Chris Dodd, D-Conn., have promised to make workers' wages, particularly the divide between the haves and the have-nots, a focus of the hearings. Bernanke is scheduled to testify to the Senate today and to the House on Thursday.

Two theories why wages haven't risen faster:

•Globalization. Technological innovation and increased trade have meant jobs that used to only be able to be performed in the USA can now be done abroad. That means that for many professions, a low jobless rate in the USA may not result in higher wages if there is surplus of available workers worldwide.

"A large portion of Americans have a job, but that's not true in the rest of the world," OppenheimerFunds chief economist Jerry Webman says.

•Benefits. Big increases in the cost of benefits, particularly for health care, have given employers less money to increase wages. Benefits account for 30% of total compensation given to workers, according to the Labor Department.

Employer costs for health insurance premiums rose 7.7% in 2006, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation. Although that was the smallest gain since 1999, it was still far larger than the overall inflation rate.

Health care costs are factored into what employers view as workers' total compensation, which has risen. But that's little consolation for employees who have seen only paltry raises in recent years, Mayland says.

Questioning Bernanke about the slow wage growth and divide between rich and poor is likely barking up the wrong tree, argue some economists, including First Trust Advisors chief economist Brian Wesbury.

"Productivity, not the Fed, determines the sustainable trend for real wages," Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris said in a recent note to clients.

A Portrait Of The Economy (WSJ)

By Brian S. Wesbury

Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

It's the best of times. It's the scariest of times. Last year, U.S. exports, industrial production, real hourly compensation, corporate profits, federal tax revenues, retail sales, GDP, productivity, the number of people with jobs, the number of students in college, airline passenger traffic and the Dow Jones Industrial Average all hit record levels. For the third consecutive year, global growth was strong, continuing to lift (and hold) millions of people out of poverty. From 30,000 feet, heck from 1,000 feet, it sure looks like the best of times.

In relative terms, the first five years of the current recovery have been much better than the first five years of the 1990s recovery. But all this has not softened the pessimism of many pundits and politicians who are either unimpressed or expect the whole thing to come crashing down any minute. That is, unless the government firmly grabs the reins of the global economy and steers it clear of disaster.

Many believe that the debate is over on global warming, nationalized health care, tax hikes, rich-versus-poor, the trade deficit and "obscene" oil company profits. Forgotten in this rush to pass judgment on capitalism is the fact that the last two times government seriously tried to control the U.S. economy -- in the 1930s and in the 1970s -- they made a terrible mess of it.

In the 1930s, the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act caused a collapse in global trade, while the Fed allowed the money supply to shrink by one-third. Government regulation in the 1920s prevented banks from branching, which caused more than 10,000 to fail in the 1930s, deepening and prolonging the Great Depression. Herbert Hoover's tax hikes were icing on the cake, capping off a perfect storm of D.C. policy mistakes.

It took another 35 years, and a nice run of prosperity, but Washington finally gathered the courage to try this again. Between 1965 and 1981, Great Society welfare and health-care programs, wage and price controls, inflationary Fed policy, 70% marginal tax rates, 50% capital-gains tax rates, and highly regulated energy, airline, banking and trucking industries created severe problems. The Misery Index (calculated by adding inflation and unemployment) rose to 21.9% in 1980 (today it is 7.2%).

One of the worst mistakes of the 1970s was a National Energy Plan. On April 18, 1977, in a nationally televised speech, President Carter said, "World oil production can probably keep going up for another six or eight years. But some time in the 1980s it can't go up much more. Demand will overtake production."

President Carter's White House economists worried about "environmental damage and the risks to national security and to future economic activity posed by energy imports." To fix these problems, the Department of Energy (DOE) was created while the Congress and president pushed forward windfall profits taxes, price caps, subsidies for solar energy, tax breaks for using coal, and direct spending on synthetic fuels.

Not only did all of this fail to stop imports or the use of fossil fuels, it was also the source of economic pain. Part of the problem was faulty forecasts. Rather than peaking in the mid-1980s, the latest DOE estimates predict peak oil production no earlier than 2021, but possibly as late as 2037, 2067 or 2112, depending on assumptions.

The cost of government intervention is always underestimated in the midst of political battles, while the benefits are always overestimated. Impeding the free market alters the course of economic activity in ways that cannot fully be understood in advance. For example, tax subsidies for using existing solar technology diminish incentives for research and development, just like welfare payments undermine the willingness of many recipients to work or go to school. Why give up a sure thing for a future that is uncertain?

The U.S. is subsidizing ethanol, which pulls billions of dollars of investment capital away from other areas of the economy. When government picks what it thinks should be the winner, it saps resources from other ideas and potential advancements. In the 1960s, the U.K. picked coal and steel, while Japan picked consumer electronics, motor vehicles and exports. The U.K. was wrong. The Japanese got it right. But the odds of any government picking the right strategy, industry or technology are no greater than that of a single company or individual.

The power of a free market is that the odds of success are increased. With tens, or hundreds, of thousands of different entities researching, inventing, producing and distributing, successes not only multiply, but their profits generate resources that allow the economy to absorb the cost of mistakes and failure. It's called diversification. When one company fails, those closely involved are hurt, but not the entire economy. When government is wrong, millions suffer.

Unfortunately, the government reacts to market failure by creating more regulation. Think Sarbanes-Oxley. But the costs of this regulation are almost always greater than the benefits; and Congress tends toward denial when it comes to government failure.

One would think that the unbelievably dramatic turnaround in the economy from the malaise of the 1970s to the boom of the past 24 years would prevent the return of big government. But it appears that a growing number of American politicians, journalists and their constituents have forgotten the awful reality of the 1970s economy. Part of the problem is that people younger than 45 don't have even the slightest idea of how bad it was, or what caused it. They also have no idea that when Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan turned away from socialism in the late 1970s and early 1980s, continental Europe (Germany, France and Italy) kept going. Then while the U.S and U.K. boomed, continental Europe fell behind.

Moreover, many of the more acute economic problems supposedly facing the U.S. are evaporating quickly. My models of the federal budget forecast a $115 billion dollar deficit this year, just 0.8% of GDP, less than half the size expected by the White House, and $57 billion less than the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). Next year, I expect a deficit of $35 billion. A budget surplus in 2009 is likely.

With tax rates low, profits and incomes rising, and strong non-withheld income tax revenues (from IRA withdrawals and capital gains), forecasts of a significant slowdown in revenue growth appear too pessimistic. Many argue that the cost of fixing the Alternative Minimum Tax will reduce revenue growth, but the AMT has been "fixed" in each of the past three years and revenue growth has consistently exceeded expectations. The wild card is spending. My forecast expects $40 billion more in spending than CBO estimates this year, mostly for the Iraq war. But gridlock in Congress should help spending growth to remain in check for the next few years.

Surpluses will change the calculus on tax hikes in dramatic fashion. Any argument to repeal the Bush tax cuts will face a strong headwind. This is great news for investors and the economy. In addition, with unemployment down to 4.6%, and real GDP excluding housing up 4.3% in the past year, many industries face labor shortages. Wages are being bid higher and much like the second half of the 1990s recovery, wage growth should continue to accelerate sharply in the months and years ahead. Data show that this process has already begun.

The economy is still riding a wave of productivity growth, built on the winds of technological change. Computer chips are still getting faster, cheaper and more efficient. Software is becoming more powerful and telecommunication advances are moving at warp speed.

Free-market capitalism is not perfect. But it remains the single most efficient and powerful system for creating wealth, reducing poverty and developing less wasteful ways of organizing output and consuming resources.

With the U.S. seemingly at a political turning point, the next few years are very important. At a similar juncture in 1929, and again in 1965, the U.S. moved toward bigger government. After World War II, and again in the early 1980s, Washington chose less intrusive government. The results speak for themselves. Good times or scary times: It's our choice.

Romney Joins 2008 Presidential Race (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, February 14, 2007

Mitt Romney, a lesser-known Republican in a jam-packed presidential field, embarked on his White House bid Tuesday casting himself as a political outsider with the managerial skills necessary to fix a flawed Washington.

"We have lost faith in government," Romney said in his native state as he formally entered the 2008 race. "It is time for innovation and transformation in Washington. It is what our country needs. It is what our people deserve."

DOJ_NMG_0131955

His political resume thin — he served just one term as Massachusetts governor — Romney sought to turn that potential weakness into a strength, portraying himself as the best candidate to meet the country's challenges given his venture capitalist background and proven leadership in the public, private and volunteer sectors.

In doing so, he attempted to draw a stark distinction between his qualifications and those of his top Republican rival, four-term Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who is widely considered the GOP candidate to beat after losing to George W. Bush in 2000. The senator, for his part, is planning to formally announce his candidacy sometime next month.

"I don't believe Washington can be transformed from within by lifetime politicians," Romney said, an obvious swipe at McCain without mentioning his name. "There have been too many deals, too many favors, too many entanglements — and too little real world experience managing, guiding, leading."

"I don't believe Washington can be transformed by someone who has never tried doing such a thing before, in any setting, by someone who has never run a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world," said Romney, who added: "Talk is easy, talk is cheap. It is the doing that's hard."

Although he is not well-known nationally and hardly registers in public opinion polls, Romney is considered a serious candidate in the same tier as McCain and former two-term New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani. Both political celebrities rank at the top of most polls. All three are expected to be able to raise the millions needed for a strong bid.

Yet, all three also have taken positions that don't necessarily sit well with the GOP's conservative base that is pivotal in deciding the outcome of the Republican primaries. Romney also faces doubts among some religious conservatives because if elected, he would be the first Mormon president.

Romney, who ran as a moderate in a failed 1994 Senate campaign and his winning gubernatorial campaign eight years later, is trying to convince the party faithful that he is a solid conservative and sincere in his opposition to abortion and gay marriage, two issues critical to the GOP base.

As he tries to runs to the right of McCain and Giuliani, Romney wants to avoid being seen as a Massachusetts liberal flip-flopper, a label that led to the downfall of 2004 Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry in his race against President Bush.

Hours after announcing his candidacy, Romney addressed some 300 people who braved the snow to see the candidate at the state fairgrounds in Iowa, the first stop on a campaign tour of the early voting states that will end with a major fundraiser in Boston.

Romney's shift on some issues didn't bother at least one voter.

"I know he's changed his views, but I'm satisfied," said David Bowen, who works at an agriculture seed company in Grimes, Iowa. "He has more solid social views than anyone, including the other Republicans."

Romney, 59, was a businessman who spent years amassing a fortune by helping found a venture capitalist firm that invested in fledgling businesses and guided them to grow into healthy corporations.

In 2002, he triumphantly turned the scandal-plagued Olympic Winter Games in Salt Lake City into a success. As governor, he led Massachusetts out of fiscal woes without raising taxes and pushed through a comprehensive overhaul of the health insurance system.

He hopes his record of accomplishment across those sectors will trump any uneasiness conservatives may have about his right-flank credentials and any skepticism they may feel about his Mormon faith.

Some 24 percent in a USA Today-Gallup poll released Tuesday said they would not vote for a Mormon. Almost half in a recent Newsweek poll said the nation is not ready to elect a Mormon president.

In a coming-out of sorts, Romney announced his long-expected candidacy in Michigan, the place of his birth and upbringing as well as an important stop on the path to the GOP nomination.

Just outside of Detroit, Romney laid out his campaign themes before several hundred sign-waving supporters at the sprawling Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn. It was a site chosen for its emphasis on ingenuity that dramatically transformed the nation.

The past meeting the present, Romney spoke from a podium in front of an American Motors Corp., Rambler from yesteryear and a Ford Escape Hybrid in the airport-hangar-like museum. He invoked the memory of his late father, George, who served as governor in the 1960s and made an unsuccessful bid for president.

Romney's wife, Ann, his five grown sons, five daughters-in-law and 10 grandchildren sat off to the side of the main stage as he spoke of the need to strengthen families.

"America can't continue to lead the family of nations if we fail the families at home," he said, adding that values and morals are "under constant attack" and promoting families where a mother and a father are in each child's life.

At home, Romney called for reining in government, making it smaller and less bureaucratic with fewer regulations, and giving power and freedom back to the people, in part, in the form of lower taxes, better schools and more available health care.

On Iraq, Romney reiterated his support for Bush's policy in the nearly four-year-old war, although he did not name the president, and said that failure in Iraq "could be devastating" for the United States and could mean a future with far more military involvement and far more loss of American life.

Romney Kicks Off White House Run (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 14, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich. — Only one Republican presidential candidate has run a business, governed a state and turned an ailing Olympics into a success story. That record, Mitt Romney said Tuesday, makes him uniquely qualified to transcend Washington's "petty politics" and deliver change.

The former Massachusetts governor and venture-capital CEO, kicking off his campaign, said the country needs "innovation and transformation." He said "life-long politicians" won't make it happen.

"I do not believe Washington can be transformed … by someone who's never run a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world," Romney told supporters at the Henry Ford Museum in the state where he was born and raised.

Romney reprised his message later for about 300 people at the Iowa State Fairgrounds in Des Moines. South Carolina and New Hampshire, weather permitting, were on his itinerary today. All four states have early primaries or caucuses. The Michigan primary is tentatively set for Feb. 5.

The Michigan launch allowed Romney to focus on his Midwestern roots rather than the liberal state he governed until last month. But he said he has the same goals for the nation as he had for Massachusetts, including strong families, lower taxes and affordable, portable health care.

In foreign policy, Romney said "America must regain our standing in the world" and define its international role "not only in terms of our might, but also by our willingness to lead, to serve and to share." He said he would forge closer partnerships with other nations to support moderate Muslims and block Iran's nuclear ambitions.

On Iraq, Romney stuck with President Bush — for now. "So long as there is a reasonable prospect of success, our wisest course is to seek stability in Iraq, with additional troops to secure the civilian population," he said.

Romney, 59, is trailing former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani and Arizona Sen. John McCain in national polls. But he has fundraising clout — he raised $6.5 million in one day last month — and other strengths that political experts say make him a contender.

"We elect governors for president, not senators and mayors of cities," says Ed Sarpolus, an independent pollster based in Lansing. "Romney is very well positioned. He has a good organization. He is not divorced. And he's got a record."

Romney's challenges include his Mormon religion and changing positions on issues such as abortion, gay rights, emergency contraception and stem cell research. He has moved to the right on all of them.

He said Tuesday that "I believe in the sanctity of human life." He also said that "unelected judges" should not make laws. Gay marriage is legal in Massachusetts as a result of a state court ruling. Romney pushed for and won passage of a bill that puts gay marriage on the ballot.

Romney and his Democratic legislature enacted the country's first statewide, universal health-coverage plan. It treats health insurance like auto insurance — individuals must have policies. People with low incomes will pay less for coverage.

Walter Schmidt, 58, a Lutheran minister from Grosse Pointe Woods, called Romney "a good middle-of-the-road Republican. Traditional, but not a far-right fundamentalist. That's what I think we need." He added, "I would prefer that he wasn't Mormon," but "the family values that he reflects are more important" than his faith.

Romney's wife, Ann, his five sons and their families were onstage with him here. He talked of his Michigan childhood and his late father George's careers as an auto executive and governor.

Romney attended Harvard law and business schools. He lost a 1994 Senate race to Sen. Edward Kennedy. In 1999, he became CEO of the struggling 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City. He averted financial ruin and ran an extensive security operation for the Games shortly after 9/11.

Romney Uses Broad Strokes In Officially Declaring For President (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 14, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich. -- Seeking to capture the can-do spirit of the heartland that he was raised in, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney came to his native Michigan Tuesday to make official his bid for the presidency in a speech that touched broadly on themes of American ingenuity but offered little in the way of substance.

Along with two of his siblings, his wife, five sons and daughters-in-law and a bevy of grandchildren, the son of an automobile executive-turned-Michigan governor spoke to about 600 people crowded into the Henry Ford Museum in tones meant to evoke the optimistic vision that turned Detroit into Motown.

"This place is not just about automobiles," said Romney, standing between a new Ford Hybrid and the Nash Rambler that his father designed. "It is about innovation, innovation that transformed an industry, gave Americans a way of life our grand parents could never have dreamed possible."

Pivoting into his campaign message, the former venture capitalist declared in his 20-minute speech that "if there ever was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it is now."

Romney would return again and again to those buzzwords. He used "innovation" 10 times and "transformation" eight times. He did it in separating himself from some of his opponents (Washington "can't be transformed by a lifelong politician"), in discussing foreign policy (the United States must "transform our role in the world") and in detailing his own career ("I have pursued innovation and transformation").

But as much as his remarks were tailored to present himself as, well, an innovator and transformer, they were also part of an attempt to begin to tell a more personal story.

A handsome millionaire with three homes and an attractive family to match his material wealth, Romney must cast himself in a manner that Americans with less-idyllic circumstances can relate to.

So he told of a father who "came from humble roots," and who, in his youth, worked with his hands and "never graduated from college."

"But like many other Americans, he made his dreams come true," Romney said of his father, George, Michigan's governor from 1963 to 1969. He died in 1995.

Indeed, family was central to Romney's address. His wife, Ann, introduced him and the two called one another "sweetheart" more than once. As soon as he delivered his remarks, he quickly picked up a young grandchild in his arms.

There was no apple pie (or, this being Michigan, cherry pie) being served, but the red, white and blue signal was sent: Faith, Freedom and Family.

Romney did touch on some issues pleasing to the ears of his Republican audience ("sanctity of human life" and "unelected judges"), but largely kept to platitudes here. When he did talk about Iraq, Romney slipped from his prepared text and alluded to the "debate about our future course in Iran."

Later, before a much smaller crowd gathered in snow-covered Des Moines, the Republican talked a bit further about the war.

"Boy, we want them home," Romney said about the troops in Iraq to about 175 supporters at the Iowa state fairgrounds.

But to bring them home now, he continued, would result in a "full-out civil war" with even more American lives lost.

"I support the president's plan to stabilize the population in Iraq," he declared before crowd members rose to their feet and drowned out his affirmation of "the surge" with applause.

DOJ_NMG_0131958

The day was not without its flaws, though. The audience in Dearborn was padded with dozens of schoolchildren, and Romney's introductory music blared back on for a moment during his remarks. And in Iowa, there were rows of unfilled seats.

Still, the always-ebullient Romney was pleased. So pleased, in fact, that after he delivered his conversational speech in Des Moines and the crowd cheered and a Tom Petty tune came on, he held onto the microphone and gave a five-minute postscript reiterating his message and thanking the hearty Iowans for coming out in the snow. "Did you get here last night?"

Romney Enters Presidential Race (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, February 14, 2007

DES MOINES -- Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney formally joined the race for the Republican presidential nomination Tuesday, saying he had the innovative skills of an outsider whose conservatism would lead the nation past the "talk and dithering" that preoccupies Washington.

"If there ever was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it's now," Romney said in arriving in the nation's first caucus state after launching his candidacy earlier in the day in his native Michigan.

But as Romney attempts to cast himself as an outsider not beholden to the ways of Washington, he also finds his candidacy questioned by some on the Republican right who ask whether he has become a recent convert to conservatism on social issues such as abortion and gay rights after previously holding more moderate positions.

Romney's religious faith, Mormonism, also may prove to be an issue for some voters, according to a new survey on religion, race and gender issues.

Romney, 59, has worked to promote a resume of a successful businessman who gained entry onto the national stage by turning around a scandal and debt-ridden 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics. But he also has a Midwestern political heritage as the son of the late George Romney, the three-term governor of Michigan, a 1968 White House hopeful and former CEO of American Motors Corp.

In entering the presidential contest, Romney sought to differentiate himself from potential rivals such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who hold a much longer political pedigree than his one-term tenure as governor.

"I don't believe Washington can get transformed by someone from the inside, by someone who has been part of politics throughout their entire life, who's made all the deals," he said. "To have government change and transform, to have innovation come into government, you've got to have somebody who spent their lifetime innovating and transforming."

Though he didn't mention Democratic Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) or any other candidates by name, Romney also said voters should not be content with candidates who make broad appeals to voters' hopes.

"Our hopes and dreams are going to inspire us, because we are an optimistic people," he said. "But let me tell you, just hoping is simply crossing your fingers. What we really need are hands that will go to work. It's time for hope and action. It's time that we do as well as dream."

Citing international competition in technology, dependence upon foreign oil, disappointment in education and a failing health system, Romney said: "This is not a time for more talk and dithering in Washington. This is a time for action."

Romney expressed support for President Bush's move to increase troop strength in Iraq. He said a pullout would lead to civil war and create a danger that could lead to the need for a U.S. troop return that could cost even more lives.

Standing inside a building at the Iowa State Fairgrounds containing the campaign staples of a John Deere tractor and hay bales, Romney was greeted by a crowd of a couple of hundred supporters—including former GOP Govs. Robert Ray and Terry Branstad—on a chilly, snow-blown day that one aide likened to "caucus-type weather."

Though Iowa's caucuses won't be held until the middle of next January, organizing a political infrastructure and other campaign events held much sooner will help dictate how far Romney can go in a state that relies heavily on the virtues of retail politics rather than a well-funded blast of television advertising.

Still, Romney's business connections have helped his initial efforts. Last month, in Boston, he gathered together a group of well-heeled party and business leaders to make fundraising calls and generated $7 million, according to one supporter familiar with the recent effort.

Using a hand-held microphone in an in-the-round setting, Romney said he would be among leaders "who strive to demonstrate enduring values and morality."

But conservative critics maintain Romney's present opposition to abortion and gay rights represent a sharp about face from positions he adopted in an unsuccessful 1994 bid for the U.S. Senate against Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) and from his 2002 run to be governor of a traditionally liberal Democratic state.

Romney, himself, has acknowledged some of his views have matured and, in recently trying to grab the mantle of Ronald Reagan, his supporters have noted that Reagan was originally a Democratic union leader.

But with Republicans knowing that the conservative base plays a strong role in deciding the GOP's presidential nominee in the early caucus and primary states, even some of Romney's rivals are questioning his conservative credentials.

At a local Republican fundraiser in Springfield, Ill., on Monday, supporters of McCain passed among themselves an 11-page sheet entitled "The Real Mitt Romney" that noted Romney's previous views in support of abortion, gay rights and gun control, as well as other issues in earlier campaigns.

"Romney: A Proud Republican?" questioned one page.

"Today, candidate Romney says his political hero is Ronald Reagan, but in 1994, he said, 'I'm not trying to return to Reagan-Bush.' He admitted he was an independent during (the) Reagan Revolution and voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 presidential primary. Romney publicly opposed the Contract With America in 1994," the document says, citing news reports from the time.

But Michael Carver, a commercial real estate broker from Urbandale and a Romney supporter, said he believed the way Romney has conducted himself has made him a role model and that he was not troubled by the criticism.

"I'm a Catholic and I'm very strong pro-life," Carver said. "To me, some people have this litmus test that unless you're perfect on these issues that somehow you don't qualify. I just don't ascribe to that kind of thinking. I think it takes a lot to make a person a good candidate for president."

Still, Romney may need to discuss his Mormon faith more directly with potential voters. A new USA Today/Gallup Poll found 72 percent of voters saying they would vote for a qualified nominee who is Mormon, compared to 94 percent for a black nominee and 88 percent for a female nominee.

Invoking American Dream, Romney Begins Run (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, February 14, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich. -- Promising to build "a new American dream," Mitt Romney launched his bid to become the nation's 44th president yesterday by casting himself as an optimistic and forward-thinking Washington outsider with the experience and vision to lead the country into a new age of innovation.

Despite the bloody war in Iraq, a growing nuclear threat from Iran, and the ongoing specter of terrorism, he said, Americans should be bullish about their future. But he warned that the country would overcome its challenges only by adhering to traditional Republican values of limited government, lower taxes, military power, and strong families.

"Our hopes and dreams will inspire us, for Americans are an optimistic people," Romney said to friends, family, and supporters gathered at the Henry Ford Museum, which celebrates the automotive pioneer. "But hope alone is just crossing fingers, when what we need is industrious hands. It's time for hope and action. It's time to do, as well as to dream."

The event, which Romney's campaign said drew 800 people, was rich in symbolism and nostalgia for Romney, who grew up in the nearby suburb of Bloomfield Hills and whose father, George, was an auto executive and three-term Michigan governor. Parked behind Romney on the stage was a white 1960s-era Nash Rambler, which his father introduced as America's first economy car.

Romney's sanguinity may have been reminiscent of the man he now cites as a political hero, former president Ronald W. Reagan, but he was also channeling his father, who made a run at the presidency in 1968. Like his father, Romney, 59, used his announcement speech to call for greater personal responsibility and for reining in federal spending.

"It's time for innovation and transformation in Washington," he said. "It's what our country needs. It's what our people deserve."

Romney, who touted his business experience and stewardship of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, also offered a pointed indictment of the Beltway world, saying, "the halls of government are clogged with petty politics and stuffed with peddlers of influence."

"I don't believe Washington can be transformed from within by lifelong politicians," he said, a veiled critique of presidential rivals such as Senator John McCain of Arizona, a Republican. "I don't believe Washington can be transformed by someone . . . who's never even managed a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world."

In launching his campaign, Romney joins one of the most wide-open presidential contests in decades. His Republican challengers, aside from McCain, include former mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York City, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, and former governor Mike Huckabee of Arkansas.

Even with the soaring language, Romney, dressed in a blue suit and blue-and-white tie, at times struck an uncharacteristically subdued tone, especially in the beginning of his address. The crowd also missed some applause lines, making for some awkward pauses. ("Hi, Mommy!" a boy said loudly into a television camera at one point, causing a brief distraction.) Romney got more forceful deeper into his 20-minute speech.

Despite the penchant for stagecraft, Romney's announcement lacked the vigor of some of his past campaign appearances, including his well-choreographed day long fund-raiser a month ago in Boston that netted more than $6.5 million. But Romney aides made sure the soundtrack -- with songs by Tom Petty and John Mellencamp and patriotic anthems played by Dearborn's Divine Child High School marching band -- reflected the man-from-the- Heartland image that Romney seeks to project.

The only people who spoke before Romney were a minister, former Michigan House speaker Craig DeRoche, and Romney's wife, Ann. "Today, Michigan gets to reclaim Mitt Romney, a man ready to lead this country," DeRoche said.

To supporters in the crowd, Romney's decision to make his announcement in Michigan instead of the more liberal Massachusetts, where he has clashed with political leaders and the media over his shifts to the right on social issues, was a smart one.

"It's the best place in the world to be," said Shelley Murphy, from nearby Livonia, who worked on George Romney's political campaigns in the 1960s when her father was chairman of the state Republican party. "This represents America."

Shelley Taub, a former Michigan state representative who's known Romney's family for years, said many of the those at yesterday's announcement were not people typically active in politics.

"They're here to support Mitt. They've known Mitt their entire life," she said.

Romney offered few specific policy prescriptions in his speech, preferring to stick to broad themes. But he did warn that a premature withdrawal from Iraq would bring chaos, and he reaffirmed his support for President Bush's decision to add 21,500 troops to help secure Baghdad.

It's been clear for more than two years that Romney was preparing a run for the presidency. He created a political action committee in 2004 to help finance his early politicking around the country, and since then he's showered local GOP candidates and organizations with campaign contributions, carefully crafted his speeches and public appearances to appeal to national GOP audiences, and built deep grass-roots organizations in key primary states.

But the pageantry of a formal announcement event has become an essential part of modern presidential campaigns. Romney's friends and family seemed to revel in it, as the candidate hoisted his grandson Parker Mitt ("Parker Mitty" to the family) in the air after his remarks. Even Bob White, a longtime friend of Romney's who can see him anytime he wants, was snapping digital photographs of the former governor as he was dogged by television cameras and people seeking autographs after the announcement. A small group of supporters shook signs and chanted "We want Mitt!"

The Michigan event launched Romney's multistate announcement tour, which also took him to snowy Des Moines, where he addressed supporters in a more intimate setting at the Iowa State Fairgrounds. Perched on a small riser in front of a John Deere tractor, Romney made a similar pitch as supporters held signs with slogans such as "Farmers 4 Mitt" and "Team Romney." The Iowa crowd was smaller -- 300 people, according to the campaign -- but more boisterous than in Michigan.

"It may be cold outside, but it sure is warm here, wow," Romney said at one point in acknowledging the cheers, adding later, "This is gonna be a lot of fun."

Romney's rivals, meanwhile, sought to distract from his big day. Brownback, who is challenging Romney for the conservative primary vote, issued a press release accusing Romney's Michigan field director of circulating a misleading e-mail about Brownback's record on abortion. The staff member, Brownback's campaign said, tried to paint him as an abortion-rights supporter in the past, when he has always opposed abortion rights.

McCain's campaign trumpeted the support of three members of the Michigan House who had originally signed on to Romney's Michigan steering committee.

Romney was headed back to the Henry Ford Museum last night for a fund-raiser with more than 400 people; his campaign hoped the event would bring in between $500,000 and $1 million. Today, Romney is scheduled to make stops in South Carolina and New Hampshire before hosting a fund-raiser in Boston tomorrow night and heading to Florida on Friday.

After the Michigan kick off yesterday, Ann Romney spoke briefly to reporters about how the family would handle the campaign. She said they had been reading letters that Romney's parents wrote about their experience about four decades ago, and they would prepare the best they could.

"The opportunity's there, the door's open, and we're going to go through it," she said.

Romney Joins The 2008 Race (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

DES MOINES, Feb. 13 -- With a call for "innovation and transformation in Washington," Mitt Romney formally stepped into the Republican presidential field on Tuesday morning, portraying himself as both a political outsider and an experienced executive who would bring efficiency to the White House.

Romney, who until last month served as governor of Massachusetts, launched his campaign in Michigan, the state where he was born and where his father was governor in the 1960s. He then flew here to Iowa, where next January's caucus will be a key test of whether the former governor of a state that Republicans like to depict as synonymous with liberalism can make inroads with conservatives.

He was met by a relatively small group of supporters who battled snow to greet him at the Iowa fairgrounds. In a stump speech that he was still honing, Romney, dressed in a navy suit and a blue tie, decried a system in which politicians are "unable to actually act -- they talk and the debate goes on forever. The ball is kicked down the field, but nothing actually gets done."

In a subtle swing at Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), his major Republican rival, Romney continued: "I don't believe Washington can get transformed by someone from the inside, by someone who has been part of politics through their entire life, who's made all the deals, who's done all the arrangements that have to be done, who's had all the entanglements. I think you have to have somebody from outside."

Still, he said, this is not the time for a president who has "never run a corner store, let alone the largest enterprise in the world."

A Mormon father of five, Romney, 59, brings personal wealth, dashing looks and business credentials to a race that is relatively open. Although McCain has led the Republicans in the early stages, he has been met with skepticism by the socially conservative wing of the party, leaving room for a challenge from the right.

Romney took the stage in Michigan as supporters waved blue-and-white signs that simply said "Mitt Romney." He was joined by his children and grandchildren, buttressing his wholesome image as he jumps into the fray against two Republicans, McCain and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who both have been divorced and are viewed with some suspicion by the party's conservative base.

Romney comes to the campaign trail with an impressive pedigree and personal record: Raised in a political family in Michigan, he watched his father, George, win three terms as governor, only to stumble in the 1968 presidential race when he said he had supported the Vietnam War because he had been "brainwashed" on an official visit there three years before. Romney's mother, Lenore, later ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate.

Romney, one of four children, spent the early part of his career at Bain & Co., a management consulting firm in Boston, before co-founding Bain Capital, a private equity firm. He ran unsuccessfully against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) in 1994; years later, Olympic officials tapped Romney to restore the scandal-marred institution's good name before the 2002 Winter Games in Salt Lake City. He won the Massachusetts governorship in November 2002.

While Romney focused Tuesday on his executive experience over the past decade and a half, his political evolution during that time is proving problematic: A significant obstacle is his history as a self-described moderate Republican during his 1994 Senate campaign. On issues such as abortion and gay rights, Romney has made sizable shifts since then, exposing himself to charges of inconsistency and political opportunism.

He spoke directly about social issues in his announcement in Dearborn, held at the Henry Ford Museum to underscore his faith in American ingenuity. "I believe that the family is the foundation of America -- and that it needs to be protected and strengthened," Romney said.

"I believe in the sanctity of human life," he said. "I believe that we are overtaxed and government is overfed. I believe that homeland security begins with securing our borders. And I believe that our best days are before us, because I believe in America."

The emphasis contrasted with his words in 1994, when he at one point argued that the "gay community needs more support from the Republican Party" and presented himself as the candidate to make that happen.

After one term as Massachusetts governor, he says that he no longer favors a federal nondiscrimination law for gay men and lesbians, and that he would not support allowing them to serve in the military. He has also altered his stance on abortion, saying he would now support overturning the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, which legalized abortion nationwide.

As a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Romney also faces questions about his faith. In a Washington Post-ABC News poll in December, 35 percent of respondents said they would be less likely to vote for a candidate because he or she is a Mormon, vs. 3 percent who said they would be more likely to vote for someone of that faith. Among Republicans, Romney appeared to face an even more uphill battle: 39 percent said they would be less likely to vote for a Mormon.

With the war in Iraq proving an increasingly important fault line in the presidential race, Romney said little about his plan for ending the occupation or quelling the violence, and he left himself room to maneuver if President Bush's troop increase fails to calm the strife. "I believe that so long as there is a reasonable prospect of success, our wisest course is to seek stability in Iraq, with additional troops to secure the civilian population," Romney said in his opening address.

Can Romney Appeal To Base? (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney formally launched his presidential quest in an awkward position -- on the defensive.

To social conservatives who will play a big role determining the Republican party nominee, he is suspect for his prior stances on abortion and gay rights. Among the broader electorate overwhelmingly opposed to the Iraq war, he faces questions about his support for President Bush's handling of the conflict.

One consolation for Mr. Romney: The same challenges confront his main rivals, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

This double threat -- of a dispirited party base and, more broadly, an alienated electorate -- suggests why many Republicans approach the 2008 presidential contest with pessimism. While Democrats likewise face a costly fight to pick a nominee, their pack of candidates appears generally agreed on the main issues, including opposition to the war. And the party's voters are energized to seize the White House, after taking control of Congress in last fall's midterm elections.

"A lot can change in two years, but right now it's going to be a tough, uphill battle for any Republican," said former longtime Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad. He, along with former Republican Gov. Robert Ray, attended Mr. Romney's rally at Iowa's state fairgrounds yesterday, though they haven't endorsed anyone.

Mr. Romney nonetheless exuded optimism on his first official day as a candidate, after a campaign buildup of more than a year. He began with a morning announcement in Michigan, which holds an early presidential primary. Mr. Romney grew up in the state, and his late father, George, was governor. Then he headed here to Iowa, before returning to Michigan for a fund-raiser. Today his announcement tour continues in two states with the earliest nominating contests, South Carolina and New Hampshire, ending with a rally tomorrow back home in Boston.

The 59-year-old Mr. Romney, who recently finished one term as governor of heavily Democratic Massachusetts, cited his record there, in business and as the leader who rescued the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City after an ethics scandal. "If ever there was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it is now," he said.

Mr. Romney said the site of his announcement -- the Henry Ford Museum in Dearborn -- was chosen to illustrate American innovation. His audiences there and later in Iowa numbered several hundred, in contrast with the thousands at events for Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Despite Republicans' election defeat in November, Mr. Romney said, "We've lost faith in government, not in just one party." Like Mr. Obama at his own candidacy announcement over the weekend, Mr. Romney depicted himself as a Washington outsider poised to lead a generational movement for change, even using the same word -- transformation -- repeatedly. "I do not believe Washington can be transformed from within by lifelong politicians," he said.

For months, Mr. Romney has struggled to persuade conservatives that he opposes abortion and gay rights, despite videotaped comments to the contrary from his past campaigns in more liberal Massachusetts. Yesterday, he struck the notes that Christian conservatives listen for.

"I believe in God," said Mr. Romney, whose Mormon faith is a problem for some evangelical Christians who are uneasy with the religion because Mormons follow not only the Bible's teachings but the Book of Mormon. "I believe in the sanctity of human life," he added. Judges shouldn't make law, said Mr. Romney, who as governor went to court to fight a 2003 Massachusetts Supreme Court decision legalizing gay marriage. He emphasized family; prominent at the announcement were his wife of 37 years, Ann, five sons, their wives and 10 grandchildren.

Mr. Giuliani has a tougher challenge than Mr. Romney with social conservatives, given his past advocacy of civil unions for gay couples and abortion rights. Mr. McCain, though he has an antiabortion voting record, remains anathema to many Christian conservatives for his disparaging comments during his 2000 presidential campaign, for his opposition to a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage and for the campaign-finance limits he passed into law, which some conservative groups say infringe on political free speech.

Two other Republicans -- Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee -- offer socially conservative records, but many Republicans say neither could beat the Democrat they most fear: Mrs. Clinton.

"What I keep hearing is that the value voters must pick a candidate that can beat Hillary," says Phil Burress, a Christian conservative leader based in Ohio. While Mr. Giuliani or Sen. McCain are cited as potentially best able to prevail in a general election, he said, "the value voters will not work for or support either of those candidates. Even Romney is hanging by a thread."

On the war, Mr. Romney nodded to "our desire to bring our troops home." But he warned that the consequences of leaving now could be "all-out civil war" in Iraq and a destabilized Mideast that would drag the U.S. in deeper. Yet he also seemed to condition his support for Mr. Bush's proposed troop "surge" on signs of progress: "So long as there is a reasonable prospect of success," he said, "our wisest course is to seek stability in Iraq, with additional troops to secure the civilian population."

Claiming Outsider Status, Romney Says He'll Seek White House (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich., Feb. 13 — Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, came to a state where he has not lived for 41 years to declare his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination Tuesday, becoming the latest presidential candidate to position himself as an outsider running against Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0131964

"We are weary of the bickering and bombast; we're fatigued by the posturing and self-promotion," Mr. Romney said, standing at the Henry Ford Museum here. "For even as America faces a new generation of challenges, the halls of government are clogged with petty politics and stuffed with peddlers of influence."

"I do not believe Washington can be transformed from within by a lifelong politician," he said. "There have been too many deals, too many favors, too many entanglements and too little real world experience managing, guiding, leading."

With his 20-minute announcement here in Michigan, Mr. Romney, 59, took the latest step in his transformation from a Republican who won election as governor of Massachusetts, one of the most Democratic states in the nation, to a candidate trying to capture his party's presidential nod in a nominating process dominated by social conservatives. He has spent much of the past two years trying to move away from positions he embraced as a candidate in Massachusetts — he no longer supports abortion rights and has championed efforts to bar same-sex marriage — and now appears moving to play down his ties to the state itself.

In the contest for the Republican nomination, Mr. Romney faces two candidates who also have problems with the party's conservative wing: Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York. Several Republicans said Mr. Romney had enjoyed some success in his effort to convince voters that he is a more reliable social conservative than those two rivals, though he still faces challenges from other Republicans, including Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, both of whom claim strong conservative credentials.

"He's had a very good year," said Rich Bond, a former Republican National Committee chairman who is supporting Mr. McCain. "He clearly has gone to school on the conservative wing of the Republican Party and built impressive relationships with many of the principals there. His outreach has been phenomenal to those folks."

Rick Beltram, the Republican County chairman in Spartanburg, S.C., one of the most conservative parts of the country, said: "The party activists who have been participating have no doubt that Governor Romney is a true conservative."

Still, Republicans suggested that Mr. Romney was vulnerable to charges of political opportunism, including his evolution on issues and his choice of location for his announcement. And Mr. McCain's advisers said they would hammer Mr. Romney and try to portray him the same way Republicans portrayed the last Massachusetts politician who ran for president, John Kerry, as a flip-flopper.

"That's clearly an issue people are going after him on," said Saul Anuzis, the chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, who has not endorsed a candidate.

Notably, Mr. Romney made only passing mention to abortion and gay rights and used the kind of coded language that would be recognized by people familiar with the debate, in what appeared to be an accommodation to the larger audience a candidate faces when announcing. And he dropped a description of Americans as "God-fearing" that was included in his prepared text. "I believe family is the foundation of America — and that it needs to be protected and strengthened," he said. "I believe in the sanctity of human life."

Mr. Romney is seeking to become the first Mormon president. His speech drew a relatively small and subdued crowd, particularly in comparison with the crowd at the announcement speech by Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat, on Saturday in Springfield. Mr. Romney spoke nearly seven minutes before drawing a round of applause. He rushed through much of the speech, finishing in 20 minutes, before heading for a plane for Iowa.

One name was conspicuously missing in Mr. Romney's speech: George W. Bush. But he did draw applause when he affirmed Mr. Bush's Iraq policy — including the increase in troops — saying the alternative was chaos in the Middle East.

Mr. Romney did take what appeared to be a jab, without naming him, at Mr. Obama, who presented his candidacy as "the vehicle of your hopes and dreams."

"Our hopes and dreams will inspire us, for Americans are an optimistic people," Mr. Romney said. "But hope alone is just crossing fingers, when what we need is industrious hands. It is time for hope and action. It is time to do, as well as to dream."

Mr. Romney is hardly the first candidate to try to get to Washington by running against it. Indeed, much of his speech, with its harsh words about the culture in Washington, echoed what Mr. Obama said in Springfield on Saturday.

In this case, though, Mr. Romney argued that he had the necessary experience from years outside of government — he ran the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City — to bring "innovation and transformation" to Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0131965

Mr. Romney's decision to come to this state — a place where the Romney name remains famous because his father, George, served three terms as governor — was one notable thing about his announcement. The other was holding it at the Henry Ford Museum; Ford's history of anti-Semitism was seized on by the National Jewish Democratic Council, which criticized Mr. Romney for his choice.

Mr. Romney's press secretary, Kevin Madden, dismissed that as "absurd criticism. The venue is a museum, a center of learning and technological innovation."

Romney Officially Launches Presidential Bid (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney formally launched his bid for president Tuesday, joining a crowd of candidates in both parties denouncing Washington and the political status quo.

"It is time for innovation and transformation," the Republican hopeful said. "I do not believe Washington can be transformed from within by a lifelong politician. There have been too many deals, too many favors, too many entanglements and too little real-world experience managing, guiding, leading."

The 59-year-old venture capitalist turned politician made his announcement in Michigan, where he was born and his father served as a popular governor in the 1960s. The locale gave him some distance from both Washington and the heavily Democratic state where Romney served a single term as governor that ended last month and compiled a record that has already proved problematic in his White House bid.

Romney spoke of God, family and morality in his 20-minute speech, delivered at the Henry Ford Museum outside Detroit, but made only passing mention of abortion and gay rights, two issues on which his views have shifted in recent years toward a far more conservative stance.

"I believe the family is the foundation of America and that we must fight to protect and strengthen it," Romney said in a nod to social conservatives, who hold tremendous sway in the Republican nominating process. "I believe in the sanctity of human life."

Romney, who is vying to become the nation's first Mormon president, made no mention of his church. Nor did he mention President Bush, though he reiterated his support for the White House plan to increase U.S. forces in Iraq.

An "all-out civil war" could destabilize the Middle East and draw the U.S. even deeper into the region, resulting in "far more loss of human life," Romney said. "For these reasons, I believe that so long as there is a reasonable prospect of success, our wisest course is to seek stability in Iraq, with additional troops endeavoring to secure the civilian population."

With his wealth, good looks and an impressive business resume, including a role as savior of the bribery-tainted 2002 Winter Olympics, Romney enters the GOP race as one of three top-tier candidates. The two front-runners are generally considered to be Sen. John McCain of Arizona — who sought to step on Romney's announcement Tuesday by releasing a list of Michigan endorsements — and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. The two have also endorsed Bush's troop surge.

Romney, who fashioned a liberal-to-moderate image when he ran for office in Massachusetts, hewed closely to conservative orthodoxy in his announcement speech. Without offering specifics, he called for tough border enforcement, lower taxes and greater fiscal restraint. "We must transform our government," he said, "to become a government that is smaller and less bureaucratic, one with fewer regulations and more freedom for our people."

The props Romney chose for the event — a white Rambler on one side of him, a green Ford hybrid on the other and a DC-3 airplane overhead — were meant to illustrate the "innovation and transformation" he pledged to bring to government.

He offered a subtler message with the family tableau presented at Tuesday's announcement. Joining Romney and his wife of nearly 40 years, Ann, were the couple's five sons, five daughters-in-law and 10 grandchildren. McCain and Giuliani both have divorced and remarried, the latter more recently under messy circumstances detailed in New York's tabloid newspapers.

Romney also seemed to take a swipe at Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who entered the race Saturday on the Democratic side, offering himself as a vehicle for the hopes of Americans soured on politics as usual.

DOJ_NMG_0131966

"Hope alone is just crossing fingers, when what we need is industrious hands," Romney said. "It is time for hope and action. It is time to do, as well as dream."

After his announcement, Romney flew to Iowa, the first stop in a tour of early-voting states that was due to finish later this week with a major fundraiser in Boston.

Here Comes Newt (HILL)

The Hill, February 14, 2007

To echo the famous Negro League pitcher Satchel Paige: "Don't look back, Newt Gingrich might be gaining on you." Newt, consigned by many observers to Elizabeth Dole or Dan Quayle status in this GOP nominating process, appears to be moving up into contention, overtaking former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and battling to be the conservative alternative to either former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani or Arizona Sen. John McCain.

To grasp what's happening, don't think of states like New Hampshire or Iowa or worry whether it's too early or too late. The key to following the Republican presidential nominating process this year is to recognize its essential similarity to the tennis's U.S. Open at Forest Hills. There are quarter-finals, semi-finals, and finals.

In the quarter-finals, the center and the right each sort out the nominees to choose their candidate. On center court, Giuliani seems to be gaining a decisive lead over McCain's impoverished presidential campaign. But on the right-hand court, unnoticed by most pundits, Gingrich seems to be building a lead over Romney and a host of conservative wannabes. The ultimate winner of the Giuliani/McCain quarter-final will face the winner of the Gingrich/Romney match-up in the semi-finals.

As McCain drops in the polls — he's down to 22 percent while Rudy is up at 34 percent in the latest Fox News poll — some conservatives seem eager for a "real Republican" to challenge for the nomination. Their first choice, former Virginia Sen. George Allen, lies a-moldering in the grave and his runner-up, former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, has gone home to Tennessee.

Most observers assumed that Romney would fill the void. But he doesn't seem to have been able to do so. It may be a racist refusal to vote for a Mormon or, more charitably, Romney's flip-flop-flip from pro-life to pro-choice to pro-life, or it may have been his inconsistency on gay issues, but Mitt seems to be going the way of his father — out of contention. The Fox News poll, which recorded a surge to up to 8 percent of the GOP vote in its Dec. 5-6 tally, now has Romney dropping back to only 3 percent of the vote.

Enter Newt. Hungry for new ideas and desperate after losing Congress, Republican voters seem to be rallying to the only real genius in the race — the former Speaker. The statute of limitations seems to have expired on his personal scandals and Gingrich is striking a responsive chord among conservatives.

Fox News's Jan. 30-31 survey had Newt leaving Romney way behind and challenging McCain for second place. The former Speaker's vote share was 15 percent, giving him third place in the current standings.

Episodically, I just addressed a 450-person Lincoln Day dinner of the Lane County Republican Party in Eugene, Ore. A show of hands brought these results: Giuliani, 50 percent; Gingrich, 30 percent; McCain, 6 percent; Romney, 4 percent. A few days before, a speech to an Orlando investors group produced similar results.

But, as the slogan of the New York State Lottery goes: "You can't win if you don't play." Newt's current posture of waiting until the fall of 2007 to see how the process sorts itself out won't work. The process abhors a vacuum. If Gingrich doesn't move out to respond to the affection of the GOP base, one of the minor-leaguers — Huckabee, Brownback, Gilmore, Thompson, Hunter or Tancredo — will.

The irony of the GOP field at the moment is that while most Republicans are conservatives, the two frontrunners — Rudy and McCain — are moderates. And this isn't Nelson Rockefeller's Republican Party anymore! Gingrich is filling a real political need and if he moves out smartly and files his paperwork, takes his announcement bows, and journeys to Iowa and New Hampshire as a candidate, he might well be a contender.

Poll Shows Clinton, Giuliani Pull Ahead As Campaigns Start (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0131967

By Susan Page

USA Today, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani have widened leads over their rivals in recent weeks as they began to openly campaign for the Democratic and Republican presidential nominations, according to the USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

The survey taken Friday through Sunday — nearly a year before the first presidential primaries are held — shows Clinton with a 19-percentage-point edge over Illinois Sen. Barack Obama among Democrats and Giuliani with a 16-point margin over Arizona Sen. John McCain among Republicans.

A month earlier, Clinton had led by 11 points and Giuliani by 4.

While Clinton and Obama have faced questions about whether the nation is ready to elect the first woman or African-American as president, the poll finds that other traits seem to pose higher hurdles.

More than four in 10 say they wouldn't vote for a "generally well-qualified person" for president who was 72 years old — the age McCain will reach in August 2008. Three in 10 say they wouldn't vote for someone who had been married three times, as has Giuliani.

In contrast, just 11% rule out voting for a woman and 5% for a black.

John Weaver, McCain's top strategist, says poll findings so far before an election should be taken "with a big grain of salt" and adds that the senator's "vigorous" campaign will address any questions about his age: "He's not concerned about that, and his 95-year-old mother is not concerned about that."

Giuliani spokeswoman Katie Levinson says voters will choose a candidate "based on who is best qualified to lead the country."

In general-election matchups, Giuliani leads Obama by 9 points and Clinton by 2 points, within the survey's 3-point margin of error.

McCain ties Obama and trails Clinton by 3 percentage points.

The findings underscore the groundbreaking nature of the 2008 contest, which includes the most diverse field in terms of race, ethnicity and gender in U.S. history. McCain would be the oldest person to be elected president and Giuliani would be the first to have been married more than twice.

A half-century ago, in 1958, 54% of Americans said they wouldn't vote for a black president; now just 5% express that view. In 1960, when John Kennedy was running for president, one in five Americans said they wouldn't vote for a Catholic; now 4% say that.

"America is different than it was," says Vincent Hutchings, a University of Michigan political scientist — though he cautions polls understate resistance to black candidates. "It is more tolerant with regard to the kinds of people who are accepted as leaders … and that is being reflected in the kinds of people currently running with some credibility for the presidency."

However, hurdles remain — including for former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who formally announced his candidacy Tuesday. When his father, then Michigan governor, led the Republican presidential field in 1967, 17% said they wouldn't vote for a Mormon for president. Now, 24% do.

Hillary Clinton Leads Pack Of '08 Hopefuls, Poll Indicates (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Sen. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.) is leading the pack of presidential hopefuls as the campaign for the 2008 election begins, a new poll indicates.

The Harris Interactive poll, which was conducted online Feb. 2-8, among 3,423 adults, shows that 20% of U.S. adults would most likely vote for Ms. Clinton if they had to choose one candidate from a list of those who may run. Ten percent of those surveyed said they would vote for Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) and 8% said they would choose former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Take a look at who2 is in the running for the 2008 presidential election, who's out and who's somewhere in the middle.

DOJ_NMG_0131968

The poll indicates that for 45% of respondents, their first choice for president would be a Democratic candidate, while 31% would choose a Republican candidate.

When asked to pick from a list of leaders they would consider for president, 45% said they would consider voting for Hillary Clinton, while 37% said they would consider Mr. Obama, 32% said they would consider Colin Powell and 29% said they would consider Mr. Giuliani.

Forty-one percent of Republicans polled indicated they would consider a Democratic leader for president, while 35% of Democrats said they would consider a Republican candidate.

Giuliani's Iraq Views May Provide Cover (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

In every speech he makes, Rudolph W. Giuliani talks about Iraq and makes clear that he sides with President Bush, endorsing the war and the deployment of 21,500 more troops.

His chief rivals for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, take the same stances. But in discussing the deployment of more troops, Mr. Giuliani has been alone in saying that such a strategy may not succeed, potentially providing him cover should the situation in Iraq deteriorate further. And he has put the strategy in a broader context that plays down the importance of Iraq.

Terrorists "are going to continue to be at war with us, no matter what the outcome in Iraq," Mr. Giuliani said recently in New Hampshire. The night before, he said that "there are no sure things," and that if the United States fails in Iraq, "we have to be ready for that, too." In California a few days later, speaking of "the danger of focusing on Iraq too much," he said that complete success there would not win the fight against terrorism, and that failure there would not lose it.

Most Republicans still back the president's strategy, but over all, polls show, most Americans oppose the war and the troop increase. Political analysts say Mr. Giuliani and his rivals need to perform a difficult balancing act: avoid alienating pro-war voters to win the Republican nomination, then avoid alienating antiwar voters to win the presidency in a general election, and avoid taking the blame if the war continues to go badly.

"Giuliani may be in the best position of any of the Republican primary candidates on this because he uses very strong language in support of the war and its goals, but he doesn't have to take simple up-or-down votes, like McCain does," said Dan Schnur, a Republican political consultant who worked for Mr. McCain in 2000 but said he expected to sit out 2008. "He can voice the same ambivalence the voters feel."

Polls suggest that Mr. Giuliani, far more than Mr. Romney, has credibility on terrorism and national security questions, and he and his aides see it as a central part of his appeal. When he speaks of possible setbacks in Iraq and a long fight against terrorists, analysts say, Mr. Giuliani enhances that image, sounding tough but realistic.

"I think it's an effective pitch," said Charles R. Black Jr., a Republican consultant who is not involved in the 2008 campaign. "The idea that the war on terror will go on for a generation plays to his strength."

During a swing through California last weekend, Mr. Giuliani compared Mr. Bush's plight with the war in Iraq to Lincoln's during the Civil War, noting how Lincoln persisted despite setbacks.

"He had the ability to look forward," Mr. Giuliani said of Lincoln. "He had the ability that a leader has, a leader like George Bush, a leader like Ronald Reagan, to look into the future."

"This war on terror is more like the cold war than it is like the Second World War," in that it's a long slog with setbacks rather than a climactic confrontation, he said. "Part of this war is military, but there's a much bigger part of this war that's about ideas."

Mr. McCain has likewise been an outspoken supporter of the war and an early advocate of sending more troops. And though he has criticized the conduct of the war, he is more closely identified with the Bush troop deployment plan than Mr. Giuliani. And that, too, may be to the former New York mayor's advantage, analysts say.

"People think Bush is driving over the cliff, and they're starting to believe McCain is in that car, that he'll agree with whatever Bush does, and that hurts him," said Dick Bennett, president of the nonpartisan polling firm American Research Group. "Giuliani gives the impression that he sees the cliff, he knows what's going on, so he can take the president's side and maybe not be hurt by it."

In the past, Mr. Giuliani has often injected notes of pessimism into his comments on security, or warned of a protracted struggle. Campaigning for Republicans around the country last year, he often said that it was inevitable that the United States would be attacked again, and that the nation had no choice but to be at war with terrorists for many years.

But for Mr. Giuliani to admit that Iraq might not work out — even as the president continues to insist that it will — is new. Mr. Giuliani leaves the impression that he would be prepared to try a new approach, whatever that might be.

Several Republicans who have run campaigns say that for now, at least, they see no opening for an antiwar Republican to win presidential primaries, even with the pro-war vote split among the current three main candidates for the nomination. So it would be hard for any of the presumed front-runners to make a serious turn away from the commitment to Iraq.

But analysts say it could be easier for Mr. Giuliani than for Mr. McCain, who has voiced such certainty about the need to continue there, or Mr. Romney, who has already been accused of changing his positions on issues for political convenience.

Even so, all the wiggle room in the world might not help if the war takes a further turn for the worse.

"If Iraq goes badly," Mr. Black said, "that's going to be bad for any Republican."

Giuliani Stumps In Central Valley (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

TULARE, CALIF. — Farmers from around the nation gathered on acres of dusty flats in this Central Valley town on Tuesday to ponder displays of shiny new tractors, plows and dairy machines.

For a trade-show crowd accustomed to swapping ideas on crops and livestock, the topic of Rudolph W. Giuliani's breakfast speech was a sober diversion: terrorism.

"This desire of these terrorists to come here and kill us is going to continue, and we've got to focus on how we're going to protect ourselves," the former New York City mayor told several hundred farmers from a makeshift stage in a giant shed.

So it goes in the nascent presidential campaign of the Republican whose fading political career sprang back to life in the aftermath of the terrorist strikes of Sept. 11. In five days of campaigning in California, Giuliani has made terrorism his paramount focus — that and his story of a New York turnaround on his watch at City Hall.

At stops in Sacramento, Santa Clara, Fresno and Tulare, Giuliani also outlined a business-friendly agenda for the country, though he was light on details.

But what drew crowds of autograph seekers was the man who led New York through Sept. 11, and for Giuliani, every campaign venue was suitable for invoking memories of the attacks.

"Most of the first hour was just reacting quickly," he recalled Monday in a speech to Silicon Valley business leaders. "When you get attacked like that," he told the farmers at the World Ag Expo on Tuesday, "there's a period of time when you feel really isolated."

He has also shared his recollections of the twin towers attacks in paid speeches around the world, and plans do so again today at a private event in San Diego. (A spokeswoman declined to say who would pay him or how much.) But now those stories are central to his core campaign theme: America, he says, must stay on offense against terrorists.

"For a long part of my life, my job was law enforcement, so I've known about terrorism for quite some time," the former federal prosecutor told farmers.

In Santa Clara, he opened his speech by imitating Marlon Brando's gravelly voice in "The Godfather," an old Giuliani gag that now serves to remind voters that he prosecuted mobsters in the 1980s.

His California tour has erased any doubt that Giuliani would seek his party's 2008 White House nomination. "Yes, I am running," he said Tuesday.

But while testing themes, he has stuck to tightly controlled events that minimize his exposure to tough questions on the Iraq war, domestic policy or the private business deals and speeches that have made him wealthy.

DOJ_NMG_0131970

A supporter of President Bush's troop buildup, Giuliani has framed Iraq as a battle in the war on terrorism without addressing questions on its original rationale. "If we succeed in Iraq, or if we fail in Iraq, the terrorists are still going to be at war with us, and we have to keep reminding ourselves this is much broader than Iraq," he told the crowd in Santa Clara. "It's also Iran and Syria and getting Afghanistan right."

Beyond terrorism, Giuliani has tried to spotlight his pro-business leanings. In Sacramento, he told a Jewish Republican group that he would "preserve the essence" of the nation's healthcare system but cut malpractice judgments and give consumers incentives to buy insurance. "We can't move toward socialized medicine," he said.

At the Tulare farm show, the Brooklyn native conceded he was "not a big expert on agriculture policy," but added: "I will be by the time we finish this campaign. And I promise you I will be if I'm president of the United States."

In Santa Clara, Giuliani said the country must "do something" about global warming. But he showed little inclination to break with Bush or his Republican congressional allies, who have resisted new pollution restraints on industry. Asked about California's landmark law mandating carbon emission cuts to combat global warming, Giuliani said he was unfamiliar with it. He called for more nuclear power, expanded ethanol production and cleaner coal mining.

"There is a special interest to stop every one of those new technologies — either special conflicting economic interest, or a special interest that has exaggerated things beyond proportion, like the fear of nuclear power," he said. "We've had nuclear power in this country for a long time. We've never had a fatality."

Campaigning a few hours later at a Mimi's Cafe in Fresno, Giuliani declined to say whether the U.S. should tighten automotive mileage standards. He also acknowledged, in response to a question, that his consulting and law clients included power companies that would benefit from the steps he advocated.

But he said that his views on energy were largely driven by the idea that "America needs to exploit and develop a lot more energy, and you have to get to be energy independent."

For the most part, Giuliani has limited himself to questions from friendly interviewers — such as Sean Hannity of Fox News last week — or local TV reporters. "What's the neatest thing you've seen so far?" he was asked at the World Ag Expo.

"Well, the milk machines were real neat," Giuliani replied from a podium adorned with crates of lemons and oranges.

Giuliani also displayed some of the expertise gained in decades of sparring with New York's media. He used a question on his support for gun control — a potential obstacle to the Republican nomination — to hail the drop in crime during his mayoralty, due in part, he said, to weapons seizures.

"It's very, very hard to even think about this — calculate the number of lives saved, the number of people alive that wouldn't have been alive if New York City had continued the level of murder when I came into office," he said.

Giuliani also has faced questions on illegal immigrants. He favors putting them on a path to citizenship as long as they learn English and wait their turn behind lawful immigrants — another stand that puts him at odds with many of the conservatives who dominate Republican primaries. But each time the topic arose, Giuliani returned the focus to terrorism.

"We have to know who's in the country," he said as news crews followed him through the dinner crowd at the Fresno restaurant. "We have to be able to identify them. It's always been important, but it became a lot more important after Sept. 11, so that we don't allow terrorists, drug dealers and others to victimize us."

By and large, crowds responded favorably. After listening to him in Tulare, Rita Goping, 66, a Republican dairy farmer from Sheboygan, Wis., said she was "glad he's for keeping the war going."

"That's the only way you're going to fight them," she said. "If we leave, it will just make the terrorists believe we're cowards."

In 1993 Memo, Giuliani Staff Gave Harsh Assessment Of Flaws (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

Sometimes in politics, the most damaging accusations come from your own staff.

Rudolph W. Giuliani learned that lesson again yesterday when a "vulnerability study," including warnings about his "weirdness factor" and other perceived liabilities, surfaced from his second campaign for New York mayor, 14 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0131971

Last month, the New York Daily News obtained a secret blueprint for Giuliani's expected Republican presidential bid that detailed concerns such as his liberal views on social issues and his messy divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover.

The 1993 report by two aides in Giuliani's mayoral campaign was obtained by Village Voice reporter Wayne Barrett for a book on Giuliani and was posted on the Smoking Gun Web site. Giuliani went on to defeat incumbent David N. Dinkins (D) in a rematch that year and won a second term four years later.

Tony Carbonetti, a senior political adviser to Giuliani, said last night that the report was not "relevant" because of the former mayor's record of reducing crime and welfare rolls. "He made New York City not only governable but livable once again," Carbonetti said. "I have no concern over a pre-campaign strategy book because Rudy's going to be judged on his record."

The "weirdness" question involved Giuliani's first marriage, to his second cousin. He had his 14-year union with Regina Peruggi annulled on grounds that the Roman Catholic Church had never properly approved the marriage. The 1993 memo said that Giuliani had given a "wide array of conflicting answers" about his personal life, bringing "the soundness of his judgment" into question, but that any attempt to question the marriage or his fidelity "should be deflected as a shameless act of negative campaigning."

In an echo of Giuliani's current quandary -- that his support for abortion and gay rights may alienate many conservative voters -- the 1993 memo declared: "He doesn't really fit in with the Republicans. Too liberal." Giuliani's aides were also concerned that, as a former Democrat, he would be painted as a flip-flopper, and that his tenure as an official in Ronald Reagan's Justice Department was an albatross for a liberal city. "There is not a minute to waste in inoculating against the Reagan Republican moniker," the memo said, adding that the candidate should emphasize his "independence from traditional national Republican policies."

Giuliani was deemed "vulnerable to charges of insensitivity toward racial minorities," the memo said, in urging him to soften his image. "Rudy Giuliani can -- and should -- be redefined for all voters, but especially minority voters." Giuliani had strained relations with black leaders and communities during his two terms as mayor.

Although some opponents painted him as "antigay," the report said, "gay marriage really is the only issue where Giuliani opposes the gay agenda."

While a supporter of abortion rights, Giuliani had stumbled badly on the issue in his 1989 mayoral campaign, sounding like "just another pro-life male politician trying to explain how he wasn't anti-woman," the memo said. The advisers said Giuliani could "win over undecided pro-choice activists" by being more "succinct" about his support for the procedure and for public financing of abortions.

The memo also reported the "charge" that "Giuliani received special treatment from a friendly federal judge to avoid military service during the Vietnam War," and later "hypocritically prosecuted draft dodgers." Giuliani, who was dropped by an Air Force ROTC program because of a hearing problem, received a rare occupational deferment in 1969 after a federal judge wrote a letter about the importance of his duties as a law clerk.

Edwards Blogger Quits (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

RALEIGH, N.C., Feb. 13 (AP) — A second blogger working for the Democratic presidential campaign of former Senator John Edwards quit Tuesday under pressure from conservative critics.

The blogger, Melissa McEwan, wrote on her personal blog, Shakespeare's Sister, that she had made the decision to quit "with the campaign's reluctant support, because my remaining the focus of sustained ideological attacks was inevitably making me a liability to the campaign." On Monday, another blogger, Amanda Marcotte, left the Edwards staff, also after being accused of religious bigotry for earlier writings.

Senators Eye No. 2 Spot (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, February 14, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131972

While the national spotlight focuses on the handful of Senators actively considering presidential bids in 2008, another high-powered job may be attracting an even greater share of Senators' interest — the vice presidency.

Talk of the No. 2 White House slot may be on the public's back burner, but Senators and political operatives alike concede that the vice presidential nomination is prominent on many Members' minds. And as the Senate increasingly becomes a launching pad for executive branch campaigns, more and more Senators inevitably view themselves as viable running mates to their party's ultimate presidential nominees.

"My guess is every Senator looks in the mirror each morning and sees a president or a vice president," quipped Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.).

"I know this: Somebody has got to stay in the Senate," added Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.). "I may be one of three Senators left. We can't all be running for president or vice president."

At least seven Senators are weighing or are engaged in a 2008 presidential run. On the Democratic side, Sens. Joseph Biden (Del.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) are all in the hunt. Republican Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.), John McCain (Ariz.) and possibly Chuck Hagel (Neb.) are mounting bids.

Any of those Senators also could be a vice presidential pick if unsuccessful in their respective campaigns to sit atop the 2008 ticket. But beyond that group, a handful of other Senate Democrats and Republicans could be attractive No. 2 picks for their party's presidential candidates.

"There's definitely a bench, a very worthy bench," said a Senate Democratic political operative.

Democrats and Republicans alike predicted that the 2008 presidential nominees are more likely than ever to pluck their running mates from the Senate. Not only are there at least seven would-be presidents to choose from, Senators also have a unique understanding of U.S. foreign policy at a time when the Iraq War continues to be the top electoral issue.

"Senators have vast experience on a variety of war-related issues," Graham noted.

"Congress is a natural place that you look," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.). "The bench is pretty wide."

The Senate has long served as a breeding ground for vice presidential hopefuls, given Senators already enjoy national profiles, have been tested under political fire, have a grasp of the weighty issues facing the presidency and can help raise large sums money.

Senators' cache may be even greater if the presidential nominee is a governor or other elected official looking for a ticket that balances experience, political ideology, geography and electoral college votes, gender or religion.

Still, an all-Senator presidential ticket isn't unheard of, either. In 2004, Democratic nominee John Kerry, the junior Senator from Massachusetts, teamed up with then-Sen. John Edwards (N.C.) in their failed bid to unseat President Bush. And the Democratic Senate operative suggested that with the new political emphasis on national security matters, Senators may have a bigger draw than ever.

"The idea that Senators can't be president doesn't exist anymore," the source said. "As a result, the two-Senator ticket isn't a liability it used to be."

Others aren't so sure the country is ready to elevate a pair of Senators to the White House, even with national security atop voters' priorities. A senior GOP Senate aide said the odds are more than long that a Senator as the presidential nominee would follow Kerry's 2004 lead and tap a colleague in 2008.

"It's not going to happen," the Republican staffer said. "It's hard enough for one Senator" to get on the ticket.

Still, a GOP political operative agreed that with the number of Senators running for president in 2008, it is inevitable that the Senate will serve as a primary pool for the vice presidency. This Republican insider noted that of the Senators running for the top slot "not everyone can win and those who don't get the brass ring fall into the tier of making good vice presidential candidates."

And whether it's one of the current cast of seven, or another Senator, the operative said one thing is clear: "You've got to find someone who is going to be comfortable protecting the candidate and can serve as an articulate spokesman for the campaign, and someone who doesn't mind going to Syracuse rather than New York."

Beyond the obvious selections of Clinton, Obama, Dodd and Biden, the names of several other Democratic Senators have surfaced for the 2008 vice presidential contest.

DOJ_NMG_0131973

Among them are: Sens. Evan Bayh (Ind.), the affable Midwesterner who himself was briefly a 2008 presidential candidate; Dianne Feinstein, the experienced, steady Democrat from the electoral-rich state of California; Dick Durbin, the No. 2 Senate leader and strong party loyalist; Jack Reed (R.I.), a West Point graduate and point man for the Democrats on military matters; Jim Webb (Va.), the freshman Democratic rising star whose national security credentials are difficult to match; Ken Salazar (Colo.), a Westerner with a law enforcement background as state attorney general; and Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), a well-versed and well-liked Southerner.

Senate Republicans have picks on their side as well, beginning unsurprisingly with presidential hopefuls Brownback, Hagel and McCain, who is viewed by many as the frontrunner for the Republican nomination and certainly would be considered a leading No. 2 pick.

Beyond that trio, other GOP Senators likely to get strong consideration include Sens. John Thune (S.D.), the telegenic first-term Senator who knocked off then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) in 2004; Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), the conservative Republican Policy Committee chairwoman who has hinted at a possible interest in the job; Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), a one-time presidential hopeful himself; Judd Gregg (N.H.), the wonky Easterner who has become one of his party's most loyal attack dogs; and David Vitter, the conservative Louisianan whose work on behalf of Hurricane Katrina recovery could play heavily in his favor.

Lincoln shrugged off suggestions that she would be on any 2008 short lists, but acknowledged the Senate is an obvious place to look for either party's vice presidential nominee. "There are tremendous resources up here — there are a lot of folks who feel passionately about this country and the issues America faces and our place in the global community," Lincoln said.

Alexander, who ran unsuccessfully for president in 1996, said "the chances are pretty good" that the next round of vice presidential picks will come from the Senate, given the country's recent penchant for selecting governors as their presidential nominee. But Alexander said the type of Senator chosen would depend entirely on who gets top billing on the ticket — and what the ultimate presidential hopeful needs to shore up general-election appeal.

All those variables aside, Alexander insisted that one thing is certain: "Whoever runs for it almost certainly won't get it."

A New Hampshire Ghost (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

A specter was haunting Hillary Clinton as she campaigned in New Hampshire this weekend: the specter of Ed Muskie.

As the ancient or merely studious among us will recall, the Democratic senator from Maine, who'd been Hubert Humphrey's running mate in 1968, entered his party's presidential contest in 1972 as the front-runner. His prospects were dashed in the New Hampshire snows, however. As popular memory has it, an indignant Muskie started crying while refuting a silly attack on him (though whether he was genuinely upset or merely sniffling during a frigid outdoor news conference was never authoritatively resolved). Muskie's more serious problem, however, was the Vietnam War, which he opposed.

His opposition, though, had none of the fervor or long-term consistency of another Democratic senator and presidential aspirant, George McGovern. By 1972, seven years had elapsed since the United States had sent ground forces to Vietnam, and Richard Nixon, through his invasion of Cambodia and stepped-up bombing campaigns, had made clear that the road to de-escalation would entail periodic escalations, at least as long as he was president. The Democratic base was in no mood for temporizing on Vietnam.

Party voters wanted out, and they wanted a nominee who'd been right on the war (almost) from the start: McGovern. Sic transit gloria Muskie.

Today, Hillary Clinton seems almost uncannily positioned to become the Ed Muskie of 2008. She opposes the U.S. military presence in Iraq but not with the specificity, fervor or bona fides of her leading Democratic rivals. As Muskie did with Vietnam, she supported the legislation enabling the U.S. invasion of Iraq, and she has been slower and more inconstant than her party rivals in coming around to opposing the continued U.S. occupation.

Entering the race, Clinton has institutional advantages that Muskie could scarcely have dreamed of -- an unparalleled network of financial and political supporters, a universal level of public recognition. But, like Muskie, she is out of sync with her party's -- to some extent, her country's -- voters on the major issue of the day. In a Gallup Poll released Monday, the public favored, by 63 percent to 35 percent, Congress setting a timetable for withdrawing all U.S. forces from Iraq by the end of next year. The public's position is thus aligned more closely with those of Barack Obama and John Edwards than with that of Clinton, who has yet to commit to a timetable for withdrawal.

Indeed, so strong is support for a withdrawal that Edwards and Obama would by no means face the general election wipeout that was McGovern's fate. (Besides, Nixon ran against the antiwar movement and the fomenters of social tumult. Today, while opposition to the war is widespread, there isn't really an antiwar movement -- not one resembling what emerged in the '60s, anyway -- for hawks or Republicans to run against.) And should Americans still be fighting and dying in Iraq when the next election rolls around, the Democrats probably could win with Dennis Kucinich as their nominee.

I can understand some of the political calculations behind Clinton's reticence on the war -- chiefly, that a female candidate must seem as ready to use force as her male counterparts. That leaves the whole Democratic presidential pack, however, freer to lash out at the bloody absurdity of President Bush's war than she. And it leaves Clinton locked into a reckless cautiousness at a time when the electorate is looking for a decisive change.

What Clinton and her strategists would do well to remember is that it was Nixon -- by his escalations of the war even as he was withdrawing U.S. ground forces -- who was chiefly responsible for driving Democrats toward the candidate who most clearly repudiated the war. And that Nixon was a model of dovish flexibility in Vietnam compared to Bush's unyielding determination to keep U.S. soldiers in Iraq long past the point where anyone can articulate their mission. Bush will drive the nation toward the Democrats, and the Democrats toward their most credible champions of ending the U.S. occupation. Hillary Clinton is not high on that list, and that, as Ed Muskie could attest, is the chief obstacle to her winning her party's presidential nod.

Obama, Legally Blonde? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

IOWA FALLS

Barack Obama looked as if he needed a smoke and he needed it bad.

Everyone knows you're not supposed to make two big changes at once. But Michelle Obama's price for letting her husband run was that he quit.

So there he was, trying to meet the deep, inexhaustible needs of both Iowa activists and the global press behemoth on his first swing across the state, while giving up cigarettes.

He was a tad testy. Traipsing around desolate stretches of snowy — and extremely white — Iowa to go into living rooms and high school gyms and take questions like "Are you willing to stand up for independent family farmers?" makes me want to sneak out for a drag, too, and I don't even smoke.

"I've been chewing Nicorette all day long," he told reporters at a press conference in Ames on Sunday, where he was getting irritated at suggestions that he lacked substance and at the specter of his vanishing privacy. And, oh yes, at the accusation by the Australian prime minister (sounding two sheep short of a paddock) that Mr. Obama's deadline to get out of Iraq made him Al Qaeda's dream candidate.

The Illinois senator didn't have on an implacable mask of amiability, as Hillary did in Iowa. He didn't look happily in his element, like Bill Clinton. But he certainly didn't look as if he was straining to survive the Q .& A.'s, as W. did in the beginning.

Beyond his smooth-jazz façade, the reassuring baritone and that ensorcelling smile, the 45-year-old had moments of looking conflicted.

In the lobby of the AmericInn in Iowa Falls on Saturday night, he seemed a bit dazed by his baptism into the big-time. He was left munching trail mix all day while, he said, "the press got fed before me."

Everything was a revelation for him: The advance team acronym RON, for Rest Overnight. Women squealing. "I saw a hat," he noted with a grin, "that said, 'Obama, clean and articulate.' "

Senator Obama's body language was loose — and he's so slender his wedding band looked as if it was slipping off — but there was a wariness in his dark eyes.

DOJ_NMG_0131975

He is backed up by a strong, smart wife and a professional campaign team, but he doesn't have a do-whatever-it-takes family firm with contract killers and debt collectors, like Bush Inc. and Clinton Inc.

He was eloquent, if not as inspiring as his advance billing had prepared audiences to expect. He made his first Swift-boat-able slip when he had to apologize for talking about soldiers' lives "wasted" in Iraq. He sounded self-consciously pristine at times, as if he was too refined for the muck of politics. That's not how you beat anybody but Alan Keyes.

After talking to high school journalists, he took a sniffy shot at the loutish reporters who were merely whispering where's the beef: "Take some notes, guys, that's how it's done."

No fewer than three times last week, Mr. Obama got indignant about the beach-babe attention given to a shot of him in the Hawaiian surf.

Using the dreaded third person that some candidates slip into, he told the press that one of their favorite narratives boiled down to "Obama has pretty good style, he can deliver a pretty good speech, but he seems to prioritize rhetoric over substance." After an ode to his own specificity, he tut-tutted, "You've been reporting on how I look in a swimsuit."

He poses for the cover of Men's Vogue and then gets huffy when people don't treat him as Hannah Arendt.

For some of us, it's hard to fathom being upset at getting accused of looking great in a bathing suit. But his friends say it played into this Harvard grad's fear of being seen as "a dumb blond." He has been known to privately mock "pretty boys" (read John Edwards, the Breck Girl of 2004).

He doesn't lack confidence, but he's so hung up on being seen as thoughtful that he sometimes comes across as too emotionally detached and cerebral with crowds yearning for an electric, visceral connection. J.F.K. mixed cool with fire.

For a man who couldn't wait to inject himself into the national arena, and who has spent so much time writing books about himself, the senator is oddly put off by press inquisitiveness.

When The Times's Jeff Zeleny asked him on his plane whether he'd had a heater in his podium during his announcement speech in subzero Springfield, Mr. Obama hesitated. He shot Jeff a look that said, "Are you from People magazine?" before conceding that, unlike Abe Lincoln, he'd had a heater.

Take some notes, senator, that's how it's done.

Van Hollen Targeting N.J. Seats, But State GOP Officials Unafraid (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 14, 2007

Even though Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), is targeting Republican-held seats in New Jersey, state GOP consultants say if Democrats couldn't capitalize on their own party's electoral successes last year, then those seats aren't attainable in 2008.

Van Hollen, in an interview with The Hill, said that in addition to seats in Michigan and Connecticut, seats in blue New Jersey present "some opportunities" for pick-ups, though he didn't specify which seats the committee is targeting.

Perhaps the most vulnerable of those seats is Rep. Mike Ferguson (R), who narrowly defeated state Assemblywoman Linda Stender (D), winning by just more than 1 percent in the wake of press reports alleging inappropriate conduct with a female college student at a Georgetown bar in 2004.

Ferguson, who denied the allegations, did not comment for this article.

Stender told The Hill this week she is "looking seriously" at going up against Ferguson again in 2008, and she will make a decision by "late summer, early fall."

Stender said she has spoken with Van Hollen and former DCCC Chairman Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) about the possibility of another showdown with Ferguson.

"I am talking to them, and obviously they are interested in a rematch because the district now looks winnable," Stender said.

But Ed Traz, a GOP consulting heavyweight in the Garden State, said taking on Ferguson in 2008 would be a "waste" of the DCCC's money in light of the large number of resources the committee will need to devote to defending freshman incumbents in Republican districts.

DOJ_NMG_0131976

"[For] Mike Ferguson, the time to get him was this past cycle," Traz said. "You're not going to catch him. I can't see it ever being worse than it was in Jersey [last] year."

Another high-level consultant familiar with New Jersey politics said that the additional two years Ferguson will be able to put between himself and the Georgetown incident will allow him time to regroup with voters who soured on him.

"2006 put a scare in him, I think," the consultant said.

But Stender said she would begin another bid stronger than she was in 2006, having boosted her name recognition in the close race. Hopefully, she said, this would enable her to nullify some of Ferguson's fundraising advantages.

Summit Mayor Jordan Glatt has also been mentioned as a possible challenger. Glatt did not return phone calls to his office by press time.

Rep. Frank LoBiondo (R) is another possible target, but only if Assemblyman Jefferson Van Drew (D) can be persuaded to make a run, according to reports.

LoBiondo was never in danger in 2006, beating Democrat Viola Thomas-Hughes with 62 percent of the vote.

The only thing that might change that is the entrance of Van Drew, whom Traz regards as too "pragmatic" a politician to challenge the powerful LoBiondo this cycle.

"The only way Frank LoBiondo leaves Congress is when he decides he doesn't want to do it anymore," Traz said.

Van Drew did not return calls to his cell phone.

LoBiondo said he was "surprised" to see reports saying the DCCC is targeting him, given his margin of victory and the fact that he finished the race with about $1.3 million cash on hand in an environment hostile to Republicans across the country.

"Those numbers aren't too shabby," he said. "I'm not sure what they're looking at.

"I'm not sure of a lot of things, but one of the things that I am sure of is I will not be caught asleep at the switch."

In the state's 5th district, Republican Rep. Scott Garrett should, by all traditional measures, be in significant trouble heading into 2008.

Garrett won last year with 55 percent of the vote, and a consultant familiar with the district said he has continued to be successful largely because of historically Republican Bergen County, part of which Garrett represents.

The problem, or problems, for Garrett lie in a county GOP that was once consolidated and strong, but in recent years has fallen into near-total disarray — the Rothenberg Report recently noted the party's county headquarters was padlocked earlier this year because of failure to pay rent.

The phones at the county headquarters are apparently disconnected; repeated calls to the number listed on its website were met with an operator's message.

That "collapse," as the consultant put it, could lead to a primary challenge for Garrett, opening the door to an early-funded Democrat riding the strength of a county Democratic Party that has grown in influence.

Welfare State Stasis (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, February 13, 2007

Spend a moment studying the adjacent table. It illuminates why another of our annual budget battles -- begun last week, when President Bush submitted his fiscal 2008 proposal -- seems so fruitless and (yes) repetitious. Every year we hear complaints about accounting gimmicks and unrealistic assumptions. There's a ferocious crossfire of charges and countercharges. Hardly anything ever gets resolved. Budgets almost always remain in deficit (41 out of 47 years since 1960).

The table shows the rise of the American welfare state. In 1956, defense dominated the budget; the Cold War buildup was in full swing. The welfare state, which is what "payments to individuals" signifies, was modest. Now everything is reversed. Despite the war in Iraq, defense spending is only a fifth of the budget; so-called entitlement payments to individuals are almost 60 percent -- and rising. In fiscal 2006, the federal government spent almost $2.7 trillion. Social Security ($544 billion), Medicare ($374 billion) and Medicaid ($181 billion) dominated. There was $199 billion more for payments to the poor, including the earned-income tax credit and food stamps.

Almost no one wants to slash these programs. They have huge constituencies; they're popular. Paradoxically, their invulnerability and size also protect much of the rest of the budget. Look again at the table. After payments to individuals, defense spending and interest on the debt (which must be paid), only about a seventh of the budget remains. Many of these remaining programs are widely supported. Does anyone really want to end the National Institutes of Health at $28 billion? Or how about the $41 billion we spend to support federal courts, prosecutors and police (the FBI, DEA, Border Patrol)?

Of course, some programs are wasteful, ineffective or outmoded. My favorite example is Amtrak, which serves a tiny number of passengers, is concentrated in the Northeast and costs $1.3 billion annually. But politically, ending such programs is hardly worth the trouble. The bad publicity of antagonizing aggrieved advocates -- here, railroad buffs and maybe environmentalists -- is too high for the small savings. In a nearly $3 trillion budget, even 10 Amtraks are a footnote.

The welfare state has made budgeting an exercise in futility. Both liberals and conservatives, in their own ways, peddle phony solutions. Cut waste, say conservatives. Well, network news reports of $20 million federal programs that don't work may seem -- and be -- scandalous, but like Amtrak they're usually mere blips in the total budget. For its 2008 budget, the Bush administration brags it would end or sharply reduce 141 programs. But most are microscopic; total savings would be $12 billion, or 0.4 percent of spending. Worse, Congress has previously rejected some of these cuts.

Liberals have their own cures. Cut defense, some say. Okay. In 2006, military spending (including the war in Iraq) totaled $520 billion, slightly less than Social Security. If it had been halved, the savings would have just covered the deficit ($248 billion). Little would be left for new programs. Raise taxes on the richest 1 percent, say some. Okay. The richest 1 percent pay about a quarter of all federal taxes. In 2006, that was about $600 billion. To cover the deficit would require about a 40 percent tax increase. Needless to say, neither proposal is politically plausible.

Annual budget debates are sterile -- long on rhetoric, short on action -- because each side blames the other for a situation that neither chooses to change. To cut spending significantly, conservatives would have to go after popular welfare programs, including Social Security and Medicare. To raise taxes significantly, liberals would have to go after the upper middle class, a constituency they covet (two-thirds of all federal taxes come from the richest fifth). Deficits persist, because neither side risks its popularity, and, indeed, both sides pursue popularity with new spending programs and tax breaks.

It might help if Americans called welfare programs -- current benefits for select populations, paid for by current taxes -- by their proper name, rather than by the soothing (and misleading) labels of "entitlements" and "social insurance." That way, we might ask ourselves who deserves welfare and why.

We could consider all of federal spending and not just small bits of it. But most Americans don't want to admit that they are current or prospective welfare recipients. They prefer to think that they automatically deserve whatever they've been promised simply because the promises were made. Americans do not want to pose the basic questions, and their political leaders mirror that reluctance. This makes the welfare state immovable and the budget situation intractable.

Pact With North Korea Draws Fire From A Wide Range Of Critics In U.S. (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 14, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13 — The deal that could lead North Korea to shut its main nuclear reactor came under criticism from both ends of the political spectrum immediately after it was announced on Tuesday.

From the right, hardliners argued that the United States should have held out until North Korea agreed to fully declare and dismantle its entire nuclear program.

From the left, Democrats argued that the deal was no better than one they said the United States could have gotten four years ago, before North Korea tested a nuclear bomb.

If the agreement holds — pacts with North Korea have a history of falling through — it could put the United States and Japan on a path toward normalizing relations with the isolated nation, which President Bush identified as part of an “axis of evil” in 2002, and which tested a nuclear device just four months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0131978

Under the pact, North Korea agreed to freeze its production of plutonium at its five-megawatt nuclear facility in Yongbyon, and to allow international inspectors to monitor and verify its compliance. In return, the United States, China, South Korea and Russia agreed to provide North Korea with food and fuel aid.

The pact kicks down the road three much tougher issues: complete denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula; a complete declaration from North Korea of all its nuclear activities; and the future of North Korea's existing plutonium program.

The North would for now hold on to an arsenal that American intelligence officials say may contain as many as a half-dozen nuclear bombs or the fuel to make them.

Still, the deal represented a bureaucratic victory for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who has pushed for a more diplomatic approach with North Korea than more hawkish administration officials would have liked. In the end, it was Ms. Rice who convinced President Bush to sign onto the pact, administration officials said.

"These talks represent the best opportunity to use diplomacy to address North Korea's nuclear programs," President Bush said in a statement Tuesday morning. "They reflect the common commitment of the participants to a Korean Peninsula that is free of nuclear weapons."

The broad criticism demonstrated the awkward place in which the administration has found itself on North Korea. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations committee, said the deal "takes us back to the future."

"The good news is that it freezes in place North Korea's nuclear program," said Mr. Biden, who has declared his intention to run for president. "The bad news is that North Korea's program is more dangerous to us now than it was in 2002, when President Bush rejected virtually the same deal he is now embracing."

From the other end of the spectrum, John R. Bolton, who until December served under Ms. Rice as the United States ambassador to the United Nations, criticized the pact as too weak, telling CNN that it "contradicts fundamental premises" of the administration's approach to North Korea during the past six years. Mr. Bolton, when in the administration, had argued in favor of a hard-line approach to North Korea.

Asked if she thought there was any substance to Mr. Bolton's criticism, Ms. Rice said at a news conference in Washington on Tuesday: "No, I don't." She added: "I just think he's wrong."

According to administration officials, a turning point came on Jan. 17, when Ms. Rice met in Berlin with Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state who has been the lead American negotiator with North Korea.

Mr. Hill was in Germany for meetings with the North Korean representatives; Ms. Rice was making a stop there on her way home from talks with Arab leaders in Kuwait.

According to the officials' account, Mr. Hill gave Ms. Rice a one-page description of what the North Koreans had agreed to do. Ms. Rice made two telephone calls to Washington — first to Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and then to President Bush. "Do you think we should proceed on this basis?" Ms. Rice asked President Bush. His reply was yes, the administration officials said.

Still, in the intense negotiations in Beijing that followed, the agreement seemed on the verge of collapse several times, as North Korea sought more aid. So fragile was the tentative accord reached Monday that Ms. Rice said she called Mr. Hill in Beijing, at 4:15 A.M. Tuesday in Washington, to make sure the agreement had held.

Under the deal, the United States and its partner nations agreed to provide roughly $400 million in various kinds of aid in return for the North starting a permanent disabling of its nuclear facilities and allowing inspectors into the country.

In return, the United States agreed to begin the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a terror-sponsoring state, a step that is bound to meet opposition in Congress. The United States also agreed to discuss with the North, within 30 days, terms for ending financial sanctions.

Of the five countries negotiating with North Korea, Japan — which had been seeking a tougher stance — did not agree to the aid package, saying that it first needs to work out the issue of North Korea's past abductions of Japanese citizens.

But Japan joined the United States in agreeing to discuss normalizing relations with North Korea, another potentially big step that could begin when Ms. Rice sits down for a meeting with her North Korean counterpart in 60 days as part of a next set of meetings mandated by the pact.

Some experts previously critical of the Bush administration approach praised the accord as a turn to the pragmatic. “We were in a weak bargaining position and the Bush administration deserves credit for achieving a more limited agreement, rather than holding out for a more maximalist, but unachievable, objective,” said Gary Samore, a North Korea expert at the Council on Foreign Relations who helped to negotiate a 1994 agreement the Clinton administration struck with the North.

For her part, Ms. Rice contended that under the terms of the agreement, 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil which North Korea would receive in the first 60 days was an “actually modest” amount; another 950,000 tons of heavy fuel oil would not be forwarded to North Korea until it disabled the reactor and declared all its nuclear programs.

Experts who have followed the long haggling over the North Korean program said there are bound to be problems when the time comes for the North to disclose all of its nuclear facilities and dismantle its program. In perhaps a sign of things to come, North Korea’s state press agency released a statement that described the Yongbyon shutdown as a “temporary suspension.”

In Beijing, Mr. Hill responded quickly. “The North Koreans agreed to shut down their reactors and seal them for the purpose of abandoning them,” he said. “Any action to restart the reactors would be a violation of the agreement.”

N. Korea Accord Gets Faint Praise (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 14, 2007

Senate Democrats -- long opposed to President Bush's six-nation talks with North Korea -- yesterday offered faint praise for a new agreement to halt the rogue regime's nuclear program.

"This is a first step, but still can't fix the mess this administration has created by ignoring North Korea for the past five years," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

"We need to see more active diplomacy from the Bush administration in North Korea and throughout the world."

Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, who as the Democratic presidential nominee in 2004 demanded "bilateral talks" with North Korea, also called the agreement a "good first step."

"Under the Bush administration, North Korea has gone from possessing enough fuel to build one or two nuclear weapons to enough for 10," he said.

"Unless the Bush administration continues to engage North Korea -- and stays focused on working diplomatically to find long-term solutions -- we are likely to be dealing with this issue again in 12 months."

Under the agreement, which has yet to be ratified by the six nations, North Korea -- which rattled the world in December when it tested a nuclear bomb -- would shut down its main nuclear plant in Yongbyon in exchange for tons of heavy oil, humanitarian aid and normalized diplomatic relations with the United States and Japan.

The agreement also drew criticism from the right. Mr. Bush's former ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, said it's too close to the 1994 deal that Pyongyang eventually ignored.

Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, said the agreement may "represent the best opportunity to use diplomacy to address North Korea's nuclear programs."

He also stressed the importance of the negotiations' six-way framework, in which China, Russia, Japan and South Korea join the United States in talks with North Korea.

"One thing that [Pyongyang] discovered is that this is no longer the two-party process with the United States and North Koreans, where the North Koreans can try to leverage the United States against allies in the region," he told reporters at a White House briefing.

In June 2005 -- a year after the six-way talks started -- Mr. Reid and other Senate Democrats sent a letter to the president charging that "no real progress has been made" and calling for a direct U.S. dialogue with North Korea.

Mr. Reid said yesterday that his view of the talks had not changed.

"Diplomacy works," he said.

On the campaign trail in 2004, Mr. Kerry said the six-nation negotiations had failed.

"I want bilateral talks," he said in a September 2004 debate with Mr. Bush at the University of Miami.

DOJ_NMG_0131980

Mr. Bush replied, "I can't tell you how big a mistake I think that is, to have bilateral talks with North Korea. That's precisely what [North Korean dictator] Kim Jong-il wants."

Bush Welcomes North Korea Agreement (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 14, 2007

The Bush administration called a deal to begin dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program a breakthrough, but the North's history of broken promises kept the celebrations to a minimum.

There was worry, too, that accommodation of North Korea would encourage brinksmanship by Iran or other would-be nuclear states.

The bargain among six nations gives North Korea energy, food and other aid in exchange for shuttering its main nuclear reactor. It does not expressly require the North to give up existing weapons or testing now, and the agreement does not spell out how negotiators will resolve issues that have derailed previous pacts.

President Bush, who once labeled North Korea part of an "axis of evil," said the bargain is a promising first step toward getting rid of the North's nuclear weapons.

"These talks represent the best opportunity to use diplomacy to address North Korea's nuclear programs," Bush said in a cautious statement that stressed North Korea's obligations while saying little about what the United States would do.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice repeatedly urged patience.

"This is not the end of the story," Rice told reporters.

Skepticism was wide and criticism swift, focusing on the troubled history of negotiations with the reclusive and unpredictable communist regime, and on what lessons Iran or any other countries with nuclear programs could draw.

On the right, a former top Bush aide joined conservative commentators in calling the deal Pollyannaish.

Former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton said the agreement rewards North Korea for bad behavior while encouraging Iran to ignore international demands that it roll back its nuclear program and hold out for a better deal.

"I will be the saddest man in Washington" if Bush goes along with the agreement, Bolton told reporters. "I think the agreement is fundamentally flawed."

At the conservative Heritage Foundation, analyst Bruce Klingner said the deal "reflects America's abandonment of several previously intractable negotiating positions. "

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il "used his characteristic mixture of military provocations, brinksmanship and crisis diplomacy to gain benefits for a return to the status quo ante and promises of future steps," Klingner said.

On the left, critics said Bush could have had the same deal years ago if he had not been so rigid in his approach to the North.

"This deal takes us back to the future," said Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del. "The good news is that it freezes in place North Korea's nuclear program. The bad news is that North Korea's program is much more dangerous to us now than it was in 2002, when President Bush rejected virtually the same deal he is now embracing."

Analysts say that at the start of the Bush administration North Korea probably had enough material to build one or two weapons, and now probably could produce at least 10.

North Korea stunned the world when it set off an underground nuclear test last October, proving its claim to possess weapons. The North also test-fired a long-range missile last summer, showing that it has the theoretical ability to deliver nuclear weapons as far as the U.S. West Coast.

"The deal announced today essentially freezes the North Korean weapons program, but it does nothing to actually force the country's leaders to give up any of the gains they've made in recent years," Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said. "Unless the Bush administration continues to engage North Korea and stays focused on working diplomatically to find long-term solutions, we are likely to be dealing with this issue again in 12 months."

The nearly 15-year history of efforts to head off North Korean nuclear weapons is best described as one step forward, two steps back. Both Republican and Democratic administrations have struck deals that the North sidestepped, ignored or boycotted.

DOJ_NMG_0131981

After the North threw out international inspectors and threatened to quit the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, President Clinton cut a deal in 1994. The Bush administration has said the North cheated on that deal almost from the start.

Leery of previous offers and determined not to let the North use one-on-one talks with the U.S. as a foil, the Bush administration banded with four other nations — Russia, China, Japan and North Korea — to launch new talks in 2003.

That process lagged while the North stepped up nuclear development, and seemed all but dead when the North announced in Feb. 2005 that it had built a weapon. In September of that year, however, the Bush administration was hailing an agreement on paper to renounce all weapons.

That's the agreement that Pyongyang boycotted for more than a year, before six-way talks resumed last fall. Tuesday's deal begins to put some of the September 2005 deal in force, although the North's tests and continued development of nuclear material make the stakes much higher.

U.S. Flexibility Credited In Nuclear Deal With N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 14, 2007

The six-nation deal to shut down North Korea's nuclear facility, four months after Pyongyang conducted its first nuclear test, was reached yesterday largely because President Bush was willing to give U.S. negotiators new flexibility to reach an agreement, U.S. officials and Asian diplomats said yesterday.

Ever since the North Korean nuclear crisis erupted in 2002 after the discovery of a clandestine nuclear program, the Bush administration has insisted that North Korea should not be rewarded for its bad behavior -- and many of the U.S. offers have required Pyongyang to give up a lot before it could receive anything in return.

Now Bush has signed off on a deal that accepts North Korea's original position -- a "freeze" of its Yongbyon nuclear facility -- and requires Washington to move first by unfreezing some North Korean bank accounts. The agreement leaves until later dealing with such vexing issues as the dismantlement of the facility, North Korea's stash of weapons-grade plutonium and even North Korea's admission of the nuclear program that started the crisis in the first place.

As a result, the agreement came under attack yesterday, with conservatives labeling it a betrayal and Democrats charging that Bush allowed North Korea to become a nuclear-weapon state without gaining much improvement over a Clinton-era deal that collapsed during Bush's first term. But Bush pronounced himself "pleased" with the accord, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a prime architect of the accord, said it is just the beginning of a long process. "This is not the end of the story," she said, calling it the result of "patient, creative and tough diplomacy."

North Korea has a long history of brinkmanship and breaking international agreements, giving pause even to supporters of this diplomatic effort. Bush privately told a group of visiting North Korea experts in October, shortly after North Korea conducted its test, that he did not think any dictator would give up nuclear weapons but that he still saw no alternative to a diplomatic process. Administration officials say it actually became easier to win an agreement after the test because China, North Korea's main patron, was so shocked and embarrassed by Pyongyang's behavior that it became a driving force in the talks.

This deal came as the administration has struggled for some sort of diplomatic victory and as hard-liners who had opposed concessions -- such as former defense secretary Donald H. Rumseld and former ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton -- have left the administration.

The chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, had over time been viewed with suspicion by administration hawks. But, in recent weeks, he worked closely with a White House aide, Victor Cha, who has conservative bona fides on North Korea. Informal talks Cha had with the North Koreans -- including a chance encounter in the Beijing airport in December -- helped lead to the unusual negotiations Hill and Cha held with North Korean counterparts in Berlin last month, officials said.

Those bilateral talks -- which sketched out the parameters of the final deal -- were personally approved by Bush after he had insisted for four years that he would not allow direct U.S.-North Korean negotiations.

Under the agreement, North Korea will close and "seal" its main nuclear reactor at Yongbyon within 60 days in return for 50,000 tons of fuel oil, as a first step in its abandonment of all nuclear weapons and research programs.

North Korea also reaffirmed a commitment to disable the reactor in an undefined next phase of denuclearization, and to discuss with the United States and other nations its plutonium fuel reserves and other nuclear programs that "would be abandoned." In return for taking those further steps, the accord said, North Korea would receive additional "economic, energy and humanitarian assistance up to the equivalent of 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil."

The pledges -- cited in an agreement reached in Beijing by North and South Korea, China, Russia, Japan and the United States after six days of lengthy negotiations -- marked North Korea's first concrete commitment to implement an agreement in principle, dating to September 2005, to relinquish its entire nuclear program. In the view of U.S. and allied diplomats, they also amounted to a down payment on the establishment of a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula and of new relations among Northeast Asian countries.

Since the talks began in August 2003, the environment for negotiations has become significantly more dangerous. North Korea exploded a nuclear test device in October and declared itself a nuclear power, giving it a status it did not have four years ago, or even when the agreement in principle was reached in September 2005.

For its part, the United States reiterated an earlier promise to discuss normalizing relations with the Pyongyang government, a long-standing goal of North Korea.

Separately, Hill said, the United States pledged to North Korea and to China, the chair of the six-party process, that it will resolve within 30 days a dispute over U.S. charges that Banco Delta Asia in Macau has been laundering illicit money from North Korea. This represented a retreat for Washington, which had previously insisted that the banking dispute was a law-enforcement matter that should be treated separately from the nuclear diplomacy. The United States is expected to unfreeze as much as a third of $24 million in North Korean accounts, deeming that money to be legitimate, U.S. officials said.

The accord left for future negotiations the question of what to do with North Korea's declared nuclear weapons, estimated to be as many as 10 bombs from a stockpile of perhaps 50 kilograms of plutonium. In a harbinger of the potential difficulties ahead, the official North Korean news agency said the agreement requires only a temporary suspension of the country's nuclear facilities. "At the talks, the parties decided to offer economic and energy aid equivalent to 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil in connection with the DPRK's [North Korea's] temporary suspension of the operation of its nuclear facilities," it said.

Administration officials stressed that the agreement was an improvement over a bilateral deal reached in 1994 under then-President Bill Clinton, which collapsed after the Bush administration accused North Korea of conducting the clandestine uranium program. Under that agreement, North Korea froze the Yongbyon facility and agreed to "eventually dismantle" it in exchange for fuel oil and light-water reactors. Bush administration officials noted yesterday that the new agreement was signed by all of North Korea's neighbors, which they said would make it more difficult to break. Any suggestion of building light-water reactors for North Korea has been pushed far into the future.

Still, critics and supporters said that they were surprised by the extent of the administration's shift.

"All of us have been arguing -- engage, engage, engage," said John W. Lewis, a Stanford University professor who has repeatedly visited North Korea, most recently in November. "It had to begin with something like this, and it has gone far beyond what anyone expected. It is really quite astonishing."

At the conservative Heritage Foundation, analyst Bruce Klingner said in a report that "the Bush Administration will be vulnerable to criticism that it has not only abandoned its principles, but that it did so while allowing North Korea to augment its nuclear weapons inventory." North Korean leader Kim Jong Il "used his characteristic mixture of military provocations, brinksmanship and crisis diplomacy to gain benefits for a return to the status quo ante and promises of future steps," Klingner wrote.

Cody reported from Beijing.

N. Korea Nuclear Pact Marks Major Shift For Bush (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 14, 2007

The administration accepts a deal similar to one it rejected in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0131983

WASHINGTON — The tentative international nuclear agreement with North Korea marks a fundamental shift in direction for the Bush administration, which for years had sternly demanded that the country's leadership abandon its nuclear program before receiving any rewards.

In his first term, President Bush rejected Clinton administration attempts to win North Korean cooperation with aid, and declared that only after "complete, verified, irreversible dismantlement" of its nuclear program could the autocratic regime in Pyongyang, the capital, receive American help.

But as the White House held fast to its hard-line approach, Kim Jong Il's rickety government built an estimated eight to 10 bombs, experimented with missile launches, conducted a nuclear test, and seemed poised to continue the buildup with impunity.

The agreement reached Tuesday would bring Pyongyang back to the bargaining table, with pledges to freeze its primary nuclear reactor and to discuss dismantling its entire nuclear infrastructure. It was hailed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice as a "breakthrough."

But the deal also gives the impoverished regime an immediate 50,000 tons of fuel oil and other aid and commits the United States to the kind of direct talks with the North Koreans that the White House had long ruled out.

The deal provoked outrage from conservative allies of the administration who said it flatly contradicted Bush's previous policy. Some former Clinton administration officials termed it a step in the right direction but questioned why it took Bush so long.

Many observers acknowledged that the White House had few choices at this point.

"They recognized that they had to adopt a practical approach," said Gary Samore, a National Security Council official during the Clinton administration who is at the Council on Foreign Relations. "They had to do something to stabilize the situation, or they would face a full-blown crisis on the Korean peninsula."

Just the first step

The pending accord reached Tuesday is only a first step toward a negotiated end to North Korea's nuclear program, U.S. officials acknowledged. It calls for the regime to shut down and seal its primary nuclear facilities, at Yongbyon, and to allow the return of United Nations nuclear inspectors to verify the process. Then the North Koreans are to begin a complex series of talks with the United States, South Korea, Japan, China and Russia.

If North Korea discloses all of its nuclear programs, and disables all facilities, it will be entitled to additional aid, including 950,000 tons of heavy fuel oil. The process also promises North Korea a chance to reach two other goals: normalized relations with the United States and removal from the American list of government sponsors of terrorism.

Yet U.S. officials acknowledge that there are a number of issues that could derail a process that has faltered repeatedly since 1993.

"This is the first quarter, not the fourth," Rice cautioned.

Some critics of the administration were quick to charge that the deal had gotten the White House only back to where it was at the beginning of Bush's first term.

"This deal takes us back to the future," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "The good news is that it freezes in place North Korea's nuclear program. The bad news is that North Korea's program is much more dangerous to us now than it was in 2002, when President Bush rejected virtually the same deal he is now embracing."

From a conservative perspective, Bruce Klingner of Heritage Foundation said the deal "sends a dangerously accommodating signal not only to North Korea but also to Iran and any other aspiring nuclear weapons state."

Rice, defending the deal, said the United States was entering these talks in a much better position than it had during the days of the so-called Agreed Framework negotiations initiated in 1994 by the Clinton administration. Bush abandoned those talks in November 2002, amid signs that Pyongyang was carrying on a secret uranium-based bomb program.

Rice said the difference now is that the United States has greater leverage with North Korea because of the influence of the four other countries that also will be at the negotiating table. China, North Korea's primary energy source and chief trading partner, has brought pressure on Pyongyang since its nuclear test in October, U.S. officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0131984

Rice also asserted that the upfront aid that Pyongyang receives for coming back to the table is "modest" — only a fraction of the 2 million tons of heavy fuel oil it was demanding.

Some experts who analyzed the deal agreed.

"Fifty thousand tons is a small amount," said L. Gordon Flake, a longtime Korea watcher at the Mansfield Foundation in Washington. "It's basically a face-saving gesture for the North Koreans."

Although the deal dramatically illustrates how far the administration has come, there have been signs for some time that the United States was open to a more flexible approach.

One such sign was in early 2005, when Rice named Christopher Hill, a veteran dealmaker who helped negotiate the Bosnia peace settlement, to be assistant secretary of State for East Asia, making him the State Department's top negotiator on North Korea.

Hill has worked with Rice and Bush as hard-liners such as former U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton and Robert G. Joseph, the State Department's top proliferation official, were leaving the administration.

Bolton on Tuesday branded the agreement a charade and said it "contradicts fundamental premises of the president's policy."

Last month, Hill met with North Korean officials in Berlin and began talking of a new "bilateral" approach, despite the administration's formal insistence that negotiations must be through meetings of all six countries involved in the discussions.

Another sign of a possible change was Bush's State of the Union address in January. Unlike the speeches of previous years, in which the president berated North Korea, Bush mentioned North Korea only once, doing so to point out that his team was "pursuing intensive diplomacy" to eliminate nuclear weapons from the Korean peninsula.

Iran and Iraq play part

One factor in the change of the administration's approach was its desire to show another country believed to have nuclear weapon ambitions, Iran, that there could be benefits to giving up a program, U.S. officials said.

Some outside analysts believe it also reflects the administration's desire in its last two years to try to achieve progress on halting nuclear proliferation, at a time when most of its energies are being poured into the effort in Iraq.

"They've been feeling the need to make progress on proliferation, and they felt they hadn't done everything they could," said Derek Mitchell, a former Clinton administration defense official who is with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Some analysts see the deal as the latest sign that the Bush administration has been forced to turn to compromise solutions that would have had far less appeal in its early days when it appeared that it had more choices.

"This demonstrates something that we've seen overall, that in its waning days, with its options and resources limited by Iraq, more and more it is turning to these practical policy options," said Samore, who is director of research for the Council on Foreign Relations. "You see it in the Middle East, you see it in East Asia. This is a trend that will continue."

What Drove The North Korea Deal (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, February 14, 2007

Fading options for the U.S. and North Korea led to a landmark agreement designed to shut down Pyongyang's nuclear program. But the follow-through needed to reach the goal of a denuclearized Korean peninsula could be thwarted by the same problems that plagued earlier deals.

The deal reached yesterday in Beijing reflects, in part, a desire within the Bush administration to show diplomatic progress on one front at a time of ebbing support at home and upheaval in the Middle East. For North Korea, the pact offers a way out of its harsh economic and political isolation four months after it tested a nuclear weapon.

President Bush praised the deal, reached after months of arduous negotiations and signed as well by North Korea's four neighbors, as a "first step" toward achieving a nuclear-weapons-free peninsula. The agreement lays out the first concrete steps for disarming North Korea since the U.S., China, Russia, Japan and South Korea began to engage Pyongyang in August 2003.

Other top U.S. officials cautioned that the way forward will present plenty of challenges. Pyongyang has made no overt pledges to surrender any nuclear weapons it now has. Verifying and monitoring its disarmament moves will be tough. And missteps by any of the six parties could trip up the entire process.
